

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

It is true that we find the churching and baptizing a number of the children in the township of the Government agency in this way in other portions of the city, the people regarding the given one as a young one who has died before the missionaries. In the latter I want to be all around and to go to and speak the children in the old ways of thinking and acting against the work of the Gospel. I am, possibly not to be in this way.

is got out of all our heads, and we are going on hereabout as if the devil was contriving every man should blow up himself by wild riot, excess, and devastation of time and temperance. The great ladies do go well masked; and indeed, it be the only show of their modesty to conceal their countenance; but alack, they meet with such countenance to uphold their strange doings, that I marvel not at aught that happens."

Such being the state of the court, coarse sensuality brought along with it its ordinary companion, a brutal degree of undisguised selfishness, destructive alike of philanthropy and good breeding; both of which, in their several spheres, depend upon the regard paid by each individual to the interest as well as the feelings of others. It is in such a time that the heartless and shameless man of wealth and power may, like the supposed Lord Dalgarno, brazen out the shame of his villanies, and affect to triumph in their consequences, so long as they were personally advantageous to his own pleasures or profit.

Alsatia is elsewhere explained as a cant name for Whitefriars, which, possessing certain privileges of sanctuary, became for that reason a nest of those mischievous characters who were generally obnoxious to the law. These privileges were derived from its having been an establishment of the Carmelites, or White Friars, founded, says Stow, in his Survey of London, by Sir Patrick Grey, in 1211. Edward I. gave them a plot of ground in Fleet Street, to build their church upon. The edifice then erected was rebuilt by Courtney, Earl of Devonshire, in the reign of Edward. In the time of the Reformation the place retained its immunities as a sanctuary, and James I. confirmed and added to them by a charter in 1603. Shadwell was the first author who made some literary use of Whitefriars, in his play of the Squire of Alsatia, which turns upon the plot of the Adelphee of Terence.

In this old play, two men of fortune, brothers, educate two young men, (sons to the one and nephews to the other,) each under his own separate system of rigour and indulgence. The elder of the subjects of this experiment, who has been very rigidly brought up, falls at once into all the vices of the town, is debauched by the cheats and bullies of Whitefriars, and, in a word, becomes the Squire of Alsatia. The poet gives, as the natural and congenial inhabitants of the place, such characters

* Harrington's Nugæ Antiquæ, vol. ii., p. 352. For the gross debauchery of the period, too much encouraged by the example of the monarch, who was, in other respects, neither without talent nor a good-natured disposition, see Winwood's Memorials, Howell's Letters, and other Memorials of the time; but particularly, consult the Private Letters and Correspondence of Sternis, alias Buckingham, with his reverend Dad and Gossip, King James, which abound with the grossest as well as the most childish language. The learned Mr. D'Israeli, in an attempt to vindicate the character of James, has only succeeded in obtaining for himself the character of a skilful and ingenious advocate, without much advantage to his royal client.

as the reader will find in the note.† The play, as we learn from the dedication to the Earl of Dorset and Middlesex, was successful above the author's expectations, "no comedy these many years having filled the theatre so long together. And I had the great honour," continues Shadwell, "to find so many friends, that the house was never so full since it was built as upon the third day of this play, and vast numbers went away that could not be admitted."‡ From the Squire of Alsatia the author derived some few hints, and learned the footing on which the bullies and thieves of the Sanctuary stood with their neighbours, the fiery young students of the Temple, of which some intimation is given in the dramatic piece.

Such are the materials to which the author stands indebted for the composition of the Fortunes of Nigel, a novel which may be perhaps one of those that are more amusing on a second perusal, than when read a first time for the sake of the story, the incidents of which are few and meagre.

The Introductory Epistle is written, in Lucio's phrase, "according to the trick;" and would never have appeared had the writer meditated making his avowal of the work. As it is the privilege of a masque or incognito to speak in a feigned voice and assumed character, the author attempted, while in disguise, some liberties of the same sort; and while he continues to plead upon the various excuses which the introduction contains, the present acknowledgment must serve as an apology for a species of "hoity toity, whusky frisky" pertness of manner, which, in his avowed character, the author should have considered as a departure from the rules of civility and good taste.

INTRODUCTORY EPISTLE TO THE FORTUNES OF NIGEL

Captain Clutterbuck to the Reverend Dr. Dryasdust.

DEAR SIR,

I READILY accept of, and reply to the civilities with which you have been pleased to honour me in your obliging letter, and entirely agree with your quotation, of "Quam bonum et quam jucundum!" We may indeed esteem ourselves as come of the same family, or according to our country proverb, as being all one man's heirs; and there needed no apology on your part, reverend and dear sir, for demanding of me any information which I may be able to supply respecting the subject of your curiosity. The interview which you allude to took place in the course of last winter, and is so deeply imprinted on my recollection, that it requires no effort to collect all its most minute details.

You are aware that the share which I had in introducing the Romance, called THE MONASTERY, to public notice, has given me a sort of character in the literature of our Scottish metropolis. I no longer stand in the outer shop of our bibliopoliasts, bargaining for the objects of my curiosity with an unrespective shop-lad, hustled among boys who come to buy Corderies and copy-books, and servant-girls cheapening a pennyworth of paper, but am cordially welcomed by the bibliopoliast himself, with, "Pray, walk into the back-shop, Captain. Boy, get a chair for Captain Clutterbuck. There is the newspaper, Captain—to-day's paper;" or, "Here is the last new work—there is a folder, make free with the leaves;" or, "Put it in your pocket and carry it home;" or, "We will make a book-seller of you, sir, you shall have it at trade price." Or, perhaps, if it is the worthy trader's own publication, his liberality may even extend itself to—"Never mind hooking such a trifle to you, sir—it is an over-copy. Pray, mention the work to your reading friends." I say nothing of the snug well-selected literary party arranged round a turbot, leg of five-year-old mutton, or some such gear, or of the circulation of a quiet bottle of Robert Cockburn's choicest black—nay, perhaps of his best blue, to quicken our talk about old books, or our plans for new ones. All these are comforts reserved to such as are freemen of the corporation of letters, and I have the advantage of enjoying them in perfection.

But all things change under the sun; and it is with no ordinary feelings of regret, that, in my annual visits to the metropolis I now miss the social and warm-hearted welcome witty and kindly friend who first introduced me who had more original wit than would have served as savers of good things, and more so would have made the fortune of as many more deprivation has been added, I trust for a time another bibliopoliast friend, whose vigorous ideas, have not only rendered his native her own literature, but established there which must command respect, even from dissent from many of its canons. The operation in a great measure by the strong calculations of an individual, who knew self, to an unhopd-for extent, of the which his country produced, will probably to the generation which shall follow the

I entered the shop at the Cross, to meet my worthy friend, and learned with surprise in the south had abated the richness of his disorder. Availing myself, then, of I have alluded, I strolled onward in the rooms or crypts, to speak our own form the extensive back-settlement ing-house. Yet, as I proceeded further, other, filled, some of them with old from the equality of their rank on the less saleable modern books of feeling a holy horror creep upon me of intruding on some ecstatic beauty; or, it might be, on the yet band of critics, in the act of work just run down. In such a supple the horrors of the Highland copy compels to witness their who, to use the expression of "heartless,

To see the phantom tra

Still, however, the irresistibility drove me on through the till, like the jeweller of Del masker, I at length reached a vaulted room, dedicated to secrecy and silence, and belied, seated by a lamp, and employed in reading a blotted revisé.* the person, or perhaps I should rather say the Eidolon, or representative Vision, of the AUTHOR OF WAVERLEY! You will not be surprised at the filial instinct which enabled me at once to acknowledge the features borne by this venerable apparition, and that I at once bended the knee, with the classical salutation of, Salve, magne parens! The vision, however, cut me short, by pointing to a seat, intimating at the same time, that my presence was not unexpected, and that he had something to say to me.

I sat down with humble obedience, and endeavoured to note the features of him with whom I now found myself so unexpectedly in society. But on this point I can give your reverence no satisfaction; for, besides the obscurity of the apartment, and the fluttered state of my own nerves, I seemed to myself overwhelmed by a sense of filial awe, which prevented my noting and recording what it is probable the personage before me might most desire to have concealed. Indeed, his figure was so closely veiled and wimpled, either with a mantle, morning-gown, or some such loose garb, that the verses of Spenser might well have been applied—

"Yet, certes, by her face and physiognomy, Whether she man or woman only were,
That could not any creature well decry."

I must, however, go on as I have begun, to apply the masculine gender; for, notwithstanding very ingenious reasons, and indeed something like positive evidence, have been offered to prove the Author of Waverley to be two ladies of talent, I must abide by the general opinion, that he is of the rougher sex.—There are in his writings too many things to permit me to entertain any doubt on that subject. I will proceed, in the manner of dialogue, to repeat as nearly as I can what passed betwixt us, only observing, that in the course of the conversation, my timidity imperceptibly gave way under the familiarity of his address; and that, in the concluding part of our dialogue, I perhaps argued with fully as much confidence as was becoming.

"Que maribus sola trituantur,"

Author of Waverley. I was willing to see you, Captain Clutterbuck, being the person of my family whom I have most regard for, since the death of Jedediah Cleishbotham; and I am afraid I may have done you some wrong in assigning to you the Monastery as a portion of my effects. I have some thoughts of making it up to you, by naming you godfather to this yet unborn babe—(he indicated the proof-sheet with his finger)—But first, touching The Monastery—How says the world—you are abroad and can learn?

Captain Clutterbuck. Hem! hem!—The inquiry is delicate—I have not heard any complaints from the Publishers.

Author. That is the principal matter; but yet an indifferent work is sometimes towed on by those which have left harbour before it, with the breeze in their poop.—What say the Critics?

Captain. There is a general—feeling—that the White Lady is no favourite.

Author. I think she is a failure myself; but rather in execution than conception. Could I have evoked an esprit follet, at the same time fantastic and interesting, capricious and kind; a sort of wildfire of the elements, bound by no fixed laws, or motives of action; faithful and fond, yet teasing and uncertain—

Captain. If you will pardon the interruption, sir, I think you are describing a pretty woman.

Author. On my word, I believe I am. I must invest my elementary spirits with a little human flesh and blood—they are too fine drawn for the present taste of the public.

Captain. They object, too, that the object of your Nixio ought to have been more uniformly noble—Her ducking the priest was no Niad-like amusement.

Author. Ah! they ought to allow for the capricious of what is, after all, but a better sort of goblin. The bath into which Ariel, the most delicate creation of Shakspeare's imagination, seduces our jolly friend Trinculo, was not of amber or rose-water. But no one shall find me rowing against the stream. I care not who knows it—I write for general amusement; and though I never will aim at popularity by what I think unworthy means, I will not, on the other hand, be pertinacious in the defence of my own errors against the voice of the public.

Captain. You abandon, then, in the present work—(looking, in my turn, towards the proof sheet)—the mystic, and the magical, and the whole system of signs, wonders, and omens? There are no dreams, or presages, or obscure allusions to future events?

Author. Not a Cock-lane scratch, my son—not one bounce on the drum of Tedworth—not so much as the poor tick of a solitary death-watch in the waincot. All is clear and above board—a Scots metaphysician might believe every word of it.

Captain. And the story is, I hope, natural and probable; commencing strikingly, proceeding naturally, ending happily—like the course of a fumed river, which gushes from the mouth of some obscure and romantic grotto—then gliding on, never pausing, never precipitating its course, visiting, as it were, by natural instinct, whatever worthy subjects of interest are presented by the country through which it passes—widening and deepening in interest as it flows on, and at length arriving at the final catastrophe as at some mighty haven, where ships of all kinds strike sail and yard?

Author. Hey! hey! what the deuce is all this? Why, 'tis Eracles' vein, and it would require some one much more like Hercules than I, to produce a story which should gush, and glide, and never pause, and visit, and widen, and deepen, and all the rest on't. I should be chin-deep in the grave, man, before I had done with my task; and, in the meanwhile, all the quirks and quiddities which I might have devised for my reader's amusement, would lie rotting in my gizzard, like Sancho's suppressed witticisms, when he was under his master's displeasure.—There never was a novel written on this plan while the world stood.

Captain. Pardon me—Tom Jones.

Author. True, and perhaps Amelia also. Fielding had high notions of the dignity of an art which he may be considered as having founded. He challenges a comparison between the Novel and the Epic. Smollet, Le Sage, and others, emancipating themselves from the strictness of the rules he has laid down, have written rather a history of the miscellaneous adventures which befall an individual in the course of life, than the plot of a regular and connected epopein, where every step brings us a point nearer to the final catastrophe. These great masters have been satisfied if they amused the reader upon the road; though the conclusion only arrived because the tale must have an end—just as the traveller alights at the inn, because it is evening.

Captain. A very commodious mode of travelling, for the author at least. In short, sir, you are of opinion with Bayes—"What the devil does the plot signify, except to bring in fine things?"

Author. Grant that I were so, and that I should write with sense and spirit a few scenes unlaboured and loosely put together, but which had sufficient interest in them to amuse in one corner the pain of body; in another, to relieve anxiety of mind; in a third place, to unwrinkle a brow bent with the furrows of daily toil; in another, to fill the place of bad thoughts, or to suggest better; in yet another, to induce an idler to study the history of his country; in all, save where the personal interrupted the discharge of serious duties, to furnish harmless amusement,—might not the author of such a work, however inartificially executed, plead for his errors and negligences the excuse of the slave, who, about to be punished for having spread the false report of a victory, saved himself by exclaiming—"Am I to blame, O Athenians, who have given you one happy day?"

Captain. Will your goodness permit me to mention an anecdote of my excellent grand-mother?

Author. I see little she can have to do with the subject, Captain Clutterbuck.

Captain. It may come into our dialogue on Bayes's plan.—The sagacious old lady—rest her soul!—was a good friend to the church, and could never hear a minister maligned by evil tongues, without taking his part warmly. There was one fixed point, however, at which she always abandoned the cause of her reverend protegé—it was so soon as she learned he had preached a regular sermon against slanderers and backbiters.

Author. And what is that to the purpose?

Captain. Only that I have heard engineers say, that one may betray the weak point to the enemy, by too much ostentation of fortifying it.

Author. And, once more I pray, what is that to the purpose?

Captain. Nay, then, without farther metaphor, I am afraid this new production, in which your generosity seems willing to give me some concern, will stand much in need of apology, since you think proper to begin your defence before the case is on trial.—The story is hastily huddled up, I will venture a pint of claret.

Author. A pint of port, I suppose you mean?

Captain. I say of claret—good claret of the Monastery. Ah, sir, would you but take the advice of your friends, and try to deserve at least one half of the public favour you have met with, we might all drink Tokay!

Author. I care not what I drink, so the liquor be wholesome.

Captain. Care for your reputation, then,—for your fame.

Author. My fame?—I will answer you as a very ingenious, able, and experienced friend, being counsel for the notorious Jem MacCoul, replied to the opposite side of the bar, when they laid weight on his client's refusing to answer certain queries, which they said any man who had a regard for his reputation would not hesitate to reply to. "My client," said he—by the way, Jem was standing behind him at the time, and a rich scene it was—"is so unfortunate as to have no regard for his reputation; and I should deal very uncandidly with the Court, should I say he had any that was worth his attention."—I am, though from very different reasons, in Jem's happy state of indifference. Let fame follow those who have a substantial shape. A shadow—and an impersonal author is nothing better—can cast no shade.

Captain. You are not now, perhaps, so impersonal as heretofore. These Letters to the Member for the University of Oxford—

Author. Show the wit, genius, and delicacy of the author, which I heartily wish to see engaged on a subject of more importance; and show, besides, that the preservation of my character of incognito has engaged early talent in the discussion of a curious question of evidence. But a cause, however ingeniously pleaded, is not therefore gained. You may remember, the neatly-wrought chain of circumstantial evidence, so artificially brought forward to prove Sir Philip Francis's title to the Letters of Junius, seemed at first irrefragable; yet the influence of the reasoning has passed away, and Junius, in the general opinion, is as much unknown as ever. But on this subject I will not be soothed or provoked into saying one word more. To say who I am not, would be one step towards saying who I am; and as I desire not, any more than a certain justice of peace mentioned by Shenstone, the noise or report such things make in the world, I shall continue to be silent on a subject, which, in my opinion, is very undeserving the noise that has been made about it, and still more unworthy of the serious employment of such ingenuity as has been displayed by the young letter-writer.

Captain. But allowing, my dear sir, that you care not for your personal reputation, or for that of any literary person upon whose shoulders your faults may be visited, allow me to say, that common grounds to the public, which has received you so kindly and in the critics, who have treated you so leniently, might be shown you in various more pages on your story.

* The uninitiated must be informed, that a second proof-sheet is so called.

Author. I do not want you, my son, as Dr. Johnson would have said, "to put your mind from rest." For the critics, they have their business, and I must be the survery proverb gone—

What the children in England are passing a time as* I am their innocent jester, the busy is providing food for them. He says that the wandering wretches they swallow or reject it—It is the public I stand pretty nearly in the relation of the publisher who gives a market at the close of an individual. If it contains pleasing intelligence, a hint from a mistress, a letter from an admirer, or a remittance from a correspondent supposed to be bankrupt.—The letter is acceptably welcome, and read and re-read, folded up, tied, and safely deposited in the bureau. If the contents are disagreeable, if it comes from a man or from a woman, the correspondent is cursed, the letter is thrown into the fire and the expense of postage is heartily regretted; while all the time the bearer of the dispatches is, in either case, as little thought on as the snow of last Christmas. The utmost extent of kindness between the author and the public which can really exist, is, that the world are disposed to be somewhat indulgent to the succeeding works of an original favourite, were it but on account of the habit which the public mind has acquired, while the author very naturally thinks well of their taste who have so liberally applauded his productions. But I deny there is any call for gratitude, properly so called, either on one side or the other.

Captain. Respect to yourself, then, ought to teach caution.

Author. Ay, if caution could augment the chance of my success. But, to confess to you the truth, the works and passages in which I have succeeded, have uniformly been written with the greatest rapidity; and when I have seen some of these played in opposition with others, and commended as more highly finished, I could appeal to pen and standish, that the parts in which I have come feebly off, were by much the more laboured. Besides, I doubt the beneficial effect of too much delay, both on account of the author and the public. A man should strike while the iron is hot, and howl sail while the wind is fair. If a successful author keep not the stage, another instantly takes his ground. If a writer lie by for ten years ere he produces a second work, he is superseded by others; or, if the age is so poor of genius that this does not happen, his own reputation becomes his greatest obstacle. The public will expect the new work to be ten times better than its predecessor; the author will expect it should be ten times more popular, and 'tis a hundred to ten that both are disappointed.

Captain. This may justify a certain degree of rapidity in publication, but not that which is proverbially said to be no speed. You should take time at least to arrange your story.

Author. That is a sore point with me, my son. Believe me, I have not been fool enough to neglect ordinary precautions. I have repeatedly laid down my future work to scale, divided it into volumes and chapters, and endeavoured to construct a story which I meant should evolve itself gradually and strikingly, maintain suspense, and stimulate curiosity; and which, finally, should terminate in a striking catastrophe. But I think there is a demon who sits himself on the feather of my pen when I begin to write, and leads it astray from the purpose. Characters expand under my hand; incidents are multiplied; the story lingers, while the materials increase; my regular mansion turns out a Gothic anomaly, and the work is closed long before I have attained the point I proposed.

Captain. Resolution and determined forbearance might remedy that evil.

Author. Alas! my dear sir, you do not know the force of paternal affection. When I light on such a character as Bailie Jarvie, or Delgatty, my imagination brightens, and my conception becomes clearer at every step which I take in his company, although it leads me many a weary mile away from the regular road, and forces me to leap hedge and ditch to get back into the route again. If I resist the temptation, as you advise me, my thoughts become gray, flat, and dull; I write painfully to myself, and under a consciousness of flagging which makes me flag still more, the sunshine with which fancy had invested the incidents, departs from them, and leaves every thing dull and gloomy. I am no more the same author I was in my better mood, than the dog in a wheel, condemned to go round and round for hours, is like the same dog merrily chasing his own tail, and gambolling in all the frolic of unrestrained freedom. In short, sir, on such occasions, I think I am bewitched.

Captain. Nay, sir, if you plead sincerity, there is no more to be said—he must needs go whom the devil drives. And this, I suppose, sir, is the reason why you do not make the theatrical attempt to which you have been so often urged?

Author. It may pass for one good reason for not writing a play, that I cannot form a plot. But the truth is, that the idea adopted by too favourable judges, of my having some aptitude for that department of poetry, has been much founded on those scraps of old plays, which, being taken from a source inaccessible to collectors, they have hastily considered the offspring of my mother-wit. Now, the manner in which I became possessed of these fragments is so extraordinary, that I cannot help telling it to you.

You must know, that, some twenty years since, I went down to visit an old friend in Worcestershire, who had served with me in the ——— Dragoons.

Captain. Then you have served, sir?

Author. I have—or I have not, which signifies the same thing—Captain is a good travelling name.—I found my friend's house unexpectedly crowded with guests, and, as usual, was condemned—the mansion being an old one—to the basement apartment. I have, as a great modern said, seen too many ghosts to believe in them, so betook myself seriously to my repose, lulled by the wind rustling among the lime-trees, the branches of which checked the moonlight which fell on the floor through the diamonded casement, when, behold, a darker shadow interposed itself, and I beheld visibly on the floor of the apartment—

Captain. The White Lady of Avenel. I suppose?—You have told the very story before.

Author. No—I beheld a female form, with mob cap, bib, and apron, sleeves tucked up to the elbow, a creasing-box in the one hand, and in the other a sauce-pan. I concluded, of course, that it was my friend's cook-maid waiting in her sleep; and as I knew he had a value for Hamlet, who could toss a pancake with any girl in the country I got up to conduct her safely to the door. But as I approached her she said,—“Hold, sir! I am not what you take me for”—words which seemed so apposite to the circumstances, that I should not have much minded them, had it not been for the peculiarly hollow sound in which they were uttered.—“Know, then,” she said, in the same unearthly accents, “that I am the spirit of Betty Barnes.”—“Who hanged herself for love of the stage-coachman,” thought I; “this is a proper spot of work.”—“Of that unhappy Elizabeth or Betty Barnes, long cook-maid to Mr. Warburton, the painful collector, but ah! the too careless custodian of the largest collection of ancient plays ever known—of most of which the titles only are left to gladden the Prolegomena of the Variorum Shakespeare. Yes, stranger, it was these ill-fated hands that consigned to grease and conflagration the scores of small quartos, which, did they now exist, would drive the whole Roxburghe Club out of their senses—it was these unhappy pickers and stealers that signed fat fowls and wiped dirty trenchers with the lost works of Beaumont and Fletcher, Massinger, Jonson, Webster—what shall I say?—even of Shakespeare himself!”

Like every dramatic antiquary, my ardent curiosity after some play named in the Book of the Master of Revels, had often been checked by finding the object of my research numbered amongst the holocaust of victims which this unhappy woman had sacrificed to the God of Good Cheer. It is no wonder then, that, like the Hermit of Parnell,

“I broke the bands of fear, and madly cried,
“You careless jade!”—But scarce the words began,
When Betty brandish'd high her smocking-fair.”

“Beware,” she said, “you do not, by your ill-timed anger, cut off the opportunity I yet have to indemnify the world for the errors of my ignorance. In yonder coal-hole, not used for many a year, repose the few greasy and blackened fragments of the elder Drama which were not totally destroyed. Do thou then”—“Why, what do you stare at, Captain? By my soul, it is true; as my friend Major Longbow says, “What should I tell you a lie for?”

Captain. Lie, sir! Nay, Heaven forbid I should apply the word to a person so veracious. You are only inclined to chase your tail a little this morning, that's all. Had you not better reserve this legend to form an introduction to “Three Recovered Dramas,” or so?

Author. You are quite right—habit's a strange thing, my son. I had forgot whom I was speaking to. Yes, Plays for the chest, not the stage—

Captain. Right, and so you are sure to be acted: for the managers, while thousands of volunteers are desirous of serving them, are wonderfully partial to pressed men.

Author. I am a living witness, having been, like a second Laberius, made a dramatist whether I would or not. I believe my muse would be terrified into treading the stage, even if I should write a sermon.

Captain. Truly, if you did, I am afraid folks might make a farce of it; and, therefore, should you change your style, I should advise a volume of dramas like Lord Byron's.

Author. No, his lordship is a cut above me—I won't run my horse against his, if I can help myself. But there is my friend Allan has written just such a play as I might write myself, in a very sunny day, and with one of Bramah's extra patent-pens I cannot make neat work without such appurtenances.

Captain. Do you mean Allan Ramsay?

Author. No, nor Barbara Allan either. I mean Allan Cunningham, who has just published his tragedy of Sir Marmaduke Maxwell, full of merry-making and murdering, kissing and crying of throats, and passages which lead to nothing, and which are very pretty passages for all that. Not a glimpse of probability is there about the plot, but so much animation in the passages, and such a vein of poetry throughout that as I dearly wish I could infuse into my Culinary should I ever be tempted to publish them. With impress, people would read and admire the beauties as it is, they may perhaps only note his defects—worse, not note him at all.—But never mind the lan; you are a credit to Caledonia for all that.—The lyrical effusions of his, too, which you would do Captain. “It's hame, and it's hame,” is equal to I

Captain. I will take the hint. The club at Ke turned fastidious since Catalani visited the Ahley tith Cauld" has been received both poorly and at Banks of Bonnie Doon" have been positively c Tempore mutante.

Author. They cannot stand still, they will c us. What then!

“A man's a man for a' that.”

But the hour of parting approaches.

Captain. You are determined to proceed system? Are you aware that an unworthy signed for this rapid succession of public supposed to work merely for the lucre of a Author. Supposing that I did permit it which must be derived from success in literature other motives in inducing me to come me the public,—that amusement is the voluntary tax which the public pays for a certain species of literary amusement—it is entered upon on our part, and paid, I presume, by those only who can afford it, and who receive gratification in proportion to the expense. If the capital sum which these volumes have put into circulation be a very large one, has it contributed to my mind games only? or can I not say to hundreds, from honest Duncans the paper manufacturer to the most unworldly of the printer's devils. Didst thou not share? Hadst thou not fifteen pages? I profess I think our Modern Athens much obliged to me for having established such an extensive establishment, and when universal suffrage comes in Athens, I intend to stand for a seat in the House on the interest of all the unworldly artists connected with literature.

Capota. This would be called the language of a citizen-magistrate.

Author. That again, my dear son—there is time in this world, too—nothing but instantaneity in this world! I do my bit, as says Adam Pappas and his followers, that a successful author is a productive labourer, and that his works contribute as effectively a part of the public wealth, as that which is created by any other manufacturer. If a new commodity having an actually intrinsic and commercial value to the result of the operation, why are the author's tales of books to be esteemed a less profitable part of the public stock than the goods of any other manufacturer? I speak with reference to the diffusion of the wealth arising to the public, and the degree of industry which even such a trifling work as the present must stimulate and reward before the volume leaves the publisher's shop. Without me it would not exist, and to that extent I am a benefactor to the country. As for my own emolument, it is won by my tool, and I account myself answerable to Heaven only for the mode in which I expend it. The reader may hope it is not all devoted to selfish purposes, and, without such pretensions to merit as have who disapprove it, a part may "wander, heaven directed, to the poor."

Capota. Yet it is generally held him to write from the mere motives of gain.

Author. It would be base to do so exclusively, or even to make it a principal motive for literary exertion. Nay I will venture to say that no work of imagination, proceeding from the mere consideration of a certain sum of money, ever did, or ever will succeed. Be the lawyer who pleads the soldier who fights, the physician who prescribes the clergyman—of such there be—who prescribes without any real for his profession, or without any sense of its dignity and merely on account of the fee pay or stamped depends themselves to the sink of social mechanism. Accordingly in the case of two of the learned faculties at least, their services are considered as unapproachable and are acknowledged not by any exact estimate of the services rendered, but by a deferential, or voluntary acknowledgment. But let a client or patient make the payment of emitting this little summary of the deferential, which is come to be a thing entirely out of consideration between them, and mark how the learned gentleman will look upon his case. Cast not apart it is the same thing with literary emolument. No man of sense, in any rank of life, or ought to be above accepting a just remuneration for his time, and a reasonable share of the capital which goes to very at times to his exertions. When Carl Peter wrought in the furnace, he took the pay of a common smith; and sailing, climbing, and diving, the most distinguished of these men, have not scrupled to square accounts with their bookkeeper.

Capota. (Sings)

"If it is only a mean thing,
The golden would not see it,
And if it were equally
The clergy would refuse it."

Author. You say well. But no man of honest, plain, or quiet, would make the mere love of gain, the chief, or even the only, purpose of his labours. For myself, I am not disappointed by the game a winning one, yet while I played the public, I should probably estimate it merely for the pleasure of playing. As I have not so strongly as most folks that love of composition, which is perhaps the strongest of all instincts, driving the author to the pen the painter to the palette often without either the chance of fame or the prospect of reward. Perhaps I have that too much of this. I might, perhaps, with as much truth as most people condemn myself from the charge of being author of a greatly overestimated reputation, but I am not therefore hypocritical enough to disguise the ordinary motives, on account of which the whole world around me is toiling unceasingly to the acquisition of man comfort, health, and life. I do not object to the disinterestedness of that vigorous observation of gentleman mentioned by Goldsmith, who said their magazine for England's sake, merely for their own amusement.

Capota. I have but one thing more to hint—The world my son will run round out.

Author. The world my son; and what then? What they know no longer, I will no longer say; and I shall not want anyone enough to remind me of the apostasy.

Capota. And what will become of us then, your poor family? We shall fall into contempt and oblivion.

Author. Like many a poor fellow already overwhelmed with the number of his family, I cannot help going on to increase it—"Tis my reason, Hal"—Such of you as deserve children—perhaps the whole of you—may be entrusted to it. At any rate, you have been read in your day which is more than can be said of some of your contemporaries of less fortune and much merit. They cannot say but that you had the crown. It is always something to have engaged the public attention for seven years. Had I only written Waverley, I should have long since been, according to the established phrase—"the forgotten author of a novel much admired at the time." I believe, on my soul, that the reputation of Waverley is sustained very much by the powers of those, who may be inclined to prefer that tale to its successor.

Capota. You are willing then to barter future reputation for present popularity?

Author. Altho' I have myself expected not to survive in all but works—I may hope to live in some of them,—my aim is not to come accumulating to reflect, that the best authors in all countries have been the most voluminous; and it has often happened, that those who have been best rewarded in their own time, have also continued to be acceptable to posterity. I do not think on all of the present generation as to suppose that the present favour community before future condemnation.

Capota. Were all to act on such principles, the public would be inundated.

Author. Once more, my dear son, beware of evil. You speak as if the public were obliged to read books merely because they are printed; your friends the legislators would thank you to make the proposition good. The most serious grievance attending such inundations as you talk of is, that they make it impossible to read. The multiplicity of publications does the present age no harm, and may greatly advantage that which is to succeed us.

Capota. I do not see how that is to happen.

Author. The complaints in the time of Elizabeth and James, of the alarming brevity of the poem, were so loud as they are at present—yet look at the show over which the inundation of that age flowed, and it resembles now the rank stand of the Fairy Queen—

"Shew'd all with such array,
In great and glorious state of great array,
And all the great men'd with golden ore."

Believe me that even in the most neglected works of the present age the best may discover treasures.

Capota. These books will defy all discovery.

Author. There will be but few in number, such, as for writers, who are concerned in no sort at all unless indeed they publish their works at their own expense like the Richard Blackman, that power of answering the public will be more limited by the difficulty of finding underwriting bookkeepers.

Capota. You are inexhaustible. Are there no bounds to your modesty?

Author. There are the eternal and eternal boundaries of honour and virtue. My aim is like the unchartered chamber of Britanni—

"Where is the lock of death, she did behold
How over the gates door was thrown wide,
She said—she said, and evermore she said
What she would, and could not venture to
At last she sped at that point's upper end
Another was door, to which she went—
So out she said."

Capota. Well you need not the risk of standing on your own principles.

Author. Do you act on yours, and take care you do not stay sitting here till the danger hour is over—I will add this week to your parliamentary vanity system.

Have not dangers been raised, for a little noisy Lord Agathias from the University came to demand the proof-sheet on the part of Mr. M. I will make, and I heard Mr. C. rebuking Mr. P. in another compartment of the same labyrinth I have described, for suffering any one to penetrate so far into the precincts of these temples.

I leave it to you to form your own opinion concerning the import of the dangers, and I cannot but believe I shall quest the wishes of our common parent in publishing this letter to the world which it concerns.

I am, my dear son,
Very sincerely and affectionately,
Yours, &c. &c.

CUTTING CUTTING.

EDINBURGH,
15 APRIL, 1835.

THE FORTUNES OF NIGEL.

CHAPTER I.

Now Scot and English are agreed,
And Saunders hastes to cross the Tweed,
Where, such the splendours that attend him,
His very mother scarce had kend him.
His metamorphosis behold,
From Glasgow frieze to cloth of gold,
His back-sword, with the iron hilt,
To rapier fairly hatch'd and gilt;
Was ever seen a gallant braver!
His very bonnet's grown a beaver.—The Reformation.

THE long-continued hostilities which had for centuries separated the south and the north divisions of Island of Britain, had been happily terminated by succession of the pacific James I. to the English throne. But although the united crown of England Scotland was worn by the same individual, it required a long lapse of time, and the succession of more than one generation, ere the inveterate national prejudices which had so long existed betwixt the sister kingdoms were removed, and the subjects of either of the Tweed brought to regard those upon the opposite bank as friends and as brethren.

These prejudices were, of course, most inveterate during the reign of King James. The English subjects accused him of partiality to those of his ancient kingdom; while the Scots, with equal injustice, charged him with having forgotten the land of his birth, and with neglecting those early friends to whose allegiance he had been so much indebted.

The temper of the King, peaceable even to timidity, needed him perpetually to interfere as mediator between the contending factions, whose brawls disturbed the court. But, notwithstanding all his precautions, historians have recorded many instances, of the mutual hatred of two nations, who after long enemies for a thousand years, had been so very lately united, broke forth with a fury which needed a general convulsion; and, spreading from the highest to the lowest classes, as it occasioned dissensions in council and parliament, factions in the court, duels among the gentry, was no less productive of riots and brawls amongst the lower orders.

While these heart-burnings were at the height, and flourished in the city of London an ingenious whimsical and self-opinioned mechanic, much devoted to abstract studies, David Ramsay by name, whether recommended by his great skill in his profession, as the courtiers alleged, or, as was murmured among his neighbours, by his birthplace, in the good town of Dalkeith, near Edinburgh, held in his household the post of maker of watches and loges to his Majesty. He scorned not, however, to keep open shop within Temple-Bar, a few yards to the eastward of St. Dunstan's Church.

The shop of a London tradesman at that time, as may be supposed, was something very different from those we now see in the same locality. The wares were exposed to sale in cases, only defended from the weather by a covering of canvass, and the whole resembled the stalls and booths now erected for the temporary accommodation of dealers at a country fair, rather than the established emporium of a respectable citizen. But most of the shopkeepers of the time, and David Ramsay amongst others, had a booth connected with a small apartment which projected backward from it, and bore the same resemblance to the front shop that Robinson Crusoe's cabin did to the tent which he erected before it. To Master Ramsay was often accustomed to retreat from the labour of his abstruse calculations; for he was devoted to improvement and discoveries in his own line, and sometimes pushed his researches, like Newton and other mathematicians of the period, into abstract science. When thus engaged, he left the outer posts of his commercial establishment to be maintained by two stout-bodied and strong-voiced apprentices, who kept up the cry of, "What d'ye lack? what d'ye lack?" accompanied with the appropriate recommendations of the articles in which they dealt. This direct and personal application for custom to those who chanced to pass by, is now, we believe, limited to Monmouth Street, (if it still exists even in that repository of ancient garments,) under the guardianship of the scattered remnant of Israel. But at the time we are speaking of, it was practised alike by Jew and Gentile, and served, instead of all our present newspaper puffs and advertisements, to solicit the attention of the public in general, and of friends in particular, to the unrivalled excellence of the goods, which they offered to sale upon such easy terms, that it might fairly appear that the venders had rather a view to the general service of the public, than to their own particular advantage.

The verbal proclaimers of the excellence of their commodities, had this advantage over those who, in the present day, use the public papers for the same purpose, that they could in many cases adapt their address to the peculiar appearance and apparent taste of the passengers. [This, as we have said, was also the case in Monmouth Street in our remembrance. We have ourselves been reminded of the deficiencies of our former habiliments, and exhorted upon that score to fit ourselves more becomingly; but this is a digression.] This direct and personal mode of invitation to customers became, however, a dangerous temptation to the young wags who were employed in the task of solicitation during the absence of the principal person interested in the traffic; and confiding in their numbers and civic union, the apprentices of London were often seduced into taking liberties with the passengers, and exercising their wit at the expense of those whom they had no hopes of converting into customers by their eloquence. If this were resented by any act of violence, the inmates of each shop were ready to pour forth in succour; and in the words of an old song which Dr. Johnson was used to hum,—

"Up then rose the 'prentices all, Living in London, both proper and tall."

Desperate riots often arose on such occasions, especially when the Templars, or other youths connected with the aristocracy, were insulted, or conceived themselves to be so. Upon such occasions, bare steel was frequently opposed to the clubs of the citizens, and death sometimes ensued on both sides. The tardy and inefficient police of the time had no other resource than by the Alderman of the ward calling out the householders, and putting a stop to the strife by overpowering numbers, as the Capulets and Montagues are separated upon the stage.

At the period when such was the universal custom of the most respectable, as well as the most inconsiderable, shopkeepers in London, David Ramsay, on the evening to which we solicit the attention of the reader, retiring to more abstruse and private labours, left the administration of his outer shop, or booth, to the aforesaid sharp-witted, active, able-bodied, and well-voiced apprentices, namely, Jenkin Vincent and Frank Tunstall.

Vincent had been educated at the excellent foundation of Christ's-Church Hospital, and was bred, therefore, as well as born, a Londoner, with all the acuteness, address, and audacity, which belong peculiarly to the youth of a metropolis. He was now about twenty years old, short in stature, but remarkably strong made, eminent for his feats upon holydays at foot-hall, and other gymnastic exercises; scarce rivalled in the broadsword play, though hitherto only exercised in the form of single-stick. He knew every lane, blind alley, and sequestered court of the ward, better than his catechism; was alike active in his master's affairs, and in his own adventures of fun and mischief; and so managed matters, that the credit he acquired by the former bore him out, or at least served for his apology, when the latter propensity led him into scrapes, of which, however, it is but fair to state, that they had hitherto inferred nothing mean or discreditable. Some aberrations there were, which David Ramsay, his master, endeavoured to reduce to regular order when he discovered them, and others which he winked at—supposing them to answer the purpose of the escapement of a watch, which disposes of a certain quantity of the extra power of that mechanical impulse which puts the whole in motion.

The physiognomy of Jin Vin—by which abbreviation he was familiarly known through the ward—corresponded with the sketch we have given of his character. His head, upon which his 'prentice's flat cap was generally flung in a careless and oblique fashion, was closely covered with thick hair of raven black, which curled naturally and closely, and would have grown to great length, but for the modest custom enjoined by his state of life, and strictly enforced by his master, which compelled him to keep it short-cropped,—not unreluctantly, as he looked with envy on the flowing ringlets, in which the courtiers, and aristocratic students of the neighbouring Temple, began to indulge themselves, as marks of superiority and of gentility. Vincent's eyes were deep set in his head, of a strong vivid black, full of fire, roguery, and intelligence, and conveying a humorous expression, even while he was uttering the usual small-talk of his trade, as if he ridiculed those who were disposed to give any weight to his commonplaces. He had address enough, however, to add little touches of his own, which gave a turn of drollery even to this ordinary routine of the booth; and the alacrity of his manner—his ready and obvious wish to oblige—his intelligence and civility, when he thought civility necessary, made him a universal favourite with his master's customers. His features were far from regular, for his nose was flattish, his mouth tending to the larger size, and his complexion inclining to be more dark than was then thought consistent with masculine beauty. But, in despite of his having always breathed the air of a crowded city, his complexion had the ruddy and manly expression of redundant health: his turned-up nose gave an air of spirit and raillery to what he said, and seconded the laugh of his eyes; and his wide mouth was garnished with a pair of well-formed and well-coloured lips, which, when he laughed, disclosed a range of teeth strong and well set, and as white as the very pearl. Such was the elder apprentice of David Ramsay, Memory's Monitor, watchmaker, and constructor of horologes, to his Most Sacred Majesty James I.

Jenkin's companion was the younger apprentice, though, perhaps, he might be the elder of the two in years. At any rate, he was of a much more staid and composed temper. Francis Tunstall was of that ancient and proud descent who claimed the style of the "unstained;" because, amid the various chances of the long and bloody wars of the Roses, they had, with undeviating faith, followed the House of Lancaster, to which they had originally attached themselves. The meanest sprig of such a tree attached importance to the root from which it derived itself; and Tunstall was supposed to nourish in secret a proportion of that family pride, which had extorted tears from his widowed and almost indigent mother, when she saw herself obliged to consign him to a line of life inferior, as her prejudices suggested, to the course held by his progenitors. Yet, with all this aristocratic prejudice, his master found the well-born youth more docile, regular, and strictly attentive to his duty, than his far more active and alert comrade. Tunstall also gratified his master by the particular attention which he seemed disposed to bestow on the abstract principles of science connected with the trade which he was bound to study, the limits of which were daily enlarged with the increase of mathematical science.

Vincent beat his companion beyond the distance-post, in every thing like the practical adaptation of thorough practice, in the dexterity of hand necessary to execute the mechanical branches of the art, and double-distanced him in all respecting the commercial affairs of the shop. Still David Ramsay was wont to say, that if Vincent knew how to do a thing the better of the two, Tunstall was much better acquainted with the principles on which it ought to be done; and he sometimes objected to the latter, that he knew critical excellence too well ever to be satisfied with practical mediocrity.

The disposition of Tunstall was shy, as well as studious; and, though perfectly civil and obliging, he never seemed to feel himself in his place while he went through the duties of the shop. He was tall and handsome, with fair hair, and well-formed limbs, good features, well-opened light-blue eyes, a straight Grecian nose, and a countenance which expressed both good-humour and intelligence, but qualified by a gravity unsuitable to his years, and which almost amounted to dejection. He lived on the best terms with his companion, and readily stood by him whenever he was engaged in any of the frequent skirmishes, which, as we have already observed, often disturbed the city of London about this period. But though Tunstall was allowed to understand quarter-staff (the weapon of the North country) in a superior degree, and though he was naturally both strong and active, his interference in such affrays seemed always matter of necessity; and, as he never voluntarily joined either their brawls or their sports, he held a far lower place in the opinion of the youth of the ward than his hearty and active friend Jin Vin. Nay, had it not been for the interest made for his comrade, by the intercession of Vincent, Tunstall would have stood some chance of being altogether excluded from the society of his contemporaries of the same condition, who called him, in scorn, the Cavaliero Cuddy, and the gentle Tunstall. On the other hand, the lad himself, deprived of the fresh air in which he had been brought up, and foregoing the exercise to which he had been formerly accustomed, while the inhabitant of his native mansion, lost gradually the freshness of his complexion, and, without showing any formal symptoms of disease, grew more thin and pale as he grew older, and at length exhibited the appearance of indifferent health, without any thing of the habits and complaints of an invalid, excepting a disposition to avoid society, and to spend his leisure time in private study, rather than mingle in the sports of his companions, or even resort to the theatres, then the general rendezvous of his class; where, according to high authority, they fought for half-bitten apples, cracked nuts, and filled the upper gallery with their clamours.

Such were the two youths who called David Ramsay master; and with both of whom he used to frisk from morning till night, as their peculiarities interfered with his own, or with the quiet and beneficial course of his traffic.

Upon the whole, however, the youths were attached to their master, and he, a good-natured, though an absent and whimsical man, was scarcely less so to them; and, when a little warmed with wine at an occasional junketing, he used to boast, in his northern dialect, of his "twa bonny lads, and the looks that the court ladies throw at them, when visiting his shop in their caroches, when on a frolic into the city." But David Ramsay never failed, at the same time, to draw up his own tall, thin, lathy skeleton, extend his lean jaws into an alarming grin, and indicate, by a nod of his yard-long visage, and a twinkle of his little grayeye, that there might be more faces in Fleet-Street worth looking at than those of Frank and Jenkin. His old neighbour, Widow Simmons, the sempstress, who had served, in her day, the very tip-top revellers of the Temple, with ruffs, cuffs, and bands, distinguished more deeply the sort of attention paid by the females of quality, who so regularly visited David Ramsay's shop, to its inmates.

"The boy, Frank," she admitted, "used to attract the attention of the young ladies, as having something gentle and downcast in his looks; but then he could not better himself, for the poor youth hath not a word to throw at a dog. Now Jin Vin was so full of his jibes and his jeers, and so willing, and so ready, and so serviceable, and so mannerly all the while, with a step that sprung like a buck's in Epping Forest, and his eye that twinkled as black as a gipsy's, that no woman who knew the world would make a comparison betwixt the lads. As for poor neighbour Ramsay himself, the man," she said, "was a civil neighbour, and a learned man, doubtless, and might be a rich man if he had common sense to back his learning; and doubtless, for a Scot, neighbour Ramsay was nothing of a bad man, but he was so constantly grimed with smoke, gilded with brass filings, and smeared with lamp-black and oil, that Dame Simmons judged it would require his whole shopful of watches to induce any feasible woman to touch the said neighbour Ramsay with any thing save a pair of tongs."

A still higher authority, Dame Ursula, wife to Benjamin Suddlethop, the barber, was of exactly the same opinion.

Such were, in natural qualities and public estimation, the two youths, who, in a fine April day, having first rendered their dutiful service and attendance on the table of their master and his daughter, at their dinner at one o'clock,—Such, O ye lads of London, was the severe discipline undergone by your predecessors!—and having regaled themselves upon the fragments, in company with two female domestics, one a cook, and maid of all work, the other called Mistress Margaret's maid, now relieved their master in the duty of the outward shop; and agreeably to the established custom, were soliciting, by their entreaties and recommendations of their master's manufacture, the attention and encouragement of the passengers.

In this species of service it may be easily supposed that Jenkin Vincent left his more reserved and bashful comrade far in the background. The latter could only articulate with difficulty, and as an act of duty which he was rather ashamed of discharging, the established words of form—"What d'ye lack?—What d'ye lack?—Clocks—watches—barnacles?—What d'ye lack?—Watches—clocks—barnacles?—What d'ye lack, sir? What d'ye lack, madam?—Barnacles—watches—clocks?"

But this dull and dry iteration, however varied by diversity of verbal arrangement, sounded flat when mingled with the rich and recommendatory oratory of the bold-faced, deep-mouthed, and ready-witted Jenkin Vincent.—"What d'ye lack, noble sir?—What d'ye lack, beauteous madam?" he said, in a tone at once bold and soothing, which often was so applied as both to gratify the persons addressed, and to excite a smile from other hearers.—"God bless your reverence," to a benighted clergyman; "the Greek and Hebrew have harmed your reverence's eyes—Buy a pair of David Ramsay's barnacles. The King—God bless his Sacred Majesty!—never reads Hebrew or Greek without them."

"Are you well avised of that?" said a fat parson from the Vale of Evesham. "Nay, if the Head of the Church wears them,—God bless his Sacred Majesty!—I will try what they can do for me; for I have not been able to distinguish one Hebrew letter from another, since—I cannot remember the time—when I had a bad fever. Choose me a pair of his most Sacred Majesty's own wearing, my good youth."

"This is a pair, and please your reverence," said Jenkin, producing a pair of spectacles which he touched with an air of great deference and respect, "which his most blessed Majesty placed this day three weeks on his own blessed nose; and would have kept them for his own sacred use, but that the setting being, as your reverence sees, of the purest jet, was, as his Sacred Majesty was pleased to say, fitter for a bishop, than for a secular prince."

"His Sacred Majesty the King," said the worthy divine, "was ever a very Daniel in his judgment. Give me the barnacles, my good youth, and who can say what nose they may bestride in two years hence?—our reverend brother of Gloucester waxes in years." He then pulled out his purse, paid for the spectacles, and left the shop with even a more important step than that which had paused to enter it.

"For shame," said Tunstall to his companion; "these glasses will never suit one of his years."

"You are a fool, Frank," said Vincent, in reply; "had the good doctor wished glasses to read with, he would have tried them before buying. He does not want to look through them himself, and these will serve the purpose of being looked at by other folks, as well as the best magnifiers in the shop.—What d'ye lack?" he cried, resuming his solicitations. "Mirrors for your toilette, my pretty madam; your head-gear is something awry—pity, since it is so well fancied." The woman stopped and bought a mirror.—"What d'ye lack?—a watch, Master Sergeant—a watch that will go as long as a lawsuit, as steady and true as your own eloquence?"

"Hold your peace, sir," answered the Knight of the Coif, who was disturbed by Vin's address whilst in deep consultation with an eminent attorney; "hold your peace! You are the loudest tongued varlet betwixt the Devil's Tavern and Guildhall."

"A watch," reiterated the undaunted Jenkin, "that shall not lose thirteen minutes in a thirteen years' lawsuit.—He's out of hearing.—A watch with four wheels and a bar-movement—a watch that shall tell you, Master Poet, how long the patience of the audience will endure your next piece at the Black Bull." The bard laughed, and fumbled in the pocket of his slops till he chased into a corner, and fairly caught, a small piece of coin.

"Here is a tester to cherish thy wit, good boy," he said.

"Gramercy," said Vin; "at the next play of yours I will bring down a set of roaring boys, that shall make all the critics in the pit, and the gallants on the stage, civil, or else the curtain shall smoke for it."

"Now, that I call mean," said Tunstall, "to take the poor rhymers' money, who has so little left behind."

"You are an owl, once again," said Vincent; "if he has nothing left to buy cheese and radishes, he will only dine a day the sooner with some patron or some player, for that is his fate five days out of the seven. It is unnatural that a poet should pay for his own pot of beer; I will drink his tester for him, to save him from such shame; and when his third night comes round, he shall have pennyworths for his coin, I promise you.—But here comes another guess customer. Look at that strange fellow—see how he gapes at every shop, as if he would swallow the wares.—O! Saint Dunstan has caught his eye; pray God he swallow not the images. See how he stands astonished, as old Adam and Eve ply their ding-dong! Come, Frank, thou art a scholar; construe me that same fellow, with his blue cap with a cock's feather in it, to show he's of gentle blood, God wot—his gray eyes, his yellow hair, his sword with a ton of iron in the handle—his gray threadbare cloak—his step like a Frenchman—his look like a Spaniard—a book at his girdle, and a broad dudgeon-dagger on the other side, to show him half-pedant, half-bully. How call you that pageant, Frank?"

"A raw Scotsman," said Tunstall; "just come up, I suppose, to help the rest of his countrymen to gnaw old England's bones; a palmerworm, I reckon, to devour what the locust has spared."

"Even so, Frank," answered Vincent; "just as the poet sings sweetly,—

'In Scotland he was born and bred,
And, though a beggar, must be fed.'

"Hush!" said Tunstall, "remember our master."
"Pshaw!" answered his mercurial companion; "he knows on which side his bread is buttered, and I warrant you has not lived so long among Englishmen, and by Englishmen, to quarrel with us for bearing an English mind. But see, our Scot has done gazing at Saint Dunstan's, and comes our way. By this light, a proper lad and a sturdy, in spite of freckles and sun-burning.—He comes nearer still, I will have at him."

"And, if you do," said his comrade, "you may get a broken head—he looks not as if he would carry coals."

"A fig for your threat," said Vincent, and instantly addressed the stranger. "Buy a watch, most noble northern Thane—buy a watch, to count the hours of plenty since the blessed moment you left Berwick behind you.—Buy barnacles, to see the English gold lies ready for your gripe.—Buy what you will, you shall have credit for three days; for, were your pockets as bare as Father Fergus's, you are a Scot in London, and you will be stocked in that time." The stranger looked sternly at the waggish apprentice, and seemed to grasp his cudgel in rather a menacing fashion. "Buy physic," said the undaunted Vincent, "if you will buy neither time nor light—physic for a proud stomach, sir;—there is a 'pothecary's shop on the other side of the way."

Here the probationary disciple of Galen, who stood at his master's door in his flat cap and canvass sleeves, with a large wooden pestle in his hand, took up the ball which was flung to him by Jenkin, with, "What d'ye lack, sir?—Buy a choice Caledonian salve, Flos sulphur. cum butyro quant. suff."

"To be taken after a gentle rubbing-down with an English oaken towel," said Vincent.

The bonny Scot had given full scope to the play of this small artillery of city wit, by halting his stately pace, and viewing grimly, first the one assailant, and then the other, as if menacing either repartee or more violent revenge. But phlegm or prudence got the better of his indignation, and tossing his head as one who valued not the raillery to which he had been exposed, he walked down Fleet Street, pursued by the horse-laugh of his tormentors.

"The Scot will not fight till he see his own blood," said Tunstall, whom his north of England extraction had made familiar with all manner of proverbs against those who lay yet farther north than himself.

"Faith, I know not," said Jenkin; "he looks dangerous, that fellow—he will hit some one over the noddle before he goes far.—Hark!—hark!—they are rising."

Accordingly, the well-known cry of, "'Prentices—'prentices—Clubs—clubs!" now rang along Fleet Street; and Jenkin, snatching up his weapon, which lay beneath the counter ready at the slightest notice, and calling to Tunstall to take his bat and follow, leaped over the hatch-door which protected the outer-shop, and ran as fast as he could towards the affray, echoing the cry as he ran, and elbowing, or shoving aside, whoever stood in his way. His comrade, first calling to his master to give an eye to the shop, followed Jenkin's example, and ran after him as fast as he could, but with more attention to the safety and convenience of others; while old David Ramsay,*

* David Ramsay, watchmaker and horologist to James I., was a real person, though the author has taken the liberty of pressing him into the service of fiction. Although his profession led him to cultivate the exact sciences, like many at this period he mingled them with pursuits which were mystical and fantastic. The truth was, that the boundaries between truth and falsehood in mathematics, astronomy, and similar pursuits, were not exactly known, and there existed a sort of terra incognita between them, in which the wisest men bewildered themselves. David Ramsay risked his money on the success of the vaticinations which his researches led him to form, since he sold clocks and watches under condition, that their value should not become payable till King James was crowned in the Pope's chair at Rome. Such wagers were common in that day, as may be seen by looking at Jonson's Every Man out of his Humour.

David Ramsay was also an actor in another singular scene, in which the notorious astrologer Lilly was a performer, and had no small expectation on the occasion, since he brought with him a half-quartern sack to put the treasure in.

"David Ramsay, his Majesty's clock-maker, had been informed that there was a great quantity of treasure buried in the cloister of Westminster Abbey. He acquainted Dean Witham therewith, who was also then Bishop of Lincoln. The Dean gave him liberty to search after it, with this proviso, that if any was discovered, his church should have a share of it. Davy Ramsay finds out one John Scott, who pretended the use of the Mosical rods, to assist him herein.* I was desired to join with him, unto which I consented. One winter's night, Davy Ramsay, with several gentlemen, myself, and Scott, entered the cloisters. We played the hazel rods round about the cloisters. Upon the west end of the cloisters the rods turned one over another, an argument that the treasure was there. The labourers, dug at least six feet deep, and then we met with a coffin; but with hands and eyes uplifted, a green apron him, and a glass which he had been polishing into his bosom, came forth to look after the of his goods and chattels, knowing, by old experience, that, when the cry of "Clubs" once arose, he have little aid on the part of his apprentices.

CHAPTER II.

This, sir, is one among the Seignory.
Has wealth at will, and will to use his wealth,
And wit to increase it. Marry, his worst folly Lies in a thriftless sort of charity.
That goes a-gadding sometimes after objects,
Which wise men will not see when thrust upon them.
The Old C

THE ancient gentleman bustled about his self-petish displeasure at being summoned hither hastily, to the interruption of his more abstruse studies; and, unwilling to renounce the train of action which he had put in progress, he mingled sically with the fragments of the arithmetical tion, his oratory to the passengers, and angry tions on his idle apprentices. "What d'ye lack Madam, what d'ye lack—clocks for hall or night-watches—day-watches?—Looking whee 48—the power of retort 8—the striking pins 41 What d'ye lack, honoured sir!—The quotie multiplicand—That the knaves should have got at this blessed minute!—the acceleration being rate of 5 minutes, 55 seconds, 53 thirds, 59 for I will switch them both when they come before me, by the bones of the immortal Napier!"

Here the vexed philosopher was interrupted by the entrance of a grave citizen of most respectable appearance, who, saluting him familiarly by the name of "Davie, my old acquaintance," demanded had put him so much out of sorts, and gave him the same time a cordial grasp of his hand.

The stranger's dress was, though grave, richer than usual. His panned hose were of velvet, lined with purple silk, which garniture adorned at the slashes. His doublet was of purple and his short cloak of black velvet, to correspond with his hose; and both were adorned with a number of small silver buttons, richly wrought in filigree. A triple chain of gold hung round his waist, and, in place of a sword or dagger, he wore a belt an ordinary knife, for the purpose of the writing materials, which appeared to be of the best quality. He might have seemed which, in regard it was not heavy, we did not open, we afterwards much repented.

"From the cloisters we went into the abbey church, upon a sudden, (there being no wind when we began,) a high, so blustering and loud a wind did rise, I verily believed the west end of the church would have fallen upon us. Our rods would not move at all; the candle torches, also, but one were extinguished, or burned very low. John Scott, my partner, was amazed, looked pale, knew what to think or do, until I gave directions and commands to dismiss the demons; which, when done, all was quiet and each man returned unto his lodging late, about o'clock at night. I could never since be induced to join in any such like actions.

"The true miscarriage of the business was by reason many people being present at the operation; for there were thirty, some laughing, others deriding us; so that, if not dismissed the demons, I believe most part of the church would have been blown down. Secrecy and integrity, with a strong confidence and knowledge of what they are doing, are best for the work."—LILLY'S Life and p. 46.

David Ramsay had a son called William Ramsay, who to have possessed all his father's credulity. He became an astrologer, and in 1651-2 published "Vox Stellarum, an imitation to the Judgment of Eclipses and the Annual Revolution of the World." The edition of 1652 is inscribed to his father, and would appear, as indeed it might be argued from his father's disposing of his goods, that the old horologist had made hay while the sun shone; for his son, in his dedication, has this exception to the paternal virtues, "It is true yet lessness in laying up while the sun shone for the tempest stormy day, hath given occasion to some inferior spirits not to value you according to what you are by nature yourself, for such look not to a man longer than he is in rity, esteeming none but for their wealth, not wisdom, nor virtue." From these expressions it is to be apprehended while old David Ramsay, a follower of the Stewarts, and the Parliamentary government, his son, William, had been from being a dupe to astrology to the dignity of a cheat.

secretary or clerk, engaged in the service of the public, only that his low, flat, and unadorned cap, and his well-blackened, shining shoes, indicated that he belonged to the city. He was a well-made man, about the middle size, and seemed firm in health, though advanced in years. His looks expressed sagacity and good-humour; and the air of respectability which his dress announced, was well supported by his clear eye, ruddy cheek, and gray hair. He used the Scottish idiom in his first address, but in such a manner that it could hardly be distinguished whether he was passing upon his friend a sort of jocose mockery, or whether it was his own native dialect, for his ordinary discourse had little provincialism.

In answer to the queries of his respectable friend, Ramsay groaned heavily, answering by echoing back the question, "What ails me, Master George? Why, every thing ails me! I profess to you that a man may as well live in Fairyland as in the Ward of Farringdon-Without. My apprentices are turned into mere goblins—they appear and disappear like spunkies, and have no more regularity in them than a watch without a scapement. If there is a ball to be tossed up, or a bullock to be driven mad, or a quean to be ducked for scolding, or a head to be broken, Jenkin is sure to be at the one end or the other of it, and then away skips Francis Tunstall for company. I think the prize-fighters, bear-leaders, and mountebanks, are in a league against me, my dear friend, and that they pass my house ten times for any other in the city. Here's an Italian fellow come over, too, that they call Punchinello; and, altogether"—

"Well," interrupted Master George, "but what is all this to the present case?"

"Why," replied Ramsay, "here has been a cry of thieves or murder, (I hope that will prove the least of it amongst these English pock-pudding swine!) and I have been interrupted in the deepest calculation ever mortal man plunged into, Master George."

"What, man!" replied Master George, "you must take patience—You are a man that deals in time, and can make it go fast and slow at pleasure: you, of all the world, have least reason to complain, if a little of it be lost now and then.—But here come your boys, and bringing in a slain man betwixt them, I think—here has been serious mischief, I am afraid."

"The more mischief the better sport," said the crabbed old watchmaker. "I am blithe, though, that its neither of the two loons themselves.—What are ye bringing a corpse here for, ye fause villains?" he added, addressing the two apprentices, who, at the head of a considerable mob of their own class, some of whom bore evident marks of a recent fray, were carrying the body betwixt them.

"He is not dead yet, sir," answered Tunstall.

"Carry him into the apothecary's, then," replied his master. "D'ye think I can set a man's life in motion again, as if he were a clock or a timepiece?"

"For godsake, old friend," said his acquaintance, "let us have him here at the nearest—he seems only in a swoon."

"A swoon?" said Ramsay, "and what business had he to swoon in the streets? Only, if it will oblige my friend Master George, I would take in all the dead men in St. Dunstan's parish. Call Sam Porter to look after the shop."

So saying, the stunned man, being the identical Scotsman who had passed a short time before amidst the jeers of the apprentices, was carried into the back shop of the artist, and there placed in an armed chair till the apothecary from over the way came to his assistance. This gentleman, as sometimes happens to those of the learned professions, had rather more lore than knowledge, and began to talk of the sinciput and occiput, and cerebrum and cerebellum, until he exhausted David Ramsay's brief stock of patience.

"Bell-um! bell-ell-um!" he repeated, with great indignation; "What signify all the bells in London, if you do not put a plaster on the chield's crown?"

Master George, with better-directed zeal, asked the apothecary whether bleeding might not be useful; when, after humming and hawing for a moment, and being unable, upon the spur of the occasion, to suggest any thing else, the man of pharmacy observed, that it would, at all events, relieve the brain or cerebrum, in case there was a tendency to the deposition of any extravasated blood, to operate as a pressure upon that delicate organ. Fortunately he was adequate to performing this operation; and, being powerfully aided by Jenkin Vincent (who was learned in all cases of broken heads) with plenty of cold water, and a little vinegar, applied according to the scientific method practised by the bottle-holders in a modern ring, the man began to raise himself on his chair, draw his cloak tightly around him, and look about like one who struggles to recover sense and recollection.

"He had better lie down on the bed in the little back closet," said Mr. Ramsay's visiter, who seemed perfectly familiar with the accommodations which the house afforded.

"He is welcome to my share of the truckle," said Jenkin,—for in the said back closet were the two apprentices accommodated in one truckle-bed,—“I can sleep under the counter.”

"So can I," said Tunstall. "and the poor fellow can have the bed all night."

"Sleep," said the apothecary, "is, in the opinion of Galen, a restorative and febrifuge, and is most naturally taken in a truckle-bed."

"Where a better cannot be come by,"—said Master George; "but these are two honest lads, to give up their beds so willingly. Come, off with his cloak, and let us bear him to his couch—I will send for Dr. Irving the king's chirurgion—he does not live far off, and that shall be my share of the Samaritan's duty, neighbour Ramsay."

"Well, sir," said the apothecary, "it is at your pleasure to send for other advice, and I shall not object to consult with Dr. Irving or any other medical person of skill, neither to continue to furnish such drugs as may be needful from my pharmacopœia. However, whatever Dr. Irving, who, I think, hath had his degrees in Edinburgh, or Dr. Any-one-else, be he Scottish or English, may say to the contrary, sleep, taken timeously, is a febrifuge, or sedative, and also a restorative."

He muttered a few more learned words, and concluded by informing Ramsay's friend in English far more intelligible than his Latin, that he would look to him as his paymaster, for medicines, care, and attendance, furnished, or to be furnished, to this party unknown.

Master George only replied by desiring him to send his bill for what he had already to charge, and to give himself no farther trouble unless he heard from him. The pharmacopolist, who, from discoveries made by the cloak falling a little aside, had no great opinion of the faculty of this chance patient to make reimbursement, had no sooner seen his case espoused by a substantial citizen, than he showed some reluctance to quit possession of it, and it needed a short and stern hint from Master George, which, with all his good humour, he was capable of expressing when occasion required, to send to his own dwelling this Esculapius of Temple-Bar.

When they were rid of Mr. Raredrench, the charitable efforts of Jenkin and Francis, to divest the patient of his long gray cloak, were firmly resisted on his own part—"My life suner—my life suner," he muttered in indistinct murmurs. In these efforts to retain his upper garment, which was too tender to resist much handling, it gave way at length with a loud rent, which almost threw the patient into a second syncope, and he sat before them in his under garments, the looped and repaired wretchedness of which moved at once pity and laughter, and had certainly been the cause of his unwillingness to resign the mantle, which, like the virtue of charity, served to cover so many imperfections.

The man himself cast his eyes on his poverty-struck garb, and seemed so much ashamed of the disclosure, that, muttering between his teeth, that he would be too late for an appointment, he made an effort to rise and leave the shop, which was easily prevented by Jenkin Vincent and his comrade, who, at the nod of Master George, laid hold of and deained him in his chair. The patient next looked round him for a moment, and then said faintly, in his broad northern language—"What sort of usage ca' ye this, gentlemen, to a stranger, a sojourner in your town? Ye hae broken my head—ye hae riven my cloak, and now ye are for restraining my personal liberty! They were wiser than me," he said, after a moment's pause, "that counselled me to wear my warst claithing in the streets of London; and, if I could have got ony things warse than these mean garments,"—"which would have been very difficult," said Jin Vin, in a whisper to his companion,)—"they would have been e'en ower gude for the grips o' men sae little acquainted with the laws of honest civility."

"To say the truth," said Jenkin, unable to forbear any longer, although the discipline of the times prescribed to those in his situation a degree of respectful distance and humility in the presence of parents, masters, or seniors, of which the present age has no idea—"to say the truth, the good gentlemen's clothes look as if they would not brook much handling."

"Hold your peace, young man," said Master George, with a tone of authority; "never mock the stranger or the poor—the black ox has not trod on your foot yet—you know not what lands you may travel in, or what clothes you may wear, before you die."

Vincent held down his head and stood rebuked, but the stranger did not accept the apology which was made for him.

"I am a stranger, sir," said he, "that is certain: though methinks, that, being such, I have been somewhat familiarly treated in this town of yours;—but, as for my being poor, I think I need not be charged with poverty, till I seek siller of somebody."

"The dear country all over," said Master George, in a whisper, to David Ramsay, "pride and poverty."

But David had taken out his tablets and silver pen, and, deeply immersed in calculations, in which he rambled over all the terms of arithmetic, from the simple unit to millions, billions, and trillions, neither heard nor answered the observation of his friend, who, seeing his abstraction, turned again to the Scot.

"I fancy now, Jockey, if a stranger were to offer you a noble, you would chuck it back at his head?"

"Not if I could do him honest service for it, sir," said the Scot; "I am willing to do what I may to be useful, though I come of an honourable house, and may be said to be in a sort indifferently weel provided for."

"Ay!" said the interrogator, "and what house may claim the honour of your descent?"

"An ancient coat belongs to it, as the play says," whispered Vincent to his companion.

"Come, Jockey, out with it," continued Master George, observing that the Scot, as usual with his countrymen, when asked a blunt, straightforward question, took a little time before answering it.

"I am no more Jockey, sir, than you are John," said the stranger, as if offended at being addressed by a name, which at that time was used, as Sawney now is, for a general appellative of the Scottish nation. "My name, if you must know it, is Richie Moniplies; and I come of the old and honourable house of Castle Collop, weel kend at the West-Port of Edinburgh."

"What is that you call the West-Port?" proceeded the interrogator.

"Why, an it like your honour," said Richie, who now, having recovered his senses sufficiently to observe the respectable exterior of Master George, threw more civility into his manner than at first, "the West-Port is a gate of our city, as yonder brick arches at Whitehall form the entrance of the King's palace here, only that the West-Port is of stonern work, and mair decorated with architecture and the policy of bigging."

"Nouns, man, the Whitehall gateways were planned by the great Holbein," answered Master George; "I suspect your accident has jumbled your brains, my good friend. I suppose you will tell me next, you have at Edinburgh as fine a navigable river as the Thames, with all its shipping?"

"The Thames?" exclaimed Richie, in a tone of ineffable contempt—"God bless your honour's judgment, we have at Edinburgh the Water-of-Leith and the Nor-loch!"

"And the Pow-Burn and the Quarry-holes, and the Gusedub, ye fause loon!" answered Master George, speaking Scotch with a strong and natural emphasis: "it is such landloupers as you, that, with your falset and fair fashions, bring reproach on our whole country."

"God forgie me, sir," said Richie, much surprised at finding the supposed southron converted into a native Scot, "I took your honour for an Englisher! But I hope there was naething wrang in standing up for ane's ain country's credit in a strange land, where all men cry her down?"

"Do you call it for your country's credit, to show that she has a lying, puffing rascal, for one of her children?" said Master George. "But come, man, never look grave on it, as you have found a countryman, so you have found a friend, if you deserve one—and especially if you answer me truly."

"I see nae gude it wad do me to speak ought but truth," said the worthy North Briton.

"Well, then—to begin," said Master George, "I suspect you are a son of old Mungo Moniplies, the flesher, at the West-Port."

"Your honour is a witch, I think," said Richie, grinning.

"And how dared you, sir, to uphold him for a noble?"

"I dinna ken, sir," said Richie, scratching his head; "I hear muckle of an Earl of Warwick in these southern parts—Guy, I think his name was, and he has great reputation here for slaying our cows, and boars, and such like; and I am sure my father has killed more cows and boars, not to mention bulls, calves, sheep, ewes, lambs, and pigs, than the hail Baronage of England."

"Go to! you are a shrewd knave," said Master George; "charm your tongue, and take care of saucy answers. Your father was an honest burgher, and the deacon of his craft: I am sorry to see his son in so poor a coat."

"Indifferent, sir," said Richie Moniplies, looking down on his garments—"very indifferent; but it is the wonted livery of poor burghers' sons in our country—one of Luckie Want's bestowing upon us—rest us patient! The King's leaving Scotland has tak all custom frae Edinburgh; and there is hay made at the Cross, and a dainty crop of fouats in the Grassmarket. There is as much grass grows where my father's stall stood, as might have been a good bit for the beasts he was used to kill."

"It is even too true," said Master George; "and while we make fortunes here, our old neighbours and their families are starving at home. This should be thought upon oftener.—And how came you by this broken head, Richie?—tell me honestly."

"Troth, sir, I see no lee about the matter," answered Moniplies. "I was coming along the street here and ilk ane was at me with their jests and roguery. So I thought to mysell, ye are ower mony for me to mell with; but let me catch ye in Barford's Park or at the fit of the Vennel, I could gar some of us sing another sang. Sae ae auld hirpling deevil of a potter behoved just to step in my way and offer me a pig, as he said, just to put my Scotch ointment on and I gave him a push, as but natural, and the tottering deevil coupit ower amang his ain pigs, and dinaged a score of them. And then the reird raised, and hadna these twa gentlemen helped me out of it murdered I suld hae been, without remeid. And it was, just when they got haud of my arm to bray me out of the fray, I got the lick that donnerit me from a left-handed lighterman."

Master George looked to the apprentices as if to demand the truth of this story.

"It is just as he says, sir," replied Jenkin; "and I heard nothing about pigs.—The people said he broke some crockery, and that—I beg pardon, sir, nobody could thrive within the kenning of a Scot."

"Well, no matter what they said, you were an honest fellow to help the weaker side—And you, sir, rah," continued Master George, addressing his countryman, "will call at my house to-morrow morning, agreeable to this direction."

"I will wait upon your honour," said the Scot, bowing very low; "that is, if my honourable master will permit me."

"Thy master?" said George,—"Hast thou any other master save Want, whose livery you say you wear?"

"Troth, in one sense, if it please your honour, I serve twa masters," said Richie; "for both my master and me are slaves to that same beldam, whom we thought to show our heels to by coming off from Scotland. So that you see, sir, I hold in a sort of black ward tenure, as we call it in our country, being the servant."

"And what is your master's name?" said Master George; and observing that Richie hesitated, he added, "Nay, do not tell me, if it is a secret."

"A secret that there is little use in keeping," said Richie; "only ye ken that our northern stomachs are ower proud to call in witnesses to our distress. No that my master is in mair than present pinch, sir," he added, looking towards the two English apprentices, "having a large sum in the Royal Treasury—that is," he continued, in a whisper to Master George,—"the King is owing him a lot of siller; but it's ill getting at it, it's like.—My master is the young Lord Glenvarloch."

Master George testified surprise at the name.—"You one of the young Lord Glenvarloch's followers, and in such a condition?"

"Troth, and I am all the followers he has, for the present that is; and blythe wad I be if he were muckle better aff than I am, though I were to bide as I am."

"I have seen his father with four gentlemen and ten lackeys at his heels," said Master George, "rustling in their laces and velvets. Well, this is a changeful world, but there is a better beyond it. The good old house of Glenvarloch, that stood by King and country five hundred years!"

"Your honour may say a thousand," said the follower.

"I will say what I know to be true, friend," said the citizen, "and not a word more.—You seem well recovered now—can you walk?"

"Bravely, sir," said Richie; "it was but a bit dover. I was bred at the West-Port, and my cantle will stand a clour wad bring a stot down."

"Where does your master lodge?"

"We pit up, an it like your honour," replied the Scot, "in a sma' house at the fit of ane of the wynds that gang down to the water-side, with a decent man, John Christie, a ship-chandler, as they ca't. His father came from Dundee. I wotna the name of the wynd, but it's right anent the mickle kirk yonder; and your honour will mind, that we pass only by our family-name of simple Mr. Nigel Olifaunt, as keeping ourselves retired for the present, though in Scotland we be called the Lord Nigel."

"It is wisely done of your master," said the citizen. "I will find out your lodgings, though your direction be none of the clearest." So saying, and slipping a piece of money at the same time into Richie Moniplies's hand, he bade him hasten home, and get into no more affrays.

"I will take care of that now, sir," said Richie, with a look of importance, "having a charge about me. And so, wussing ye a weel, with special thanks to these twa young gentlemen"—

"I am no gentleman," said Jenkin, flinging his cap on his head; "I am a tight London 'prentice, and hope to be a freeman one day. Frank may write himself gentleman, if he will."

"I was a gentleman once," said Tunstall, "and I hope I have done nothing to lose the name of one."

"Weel, weel, as ye list," said Richie Moniplies; "but I am mickle beholden to ye baith—and I am not a hair the less like to bear it in mind that I say but little about it just now.—Gude night to you, my kind countryman." So saying, he thrust out of the sleeve of his ragged doublet a long bony hand and arm, on which the muscles rose like whip-cord.—

Master George shook it heartily, while Jenkin and Frank exchanged sly looks with each other.

Richie Moniplies would next have addressed his thanks to the master of the shop, but seeing him, as he afterwards said, "scribbling on his bit bookie, as if he were demented," he contented his politeness with "giving him a hat," touching, that is, his bonnet, in token of salutation, and so left the shop.

"Now, there goes Scotch Jockey, with all his bad and good about him," said Master George to Master David, who suspended, though unwillingly, the calculations with which he was engaged, and keeping his pen within an inch of the tablets, gazed on his friend with great lack-lustre eyes, which expressed any thing rather than intelligence or interest in the discourse addressed to him.—"That fellow," proceeded Master George, without heeding his friend's state of abstraction, "shows, with great liveliness of colouring, how our Scotch pride and poverty make liars and braggarts of us; and yet the knave, whose every third word to an Englishman is a boastful lie, will, I warrant you, be a true and tender friend and follower to his master, and has perhaps parted with his mantle to him in the cold blast, although he himself walked in cuerpo, as the Don says.—Strange! that courage and fidelity—for I will warrant that the knave is stout—should have no better companion than this swaggering braggadocio humour.—But you mark me not, friend Davie."

"I do—I do, most heedfully," said Davie.—"For, as the sun goeth round the dial-plate in twenty-four hours, add, for the moon, fifty minutes and a half"—

"You are in the seventh heavens, man," said his companion.

"I crave your pardon," replied Davie.—"Let the wheel A go round in twenty-four hours—I have it—and the wheel B in twenty-four hours, fifty minutes and a half—fifty-seven being to fifty-four, as fifty-nine to twenty-four hours, fifty minutes and a half, or very nearly,—I crave your forgiveness, Master George, and heartily wish you good-even."

"Good-even?" said Master George; "why, you have not wished me good-day yet. Come, old friend, lay by these tablets, or you will crack the inner machinery of your skull, as our friend yonder has got the outer-case of his damaged.—Good-night, quotha! I mean not to part with you so easily. I came to get my four hours' nunchion from you, man, besides a tune on the lute from my god-daughter, Mrs. Marget."

"Good faith! I was abstracted, Master George—but you know me. Whenever I get amongst the wheels," said Mr. Ramsay, "why, 'tis"— "Lucky that you deal in small ones," said his friend; as, awakened from his reveries and calculations, Ramsay led the way up a little back-stair to the first story, occupied by his daughter, and his little household.

The apprentices resumed their places in the front-shop, and relieved Sam Porter; when Jenkin said to Tunstall—"Didst see, Frank, how the old goldsmith cottoned in with his beggarly countryman? When would one of his wealth have shaken hands so courteously with a poor Englishman?—Well, I'll say that for the best of the Scots, that they will go over head and ears to serve a countryman, when they will not wet a nail of their finger to save a Southron, as they call us, from drowning. And yet Master George is but half-bred Scot neither in that respect; for I have known him do many a kind thing to the English too."

"But hark ye, Jenkin," said Tunstall, "I think you are but half-bred English yourself. How came you to strike on the Scotsman's side after all?"

"Why, you did so, too," answered Vincent.

"Ay, because I saw you begin; and, besides, it is no Cumberland fashion to fall fifty upon one," replied Tunstall.

"And no Christ-Church fashion neither," said Jenkin. "Fair play and Old England for ever!—Besides, to tell you a secret, his voice had a twang in it—in the dialect I mean—reminded me of a little tongue, which I think sweeter—sweeter than the last toll of St. Dunstan's will sound, on the day that us English folks; and this good gentleman goes as often down by water to Greenwich, and employs as many of the barge-men and water-men of all kinds; and maintains, in his royal grace, John Taylor the water poet, who keeps both a sculler and a pair of oars. And he has made a comely court at Whitehall, just by the river; and since the King is so good a friend to the Thames, I cannot see, if it please your honour, why all his subjects, and your honour in specialty, should not have satisfaction by his hands."

"True, dame—true—let us hope for the best; but I must take my cloak and rapier, and pray your husband in courtesy to teach me the way to a magistrate."

"Sure, sir," said the prompt dame, "I can do that as well as he, who has been a slow man of his tongue all his life, though I will give him his due for being a loving husband, and a man as well to pass in the world as any betwixt us and the top of the lane. And so there is the sitting alderman, that is always at the Guildhall, which is close by Paul's, and so I warrant you he puts all to rights in the city that wisdom can mend; and for the rest there is no help but patience. But I wish I were as sure of forty pounds, as I am that the young man will come back safe and sound."

Olifaunt, in great and anxious doubt of what the good dame so strongly averred, flung his cloak on one shoulder, and was about to belt on his rapier, when first the voice of Richie Moniplies on the stair, and then that faithful emissary's appearance in the chamber, put the matter beyond question. Dame Nelly, after congratulating Moniplies on his return, and paying several compliments to her own sagacity for having foretold it, was at length pleased to leave the apartment. The truth was, that, besides some instinctive feelings of good breeding which combated her curiosity, she saw there was no chance of Richie's proceeding in his narrative while she was in the room, and she therefore retreated, trusting that her own address would get the secret out of one or other of the young men, when she should have either by himself.

"Now, in Heaven's name, what is the matter?" said Nigel Olifaunt.—"Where have you been, or what have you been about? You look as pale as death. There is blood on your hand, and your clothes are torn. What barns-breaking have you been at? You have been drunk, Richard, and fighting."

"Fighting I have been," said Richard, "in a small way; but for being drunk, that's a job ill to manage in this town, without money to come by liquor; and as for barns-breaking, the deil a thing's broken but my head. It's not made of iron, I wot, nor my claithees of chenzie-mail; so a club smashed the tane, and a claught damaged the tither. Some misleard rascals abused my country, but I think I cleared the causey of them. However, the hail hive was ower mony for me at last, and I got this eclipse on the crown, and then I was carried beyond my kenning, to a sina' booth at the Temple-Port, where they sell the whirligigs and mony-go-rounds that measure out time as a man wad measure a tartan web; and then they bled me, wold I hold I, and were reasonably civil, especially an auld countryman of ours, of whom more hereafter."

"And at what o'clock might this be?" said Nigel.

"The twa iron carles yonder, at the kirk beside the Port, were just banging out sax o' the clock."

"And why came you not home as soon as you recovered?" said Nigel.

"In troth, my lord, every why has its wherefore, and this has a gude one," answered his follower.

"To come hame, I behoved to ken whare hame was; now, I had clean tint the name of the wynd, and the mair I asked, the mair the folk lenth, and the farther they sent me wrang; sax I gave it up till God should send daylight to help me; and as I saw myseel near a kirk at the lang run, I e'en crap in to take up my night's quarters in the kirk-yard."

"In the church-yard?" said Nigel—"But I need not ask what drove you to such a pinch."

"It wasna sax much the want o' eiller, my Lord Nigel," said Richie, with an air of mysterious importance. "for I was no sax absolute without means, whilk mair anon; but I thought I wad never ware saxpence sterling on ane of their saucy chamberlain at a hostelry, sax lang as I could sleep fresh and fit in a fair, dry, spring night. Mony a time when hae come hame ower late, and faund the West-Port steekit, and the waiter ill-willy, I have garr'd the sexton of St. Cuthbert's call-ward serve me for a quarters. But then there are dainty green grasses St. Cuthbert's kirk-yard, where ane may sleep; if they were in a down-bed, till they hear the lavro singing up in the air as high as the Castle; whare and behold these London kirk-yards are causen with through-stanes, panged hard and fast thegither, and my cloak being something thread-bare, na but a thin mattress, so I was fain to give up my back before every limb about me was crippled. Dead folk may sleep yonder sound enow, but deil haet else."

"And what became of you next?" said his master.

"I jist took to a canny bulk-head, as they ca' them here; that is, the boards on the tap of their butt outshots of stalls and booths, and there I slept; sound as if I was in a castle. Not but I was disturbed with some of the night-walking queans and swaggering billies, but when they found there was nothing to be got by me but a slash of my Andre Ferrara, they bid me good-night for a beggarly sax, and I was e'en weel pleased to be sax cheap rid of them. And in the morning, I cam daikering back but sad wark I had to find the way, for I had been east as far as the place they ca' Mile-End, though it is mair like sax-mile-end."

"Well, Richie," answered Nigel, "I am glad this has ended so well—go get something to eat. I am sure you need it."

"In troth do I, sir," replied Moniplies; "but, wi' your lordship's leave"—

"Forget the lordship for the present, Richie, as I have often told you before."

"Faith," replied Richie, "I could weel forget the your honour was a lord, but then I behoved to forget that I am a lord's man, and that's not so easy. But however," he added, assisting his description with the thumb and the two forefingers of his right hand thrust out after the fashion of a bird's claw, while his little finger and ring-finger were closed upon his palm, "to the Court I went, and my friend that promised me a sight of his Majesty's most gracious presence, was as gude as his word, and carried me to the back offices, where I got the best breakfast I had since we came here, and it did me gude for the rest of the day; for as to what I have eaten in this accursed town, it is aye sauced with the disquiet thought that it mair be paid for. After a', there was but beef bones and fat brose; but king's cauff, your honour kens, is better than ither folk's corn; in any rate, it was a' in free awmous.—But I see," he added, stopping short, "that your honour waxes impatient."

"By no means, Richie," said the young nobleman with an air of resignation, for he well knew his domestic would not mend his pace for goading; "you have suffered enough in the embassy to have a right to tell the story in your own way. Only let me put for the name of the friend who was to introduce you into the King's presence. You were very mysterious on the subject, when you undertook, through his means, to have the Supplication put into his Majesty's own hands, since those sent heretofore, I have ever reason to think, went no farther than his secretary's."

"Weel, my lord," said Richie, "I did not tell your name and quality at first, because I thought it would be affronted at the like o' him having to do your lordship's affairs. But mony a man climbs in court by waur help. It was just Laurie Linklater, one of the yeomen of the kitchen, that was my father's apprentice lang syne."

"A yeoman of the kitchen—a scullion!" exclaimed Lord Nigel, pacing the room in displeasure.

"But, consider, sir," said Richie, composedly, "that your great friends hung back, and shunned to see you, or to advocate your petition; and then, though I am sure I wish Laurie a higher office, for your last sake and for mine, and specially for his ain being a friendly lad, yet your lordship must con- sider that a scullion, if a yeoman of the King's most kitchen may be called a scullion, may weel rank master-cook elsewhere; being that king's s I said before, is better than"—

"You are right, and I was wrong," said the young man. "I have no choice of means of making me known, so that they be honest."

"Richie is as honest a lad as ever lifted a ladle," said the young man; "not but what I dare to say he can lick his fingers like other folk, and reason good. But, in my opinion, I see your honour is waxing impatient, he has sent me to the palace, where he was astir for the morning out to hunt or hawk on Blackheath, I have heard he has done it. And there was a horse stood with the quarries about it, a bonny gray as ever was seen, and the saddle and the stirrups, and the curb, and the burning gowd, or silver gilded at least; when, sir, came the King, with all his nobles, and out in his hunting-suit of green, doubly laced, and down with gowd. I minded the very face of the king, though it was lang since I saw him. But my mind, I thought I, times are changed since ye came down the backstairs of auld Holyrood-House, fear, having your breeks in your hand without you put them on, and Frank Stewart, the wild Bothwell, hard at your haunches; and if auld Glenvarloch hadna cast his mantle about his back, and taken bluidy wounds mair than ane in your back, you wald not have craw'd sae crouse this day; saying, I could not but think your lordship's position could not be less than most acceptable; I banged in among the crowd of lords. Laurie took me mad, and held me by the cloak-lap till he was raving in his hand; and so I banged in right at the King just as he mounted, and crammed the hilt into his hand, and he opened it like in my face; and just as he saw the first line, I was minded to make a reverence, and I had the ill luck to hit the nose of a beast on the nose with my hat, and scurried away, and she swarved aside, and the King, looking at me, was na mickle better than a draff-pock on the wall. He was like to have gotten a clean coup, and that would have cost my craig a raxing—and he flung the paper amang the beast's feet, and cried, 'Woe to the fause loon that brought it! And they took me, and cried Treason; and I thought of the consequences that were dirked in their ain house, for, it was, as small a forfeit. However, they spak only of urging me, and had me away to the porter's lodge to try the tawse on my back, and I was crying as loud as I could; and the King, when he had finished himself on the saddle, and gathered his breath, would do me nae harm; for, said he, he is ane of our orland stots, I ken by the rowt of him,—and he laughed and rowted loud enough. And then he gave him a copy of the Proclamation, and let him go down to the North by the next light collier, and waur come o't. So they let me go, and rode on, sniggering, laughing, and rounding in ilk other's arms. A sair life I had wi' Laurie Linklater; for he was the ruin of him. And then, when I told him I was in your matter, he said if he had known he would have risked a scauding for you, he minded the brave old Lord, your father. And he showed how I sould have done,—and that I have held up my hand to my brow, as if the curse of the King and his horse-graith thegither hadn't stent the glaiks in my een, and mair jackanape I sould hae played, instead of offering the Sifflican, he said, as if I had been bringing guts to a table."

"For," said he, "Richie, the King is a weel-learned and just man of his ain kindly nature, but he has been maggoted that maun be cannily guided; and then Richie," says he, in a very laigh tone, "I would tell it to nane but a wise man like yourself, but the King has them about him wad corrupt an angel from heaven; but I could have gien you avisement how to have guided him, but now it's like after meat and mustard."—"Aweel, aweel, Laurie," said I, "it may be as you say: but since I am clear of the tawse and the porter's lodge, sifflicate wha like, deil hae Richie Moniplies if he come sifflicating here again."—And so away I came, and I wasna far by the Temple Port, or Bar, or whatever they ca' it, when I met with the misadventure that I tauld you of before."

"Well, my honest Richie," said Lord Nigel, "your attempt was well meant, and not so ill conducted, I think, as to have deserved so bad an issue; but go to your beef and mustard, and we'll talk of the rest afterwards."

"There is nae mair to be spoken, sir," said his follower, "except that I met ane very honest, fair-spoken, weel-put-on gentleman, or rather burgher, as I think, that was in the whigmaleery man's backshop; and when he learned wha I was, behold he was a kindly Scot himsell, and, what is more, a town's-bairn o' the gude town, and he behoved to compel me to take this Portugal piece, to drink, forsooth—my certie, thought I, we ken better, for we will eat it—and he spoke of paying your lordship a visit."

"You did not tell him where I lived, you knave?" said the Lord Nigel, angrily. "'Sdeath! I shall have every clownish burgher from Edinburgh come to gaze on my distress, and pay a shilling for having seen the Motion of the poor Noble!"

"Tell him where you lived?" said Richie, evading the question; "How could I tell him what I kendna myself? If I had minded the name of the wynd, I need not have slept in the kirkyard yestreen."

"See, then, that you give no one notice of our lodging," said the young nobleman; "those with whom I have business I can meet at Paul's, or in the Court of Requests."

"This is steeking the stable-door when the steed is stolen," thought Richie to himself; "but I must put him on another pin."

So thinking, he asked the young lord what was in the Proclamation which he still held folded in his hand; "for, having little time to spell at it," said he, "your lordship well knows I ken nought about it but the grand blazon at the top—the lion has gotten a clought of our old Scottish shield now, but it was as weel upheld when it had a unicorn on ilk side of it."

Lord Nigel read the Proclamation, and he coloured deep with shame and indignation as he read; for the purport was, to his injured feelings, like the pouring of ardent spirits upon a recent wound.

"What deil's in the paper, my lord?" said Richie, unable to suppress his curiosity as he observed his master change colour; "I wadna ask such a thing, only the Proclamation is not a private thing, but is meant for a' men's hearing."

"It is indeed meant for all men's hearing," replied Lord Nigel, "and it proclaims the shame of our country, and the ingratitude of our Prince."

"Now the Lord preserve us! and to publish it in London, too!" ejaculated Moniplies.

"Hark ye, Richard," said Nigel Olifaunt, "in this paper the Lords of the Council set forth, that, 'in consideration of the resort of idle persons of low condition forth from his Majesty's kingdom of Scotland to his English Court—filling the same with their suits and supplications, and dishonouring the royal presence with their base, poor, and beggarly persons, to the disgrace of their country in the estimation of the English; these are to prohibit the skippers, masters of vessels, and others, in every part of Scotland, from bringing such miserable creatures up to Court, under pain of fine and imprisonment.'"

"I marle the skipper took us on board," said Richie. "Then you need not marvel how you are to get back again," said Lord Nigel, "for here is a clause which says, that such idle suitors are to be transported back to Scotland at his Majesty's expense, and punished for their audacity with stripes, stocking, or incarceration, according to their demerits—that is to say, I suppose, as a sure mode to the king's favour, to praise the of the royal palfrey."

pose, according to the degree of their poverty, for I see no other demerit specified."

"This will scarcely," said Richie, "square with our old proverb—

'A King's face
Should give grace'—

But what says the paper farther, my lord?"

"O, only a small clause which especially concerns us, making some still heavier denunciations against those suitors who shall be so bold as to approach the Court, under pretext of seeking payment of old debts due to them by the King, which, the paper states, is of all species of importunity, that which is most odious to his Majesty."*

"The King has neighbours in that matter," said Richie; "but it is not every one that can shift off that sort of cattle so easily as he does."

Their conversation was here interrupted by a knocking at the door. Olifaunt looked out at the window, and saw an elderly respectable person whom he knew not. Richie also peeped, and recognised, but, recognising, chose not to acknowledge, his friend of the preceding evening. Afraid that his share in the visit might be detected, he made his escape out of the apartment under pretext of going to his breakfast; and left their landlady the task of ushering Master George into Lord Nigel's apartment, which she performed with much courtesy.

CHAPTER IV.

AY, sir, the clouted shoe hath oftentimes craft in't,
As says the rustic proverb; and your citizen,
In his program suit, gold chain, and well-black'd shoes,
Bears under his flat cap oftentimes a brain
Wiser than burns beneath the cap and feather,
Or scotches within the statesman's velvet nightcap.

Read me my Riddle.

THE young Scottish nobleman received the citizen with distant politeness, expressing that sort of reserve by which those of the higher ranks are sometimes willing to make a plebeian sensible that he is an intruder. But Master George seemed neither displeased nor disconcerted. He assumed the chair, which, in deference to his respectable appearance, Lord Nigel offered to him, and said, after a moment's pause, during which he had looked attentively at the young man, with respect not unmingled with emotion—"You will forgive me for this rudeness, my lord; but I was endeavouring to trace in your youthful countenance the features of my good old lord, your excellent father."

There was a moment's pause ere young Glenvarloch replied, still with a reserved manner,—“I have been reckoned like my father, sir; and am happy to see any one that respects his memory. But the business which calls me to this city is of a hasty as well as a private nature, and”——

"I understand the hint, my lord," said Master George, "and would not be guilty of long detaining you from business, or more agreeable conversation. My errand is almost done when I have said, that my name is George Heriot, warmly befriended, and introduced into the employment of the Royal Family of Scotland, more than twenty years since, by your excellent father; and that, learning from a follower of

* The English agreed in nothing more unanimously than in censuring James on account of the beggarly rabble which not only attended the King at his coming first out of Scotland, "but," says Osborne, "which, through his whole reign, like a fluent spring, were found still crossing the Tweed." Yet it is certain, from the number of proclamations published by the Privy Council in Scotland, and bearing marks of the King's own diction, that he was sensible of the whole inconveniences and unpopularity attending the importunate crowd of disrespectable suitors, and as desirous to get rid of them as his Southern subjects could be. But it was in vain that his Majesty argued with his Scottish subjects on the disrespect they were bringing on their native country and sovereign, by causing the English to suppose there were no well-nurtured or independent gentry in Scotland, they who presented themselves being, in the opinion and conceit of all beholders, "but idle rascals, and poor miserable bodies."—It was even in vain that the vessels which brought up this unwelcome cargo of petitioners were threatened with fine and confiscation: the undaunted suitors continued to press forward, and, as one of the proclamations says, many of them under pretence of requiring payment of "auld debts due to them by the King," which, it is observed with great nature, "is, of all kinds of importunity, most displeasing to his Majesty." The expressions in the text are selected from these curious proclamations.

yours that your lordship was in this city in pursuit of some business of importance, it is my duty it is my pleasure,—to wait on the son of my remempatron; and, as I am somewhat known both at court and in the city, to offer him such aid and furthering of his affairs, as my credit and experience may be able to afford."

"I have no doubt of either. Master Heriot, Lord Nigel, "and I thank you heartily, for the will with which you have placed them at a strange disposal; but my business at court is done and I intend to leave London, and, indeed, to add, for foreign travel and military service. add, that the suddenness of my departure occupies my having little time at my disposal."

Master Heriot did not take the hint, but with an embarrassed countenance, however, he who had something to say that he knew not how to make effectual. At length he said, with a dubious smile, "You are fortunate, my lord, being so soon despatched your business at court. Your talking landlady informs me you have but a fortnight in this city. It is usually many years ere the Court and a suitor shake hands part."

"My business," said Lord Nigel, with a look which was intended to stop farther discussion, summarily despatched."

Still Master Heriot remained seated, and with a cordial good-humour added to the rest of his appearance, which rendered it impossible for Lord Nigel to be more explicit in requesting his sence.

"Your lordship has not yet had time," said the citizen, still attempting to sustain the conversation "to visit the places of amusement,—the play-house and other places to which youth resort. But I have your lordship's hand one of the new-invented pieces of the piece,† which they hand about of late—I ask what play?"

"Oh! a well-known piece," said Lord Nigel, patiently throwing down the Proclamation, which had hitherto been twisting to and fro in his hand, "an excellent and well-approved piece—'A Way to Pay Old Debts.'"

Master Heriot stooped down, saying, "Ah old acquaintance, Philip Massinger;" but, having opened the paper and seen the purport, he looked at Lord Nigel with surprise, saying, "I trust your lordship does not think this prohibition can extend to your person or your claims?"

"I should scarce have thought so myself," said the young nobleman; "but so it proves. His Majesty, to close this discourse at once, has been pleased to send me this Proclamation, in answer to my respectful Supplication for the repayment of large sums advanced by my father for the service of the state in the King's utmost emergencies."

"It is impossible!" said the citizen—"it is utterly impossible!—If the King could forget what was due to your father's memory, still he would have wished—would not, I may say, have dared be so flagrantly unjust to the memory of such a man as your father, who, dead in the body, will live in the memory of the Scottish people."

"I should have been of your opinion," answered Lord Nigel, in the same tone as before; "but I am not fighting with facts."

"What was the tenor of this Supplication?" asked Heriot; "or by whom was it presented? Is there anything strange there must have been in the case or else?"

"You may see my original draught," said the young lord, taking it out of a small travelling strongbox, "the technical part is by my lawyer in Scotland, a skilful and sensible man; the rest is my own, and I hope, with due deference and modesty."

Master Heriot hastily cast his eye over the draught. "Nothing," he said, "can be more well-tempered and respectful. Is it possible the King can treat this petition with contempt?"

"He threw it down on the pavement," said Lord of Glenvarloch, "and sent me for answers."

† Meaning, probably, playbills.

Proclamation, in which he classes me with the paupers and mendicants from Scotland, who disgrace his court in the eyes of the proud English—that is all. Had not my father stood by him with heart, sword, and fortune, he might never have seen the Court of England himself."

"But by whom was this supplication presented, my lord?" said Heriot; "for the distaste taken at the messenger will sometimes extend itself to the message."

"By my servant," said the Lord Nigel; "by the man you saw, and, I think, were kind to."

"By your servant, my lord?" said the citizen; "he seems a shrewd fellow, and doubtless a faithful; but surely"—

"You would say," said Lord Nigel, "he is no fit messenger to a King's presence?—Surely he is not; but what could I do? Every attempt I had made to lay my case before the King had miscarried, and my petitions got no farther than the budgets of clerks and secretaries; this fellow pretended he had a friend in the household that would bring him to the King's presence,—and so"— "I understand," said Heriot; "but, my lord, why should you not, in right of your rank and birth, have appeared at court, and required an audience, which could not have been denied to you?"

The young lord blushed a little, and looked at his dress, which was very plain; and, though in perfect good order, had the appearance of having seen service.

"I know not why I should be ashamed of speaking the truth," he said, after a momentary hesitation,—“I had no dress suitable for appearing at court. I am determined to incur no expenses which I cannot discharge; and I think you, sir, would not advise me to stand at the palace-door, in person, and deliver my petition, along with those who are in very deed pleading their necessity, and begging an alms."

"That had been, indeed, unseemly," said the citizen; "but yet, my lord, my mind runs strangely that there must be some mistake.—Can I speak with your domestic?"

"I see little good it can do," answered the young lord, "but the interest you take in my misfortunes seems sincere, and therefore"—He stamped on the floor, and in a few seconds afterwards Moniplies appeared, wiping from his beard and mustaches the crumbs of bread, and the froth of the ale-pot, which plainly showed how he had been employed.—“Will your lordship grant permission," said Heriot, "that I ask your groom a few questions?"

"His lordship's page, Master George," answered Moniplies, with a nod of acknowledgment, "if you are minded to speak according to the letter."

"Hold your saucy tongue," said his master, "and reply distinctly to the questions you are to be asked."

"And truly, if it like your pageship," said the citizen, "for you may remember I have a gift to discover falset."

"Weel, weel, weel," replied the domestic, somewhat embarrassed, in spite of his effrontery—"though I think that the sort of truth that serves my master, may weel serve any else."

"Pages lie to their masters by right of custom," said the citizen; "and you write yourself in that band, though I think you be among the oldest of such springalds; but to me you must speak truth, if you would not have it end in the whipping-post."

"And that's e'en a bad resting-place," said the well-grown page; "so come away with your questions, Master George."

"Well, then," demanded the citizen, "I am given to understand that you yesterday presented to his Majesty's hand a supplication, or petition, from this honourable lord, your master."

"Troth, there's nae gainsaying that, sir," replied Moniplies; "there were enow to see it besides me."

"And you pretend that his Majesty flung it from him with contempt?" said the citizen. "Take heed, for I have means of knowing the truth; and you were better up to the neck in the Nor-Loch, which you like so well, than tell a leasing where his Majesty's name is concerned."

"There is nae occasion for leasing-making about the matter," answered Moniplies, firmly; "his Majesty e'en flung it frae him as if it had dirtied his fingers."

"You hear, sir," said Olifaunt, addressing Heriot.

"Hush!" said the sagacious citizen; "this fellow is not ill named—he has more plies than one in his cloak.—Stay, fellow," for Moniplies, muttering somewhat about finishing his breakfast, was beginning to shamle towards the door, "answer me this farther question—When you gave your master's petition to his Majesty, gave you nothing with it?"

"Ou, what should I give wi' it, ye ken, Master George?"

"That is what I desire and insist to know," replied his interrogator.

"Weel, then—I am not free to say, that maybe I might not just slip into the King's hand a wee bit siffication of mine ain, along with my lord's—just to save his Majesty trouble—and that he might consider them baith at ance."

"A supplication of your own, you varlet!" said his master.

"Ou dear, ay, my lord," said Richie—"puir bodies hae their bits of siffications as weel as their betters."

"And pray, what might your worshipful petition import?" said Master Heriot.—“Nay, for Heaven's sake, my lord, keep your patience, or we shall never learn the truth of this strange matter.—Speak out, sirrah, and I will stand your friend with my lord."

"It's a lang story to tell—but the upshot is, that it's a scrape of an auld accmpt due to my father's yestate by her Majesty the King's maist gracious mother, when she lived in the Castle, and had sundry providings and furnishings forth of our booth, whilk nae doubt was an honour to my father to supply, and whilk, doubtless, it will be a credit to his Majesty to satisfy, as it will be grit convenience to me to receive the saam."

"What string of impertinence is this?" said his master.

"Every word as true as e'er John Knox spoke," said Richie; "here's the bit double of the siffication."

Master George took a crumpled paper from the fellow's hand, and said, muttering betwixt his teeth—"Hambly showeth—um—um—his Majesty's maist gracious mother—um—um—justly addebt and owing the sum of fifteen merks—the compt whereof followeth—Twelve nowte's feet for jellies—an' a lamb, being Christmas—an' roasted capin in grease for the privy chalmers, when my Lord of Bothwell suppit with her Grace.—I think, my lord, you can hardly be surprised that the King gave this petition a brisk reception; and I conclude, Master Page, that you took care to present your own supplication before your master's?"

"Troth did I not," answered Moniplies, "I thought to have given my lord's first, as was reason gude; and besides that, it wad have redd the gate for my ain little bill. But what wi' the dirdum an' confusion, an' the loupin here and there of the skeigh brute of a horse, I believe I crammed them baith into his hand cheek-by-jowl, and maybe my ain was bune-most; and say there was aught wrang, I am sure I had a' the fright and a' the risk"—

"And shall have all the beating, you rascal knave," said Nigel; "am I to be insulted and dishonoured by your pragmatistical insolence, in blending your base concerns with mine?"

"Nay, nay, nay, my lord," said the good-humoured citizen, interposing, "I have been the means of bringing the fellow's blunder to light—allow me interest enough with your lordship to be bail for his bones. You have cause to be angry, but still I think the knave mistook more out of conceit than of purpose; and I judge you will have the better service of him another time, if you overlook this fault—Get you gone, sirrah—I'll make your peace."

"Na, na," said Moniplies, keeping his ground firmly, "if he likes to strike a lad that has followed him for pure love, for I think there has been little servant's fee between us, a' the way frae Scotland, just let my lord be doing, and see the credit he will get by it—and I would rather (mony thanks to you though, Master George) stand by a lick of his baton, than it suld e'er be said a stranger came between us."

"Go, then," said his master, "and get out of my sight."

"Aweel I wot that is sune done," said Moniplies, retiring slowly; "I did not come without I had been ca'd for—and I wad have been away half an hour since with my gude will, only Maister George keepit me to answer his interrogation, forsooth, and that has made a' this stir."

And so he made his grumbling exit, with the tone much rather of one who has sustained an injury, than who has done wrong.

"There never was a man so plagued as I am with a malapert knave!—The fellow is shrewd, and I have found him faithful—I believe he loves me, too, and he has given proofs of it—but then he is so uplifted in his own conceit, so self-willed, and so self-opinioned, that he seems to become the master and I the man; and whatever blunder he commits, he is sure to make as loud complaints, as if the whole error lay with me, and in no degree with himself."

"Cherish him, and maintain him, nevertheless," said the citizen; "for believe my gray hairs, that affection and fidelity are now rarer qualities in a servitor, than when the world was younger. Yet, trust him, my good lord, with no commission above his birth or breeding, for you see yourself how it may chance to fall."

"It is but too evident, Master Heriot," said the young nobleman; "and I am sorry I have done injustice to my sovereign, and your master. But I am, like a true Scotsman, wise behind hand—the mistake has happened—my Supplication has been refused, and my only resource is to employ the rest of my means to carry Moniplies and myself to some counterscarp, and die in the battle-front like my ancestors."

"It were better to live and serve your country like your noble father, my lord," replied Master George.

"Nay, nay, never look down or shake your head—the King has not refused your Supplication, for he has not seen it—you ask but justice, and that his place obliges him to give to his subjects—ay, my lord, and I will say that his natural temper doth in this hold bias with his duty."

"I were well pleased to think so, and yet"—said Nigel Olifaunt,—"I speak not of my own wrongs, but my country hath many that are undressed."

"My lord," said Master Heriot, "I speak of my royal master, not only with the respect due from a subject—the gratitude to be paid by a favoured servant, but also with the frankness of a free and loyal Scotsman. The King is himself well disposed to hold the scales of justice even; but there are those around him who can throw without detection their own selfish wishes and base interests into the scale. You are already a sufferer by this, and without your knowing it."

"I am surprised, Master Heriot," said the young lord, "to hear you, upon so short an acquaintance, talk as if you were familiarly acquainted with my affairs."

"My lord," replied the goldsmith, "the nature of my employment affords me direct access to the interior of the palace; I am well known to be no meddler in intrigues or party affairs, so that no favourite has as yet endeavoured to shut against me the door of the royal closet; on the contrary, I have stood well with each while he was in power, and I have not shared the fall of any. But I cannot be thus connected with the Court, without hearing, even against my will, what wheels are in motion, and how they are checked or forwarded. Of course, when I choose to seek such intelligence, I know the sources in which it is to be traced. I have told you why I was interested in your lordship's fortunes. It was last night only that I knew you were in this city, yet I have been able, in coming hither this morning, to gain for you some information respecting the impediments to your suit."

"Sir, I am obliged by your zeal, however little it may be merited," answered Nigel, still with some reserve; "yet I hardly know how I have deserved this interest."

"First let me satisfy you that it is real," said the citizen; "I blame you not for being unwilling to credit the fair professions of a stranger in my inferior class of society, when you have met so little friendship from relations, and those of your own rank, bound to have assisted you by so many ties. But mark the cause. There is a mortgage over your father's extensive estate, to the amount of 40,000 merks due ostensibly to Peregrine Peterson, the Conservator of Scottish Privileges at Campvere."

"I know nothing of a mortgage," said the young lord; "but there is a wadset for such a sum, which, if unredeemed, will occasion the forfeiture of my whole paternal estate, for a sum not above a fourth of its value—and it is for that very reason that I press the King's government for a settlement of the debts due to my father, that I may be able to redeem my land from this rapacious creditor."

"A wadset in Scotland," said Heriot, "is the same with a mortgage on this side of the Tweed; but you are not acquainted with your real creditor. The Conservator Peterson only lends his name to shroud no less a man than the Lord Chancellor of Scotland, who hopes, under cover of this debt, to gain possession of the estate himself, or perhaps to gratify a yet more powerful third party. He will probably suffer his creature Peterson to take possession, and when the odium of the transaction shall be forgotten, the property and lordship of Glenvarloch will be conveyed to the great man by his obsequious instrument, under cover of a sale, or some similar device."

"Can this be possible?" said Lord Nigel; "the Chancellor wept when I took leave of him—called me his cousin—even his son—furnished me with letters, and, though I asked him for no pecuniary assistance, excused himself unnecessarily for not pressing it on me, alleging the expenses of his rank and his large family. No, I cannot believe a nobleman would carry deceit so far."

"I am not, it is true, of noble blood," said the citizen; "but once more I bid you look on my gray hairs, and think what can be my interest in dishonouring them with falsehood in affairs in which I have no interest, save as they regard the son of my benefactor. Reflect also, have you had any advantage from the Lord Chancellor's letters?"

"None," said Nigel Olifaunt, "except cold deeds and fair words. I have thought, for some time, that my only object was to get rid of me—one yesterday pressed money on me when I talked of going abroad, in order that I might not want the means of exiling myself."

"Right," said Heriot; "rather than you fled not they would themselves furnish wings for you to fly withal."

"I will to him this instant," said the incensed youth, "and tell him my mind of his baseness."

"Under your favour," said Heriot, detaining him, "you shall not do so. By a quarrel you would become the ruin of me your informer; and though I would venture half my shop to do your lordship a service, I think you would hardly wish me to come by damage when it can be of no service to you."

The word shop sounded harshly in the ear of the young nobleman, who replied hastily—"Damage, sir!—so far am I from wishing you to incur damage, that I would to Heaven you would cease your fruitless offers of serving one whom there is no chance of ultimately assisting!"

"Leave me alone for that," said the citizen; "you have now erred as far on the bow-hand. Permit me to take this Supplication—I will have it suitably engrossed, and take my own time (and it shall be an early one) for placing it, with more prudence, I trust, than that used by your follower, in the king's hand—I will almost answer for his taking up the matter as you would have him—but should he fail to do so, even then I will not give up the good cause."

"Sir," said the young nobleman, "your speech is so friendly, and my own state so helpless, that I know not how to refuse your kind proffer, even while I blush to accept it at the hands of a stranger."

your trade, Andrew—they that do not mind corn-pickles, never come to forpits. I have known a learned man write a thousand pages with one quill.”*

“Ah! sir,” said the lad, who listened to the goldsmith, though instructing him in his own trade, with an air of veneration and acquiescence, “how sune ony pur creature like mysell may rise in the world, wi’ the instruction of such a man as your worship!”

“My instructions are few, Andrew, soon told, and not hard to practise. Be honest—be industrious—be frugal—and you will soon win wealth and worship.—Here, copy me this Supplication in your best and most formal hand. I will wait by you till it is done.”

The youth lifted not his eye from the paper, and laid not the pen from his hand, until the task was finished to his employer’s satisfaction. The citizen then gave the young scrivener an angel; and bidding him, on his life, be secret in all business intrusted to him, again mounted his mule, and rode on westward along the Strand.

It may be worth while to remind our readers, that the Temple-Bar which Heriot passed, was not the arched screen, or gateway, of the present day; but an open railing, or palisade, which, at night, and in times of alarm, was closed with a barricade of posts and chains. The Strand also, along which he rode, was not as now, a continued street although it was beginning already to assume that character. It still might be considered as an open road, along the south side of which stood various houses and hotels belonging to the nobility, having gardens behind them down to the water-side, with stairs to the river, for the convenience of taking boat; which mansions have bequeathed the names of their lordly owners to many of the streets leading from the Strand to the Thames. The north side of the Strand was also a long line of houses, behind which, as in Saint Martin’s Lane, and other points, buildings were rapidly arising; but Covent-Garden was still a garden, in the literal sense of the word, or at least but beginning to be studded with irregular buildings. All that was passing around, however, marked the rapid increase of a capital which had long enjoyed peace, wealth, and a regular government. Houses were rising in every direction; and the shrewd eye of our citizen already saw the period not distant, which should convert the nearly open highway on which he travelled, into a connected and regular street, uniting the court and the town with the city of London.

He next passed Charing-Cross, which was no longer the pleasant solitary village at which the judges were wont to breakfast on their way to Westminster Hall, but began to resemble the artery through which, to use Johnson’s expression, “pours the full tide of London population.” The buildings were rapidly increasing, yet certainly gave not even a faint idea of its present appearance.

At last Whitehall received our traveller, who passed under one of the beautiful gates designed by Holbein, and composed of tessellated brick-work, being the same to which Moniplies had profanely likened the West-Port of Edinburgh, and entered the ample precincts of the palace of Whitehall, now full of all the confusion attending improvement.

It was just at the time when James,—little suspecting that he was employed in constructing a palace, from the window of which his only son was to pass in order that he might die upon a scaffold before it,—was busied in removing the ancient and ruinous buildings of De Burgh, Henry VIII., and Queen Elizabeth, to make way for the superb architecture on which Inigo Jones exerted all his genius. The King, ignorant of futurity, was now engaged in pressing on his work; and, for that purpose, still maintained his royal apartments at Whitehall, amidst the rubbish of old buildings, and the various confusion attending the erection of the new pile, which formed at present a labyrinth not easily traversed.

The goldsmith to the Royal Household, and who, if fame spoke true, oftentimes acted as their banker,—for these professions were not as yet separated from each other,—was a person of too much importance to receive the slightest interruption from sentinel or porter; and, leaving his mule and two of his followers in the outer-court, he gently knocked at a postern-gate of the building, and was presently admitted, while the most trusty of his attendants followed him closely, with the piece of plate under his arm. This man also he left behind him in an ante-room,—where three or four pages in the royal livery, but untrussed, unbuttoned, and dressed more carelessly than the place, and nearness to a King’s person, seemed to admit, were playing at dice and draughts, or stretched upon benches, and slumbering with half-shut eyes. A corresponding gallery, which opened from the anteroom, was occupied by two gentlemen-ushers of the chamber, who gave each a smile of recognition as the wealthy goldsmith entered.

No word was spoken on either side; but one of the ushers looked first to Heriot, and then to a little door half-covered by the tapestry, which seemed to say, as plain as a look could, “Lies your business that way?” The citizen nodded; and the court-attendant, moving on tiptoe, and with as much caution as if the floor had been paved with eggs, advanced to the door, opened it gently, and spoke a few words in a low tone. The broad Scottish accent of King James was heard in reply,—“Admit him instanter, Maxwell. Have you hairboured sae lang at the Court, and not learned, that gold and silver are ever welcome?”

The usher signed to Heriot to advance, and the honest citizen was presently introduced into the cabinet of the Sovereign.

The scene of confusion amid which he found the King seated, was no bad picture of the state and quality of James’s own mind. There was much that was rich and costly in cabinet pictures and valuable ornaments; but they were arranged in a slovenly manner, covered with dust, and lost half their value, or at least their effect, from the manner in which they were presented to the eye. The table was loaded with huge folios, amongst which lay light books of jest and ribaldry; and, amongst notes of unmercifully long orations, and essays on king-craft, were mingled miserable roundels and ballads by the Royal Prentice, as he styled himself, in the art of poetry, and schemes for the general pacification of Europe, with a list of the names of the King’s hounds, and remedies against canine madness.

His Majesty’s dress was of green velvet, quilted so full as to be dagger-proof—which gave him the appearance of clumsy and ungainly protuberance; while its being buttoned awry, communicated to his figure an air of distortion. Over his green doublet he wore a sad-coloured nightgown, out of the pocket of which peeped his hunting-horn. His high-crowned gray hat lay on the floor, covered with dust, but encircled by a carcanet of large balas rubies; and he wore a blue velvet nightcap, in the front of which was placed the plume of a heron, which had been struck down by a favourite hawk in some critical moment of the flight, in remembrance of which the King wore this highly honoured feather.

But such inconsistencies in dress and appointments were mere outward types of those which existed in the royal character; rendering it a subject of doubt amongst his contemporaries, and bequeathing it as a problem to future historians. He was deeply learned, without possessing useful knowledge; sagacious in many individual cases, without having real wisdom; fond of his power, and desirous to maintain and augment it, yet willing to resign the direction of that, and of himself, to the most unworthy favourites; a big and bold assertor of his rights in words, yet one who tamely saw them trampled on in deeds; a lover of negotiations, in which he was always outwitted; and one who feared war, where conquest might have been easy. He was fond of his dignity, while he was perpetually degrading it by undue familiarity; capable of much public labour, yet often neglecting it for the

* A biblical commentary by Gill, which, (if the author’s memory serves him,) occupies between five and six hundred printed quarto pages, and must therefore have filled more pages of manuscript than the number mentioned in the text, has this quotation at the end of the volume—

“With one good pen I wrote this book,
Made of a gray goose quill;
A pen it was when it I took,
And a pen I leave it still.”

to his son—Randal has been long gone, where him and his wife must go, Georgia, as well as the like of you—and what does his son want with us?”

“The gentleman,” answered the citizen, “of a large debt due by your Majesty’s treasury for money advanced to your Majesty in great state emergency, about the time of the Raid of Ruthven.”

“I mind the thing well,” said King James—“O’!’s death, man, I was just out of the clutches of the Master of Glams and his complices, and there was never after near welcome to a born Prince—the man the shame and put that crowned King should need me a penny sum. But what need he dun us for it, man, like a baker at the breaking? We ought him the silver, and will pay him w’ our convenience, or make it otherwise up to him, which is now between justice and subject—We are not in meditative sugar, man, to be abused thus presumptuously.”

“Alas! as it please your Majesty,” said the goldsmith, shaking his head, “it is the poor young nobleman’s extreme necessity, and not his will, that makes him importunate; for he must have money, and that briefly, to discharge a debt due to Peregrine Peterson, Conservator of the Privileges at Campvere, or his bail hereditary barony and estate of Glenvarloch will be evicted in virtue of an unredempted wadset.”

“How say ye, man—how say ye?” exclaimed the king, impatiently; “the earls of a Conservator, the son of a low Dutch skipper, exact the said estate and lordship of the house of Oldsant?”—“God’s beard, man, that mean not be—we mean suspend the diligence by writ of favour, or otherwise.”

“I doubt that may hardly be,” answered the citizen, “if it please your Majesty; your learned counsel in the law of Scotland advise, that there is no remedy but in paying the money.”

“O’!’s Bab,” said the king, “let him keep hand by the strong hand against the earls, until we can take some order about his affairs.”

“Alas!” muttered the goldsmith, “if it like your Majesty, your own pacific government, and your doing of equal justice to all men, has made main force a little less to walk by, unless just within the bounds of the Highlands.”

“Weel—weel—weel, man,” said the perplexed monarch, whose ideas of justice, expedience, and convenience, became on such occasions strangely embrouled; “just it is we should pay our debts, that the young man may pay his; and he must be paid, and in verbo regis he shall be paid—but how to come by the silver, man, is a difficult chapter—ye mean try the city, Georgia?”

“To say the truth,” answered Heriot, “please your gracious Majesty, what betwixt loans, and benevolences, and subsidies, the city is at this present.”

“Dinna tell me of what the city is,” said King James; “our Exchequer is as dry as Dean Glen’s discourse on the penitentiary psalms—Et nubes nihil fit—It is all taking the breaks off a wild Highlandman—they that come to me for silver, should tell me how to come by it—the city ye mean try, Heriot; and dinna think to be called James George for nothing—and in verbo regis I will pay the lad if you get me the loan—I wonnot haggle on the terms; and, between you and me, Georgia, we will redeem the brave old estate of Glenvarloch—But wherefore comes not the young lord to Court, Heriot—is he comely—is he presentable in the presence?”

“Ay, I understand ye,” said his Majesty—“I understand ye—Res ergastula domi—pur lad—pur lad;—and his father a right true bonn Scots heart, though still in some opinions. Hark ye, Heriot, let the lad have two hundred pounds to fit him out. And, here—here”—(taking the carcanet of rubies from his old hat)—“ye have had these in pledge before for a larger sum, ye said Levite that ye are. Keep them in pawn, till I gie ye back the silver out of the next subsidy.”

“If it please your Majesty to give me such directions in writing,” said the cautious citizen.

“The deed is in your money, Georgia,” said the King; “ye are as process as a Persian in form, and a more Nullius in the marrow of the matter. May not a King’s word serve you for advancing your pithy two hundred pounds?”

“But not for detaining the crown jewels,” said George Heriot.

And the King, who from long experience was used to dealing with suspicious creditors, wrote an order upon George Heriot, his well-beloved goldsmith and jeweller, for the sum of two hundred pounds, to be paid presently to Nigel Oldsant, Lord of Glenvarloch, to be imputed as so much debts due to him by the crown, and authorizing the retention of a carcanet of balas rubies, with a great diamond, as described in a Catalogue of his Majesty’s jewels, to remain in possession of the said George Heriot, advancer of the said sum, and so forth, until he was lawfully contented and paid thereof. By another receipt, his Majesty gave the said George Heriot directions to deal with some of the monied men, upon equitable terms, for a sum of money for his Majesty’s present use, not to be under 20,000 merks, but as much more as could conveniently be procured.

“And has he any law, this Lord Nigel of ours?” said the King.

George Heriot could not exactly answer this question; but believed “the young lord had studied abroad.”

“He shall have our own advice,” said the King “how to carry on his studies to most advantage; and it may be we will have him come to Court, and study with Steenie, and Hume Charles. And, now we think on’t, away—away, George—for the baron will be coming home presently and we would not as yet they kend of this matter we have been treating anent. Propera pedem, O Georgia! Clap your mule between your houghs, and god-den with you.”

Thus ended the conference betwixt the gentle King James and his benevolent jeweller and goldsmith.

CHAPTER VI.

O I do know him—in the monthly lesson
What our court will wait their legs will find
When they would make their honest conversation
With somewhat sharper favour—Merry, ay,
That virtue will not left him all the price
That was so sharp and pregnant as appeared out;
With the gear and although so over as over,
Most reason made the drift we give our greatest,
For too long things are weary on.

For Chamberlains—A Comedy.

THE good company invited by the hospitable citizen assembled at his house in Lombard-street at the “beloved hungry hour” of noon, to partake of that and which divides the day, being about the time when modern persons of fashion, turning themselves upon their heels, began to think, not without a great deal of hesitation, that they will by and by commence it. Thither came the young Nigel, arrayed only in a dress, nevertheless, more suitable to his age and quality than he had formerly worn, or recommended by his servant Monimia, whose outward features glared forth from under a blue eyebrow fantastically placed sideways on his head, had a second and tough coat of English blue by which, which, unlike his former treatment, would stand the tug of all the apprentices in Fleet-street. The buckle and broadsword he wore as the garb of his condition, and a neat silver badge, bearing a star, announced that he was an apprentice. He sat down in the good cheer, not a little pleased to find his attention in the hall was likely to be rewarded with a meal such as he had seldom.

Mr David Ramsay, that profound and accurate mechanic, was safely conducted to Le according to promise, well washed, cleaned from the soot of the furnace. His daughter, who came with him, was years old very pretty, very demure, black eyes, that ever and anon contemned of sobriety, to which silence, velvet head, and a cambric ruff, had a true Margaret, as the daughter of a
There were also two citizens and a hain, well to pass in the world, and experienced in her craft of merchandising, but who require no particular description. There was an elderly clergyman, in his gown and cassock, a decent vegetable man, partaking in his manners of the pliancy of the citizens amongst whom he had his cure.

These may be dismissed with brief notice, but not so Sir Mungo Malagrowth of Gernago Castle, who claims a little more attention, as an original character of the time in which he flourished.

That good knight dined at Master Horst's just as the clock began to strike twelve, and was seated in his chair ere the last stroke had chimed. This gave the knight an excellent opportunity of making extensive observations on all who came later than himself, but to mention a few rubs at the expense of those who had been so superfluous as to appear earlier.

Having little or no property save his bare demerits, Sir Mungo had been early attached to the capacity of whipping boy, as the office was then called, to King James the Sixth, and, with the Majesty's warrant to all polite learning by his celebrated preceptor George Buchanan. The office of whipping boy deemed an unfortunate occupant to undergo all the corporal punishment which the Lord's valet, whose proper person was of course next in right chance to incur in the course of travelling through his grammar and promptly. Under the aegis, instead of George Buchanan, who did not spare of the vicious mode of punishment James saw the penance of his own faults, and Mungo Malagrowth enjoyed a surer but James's other instructor Master Patrick Young, went more carefully to work and acquired the very soul of the youthful King by the flagellation which he bestowed on the whipping boy when the royal task was not suitably performed. And he it told to Sir Mungo a proverb that there were points about him in the highest respect to his official situation. He had even in youth a naturally irregular and grotesque set of features which, when distorted by fear, pain, and anger, bore all the one of the whimsical force which present themselves in a leather carcase. His voice also was high pitched and querulous, so that, when smothering under Master Peter Young's unparagoned inflictions, the expression of his grotesque physiognomy and the eager human yells which he uttered, were well calculated to produce all the efforts on the monarch who doubted the task, that could possibly be produced by any other and an innocent individual suffering for his defect.

Sir Mungo Malagrowth, for such he became, though an early fawning at Court, which another would have improved and maintained. But when he, too, lay to be whipped, he had no other means of rendering himself acceptable. A bitter caustic, and backbiting humour, a malicious wit, and an eye for others more poisonous than the poison of such amiable qualities, have not indeed always been found obstacles to a courtier's rise, but then they must be amalgamated with a degree of selfish cunning and prudence, of which Sir Mungo had no share. His nature ran not, his envy could not conceal itself, and it was not long after his majority till he had as many quarrels upon his hands as would have required a saint's nine lives to answer. In one of these quarrels he received, perhaps we should say fortune, a wound, which served him as an excuse for accepting no invitations of the kind in future. Sir Ralph Hatton, of Ransgallion, cut off in mortal combat three of the fingers of his right hand, so that Sir Mungo never could hold sword again. At a later period, having written some satirical verses upon the Lady Forten, he received so severe a chastisement from some persons employed for the purpose, that he was found half dead on the spot where they had thus dealt with him, and one of his thighs having been broken, and all art gave him a lurch in his gait, with which he hobbled to his grave. The lameness of his leg and hand, besides that they added considerably to the grotesque appearance of this original, prevented him in future a personal immunity from the more dangerous consequences of his own humour, and he gradually grew old in the service of the Court as only ty of his and limb, though without either making friends, or attaining preferment. Sometimes, indeed, the King was amused with his rustic sallies, but he had never art enough to improve the favourable opportunity, and his enemies (who were, for that matter, the whole Court) always found means to throw him out of favour again. The celebrated Archibald Armstrong offered Sir Mungo, in his generosity, a shirt of his own foot's coat, proposing thereby to communicate to him the privilege and immunities of a professed jester. "For," said the man of mothy, "Sir Mungo, as he goes on just now, gets as queer for a good jest than just the King's portion for having made it."

Even in London, the golden shower which fell around him, did not moisten the blighted fortunes of Sir Mungo Malagrowth. He grew old, deaf, and peevish, lost even the spirit which had formerly animated his structure and was barely endured by James, who, though himself nearly as far advanced in years, retained, to an unusual and even an absurd degree, the desire to be surrounded by young people.

Sir Mungo, thus fallen into the yellow land of years and fortune, showed his emaciated form and faded embroidery at Court as seldom as his duty permitted, and spent his time in indulging his fond for idleness in the public walks, and in the solace of Saint Paul's, which were then the general resort of newsmongers and characters of all descriptions, associating himself chiefly with such of his countrymen as he accounted of inferior birth and rank to himself. In this manner being and conversing commerce, and those who pursued it, he nevertheless lived a good deal among the Scottish artists and merchants, who had followed the court to London. To these he could show his cynicism without much offence, for some submitted to his jeers and all humour in deference to his birth and knighthood, which in those days conferred high privileges, and others, of more gentle spirit and endured the old man, unhappy alike in his fortunes and his temper.

Amongst the latter was George Horst, who, though his talents and education induced him to carry aristocratic feelings to a degree which would now be thought extravagant, had too much spirit and good sense to permit himself to be intruded upon to an unauthorised career, or used with the slightest improper freedom, by such a person as Sir Mungo, to whom he was, nevertheless, not only respectfully civil, but occasionally kind, and even generous.

Accordingly, this appeared from the manner in which Sir Mungo Malagrowth conducted himself upon entering the apartment. He paid his respects to Master Horst and a decent, elderly, somewhat grumpy looking female, in a red, who, by the name of Aunt Judith, did the honours of his house and table, with little or no portion of the supercilious acidity, which his angular physiognomy seemed when he made his bow ceremonially to David Ramsay, and the two other citizens. He thrust himself into the conversation of the latter to observe he had heard in Paul's, that the bankrupt concerns of Pindrick, a great merchant, who, as he expressed it, had given the crown a pudding, and on whom he knew from the same authority, each of the honest citizens had some unshared claim, was like to prove a total loss. "Mark and black ship and cargo, land and rigging, all lost, now and for ever."

The two citizens glanced at each other, but too prudent to make their private views the subject of public discussion, drew their heads together, and evaded further conversation by speaking in a whisper.

The old Scots knight next attacked the watchmaker with the same disrespectful familiarity. "Devin," he said, "Devin, ye deevils could not have ye no game mad yet, with applying your mathematical science, as ye call it, to the book of Apocalypse? I expected to have heard ye make out the age of the beast as clear as a tool on a hewer's whistle."

"Why, Sir Mungo," said the watchmaker, after making an effort to recall to his recollection what had been said to him, and by whom, "it may be, that ye are nearer the mark than ye are yourself aware of;

for, taking the ten horns o' the beast, ye may easily estimate by your digitals"—

"My digits! you d—d auld, rusty, good-for-nothing timepiece!" exclaimed Sir Mungo, while, betwixt jest and earnest, he laid on his hilt his hand, or rather his claw, (for Sir Rullion's broadsword had abridged it into that form,)—"D'ye mean to upbraid me with my mutilation?"

Master Heriot interfered. "I cannot persuade our friend David," he said, "that scriptural prophecies are intended to remain in obscurity, until their unexpected accomplishment shall make, as in former days, that fulfilled which was written. But you must not exert your knightly valour on him for all that."

"By my saul, and it would be throwing it away," said Sir Mungo, laughing. "I would as soon set out, with hound and horn, to hunt a sturdied sheep; for he is in a doze again, and up to the chin in numerals, quotients, and dividends.—Mistress Margaret, my pretty honey," for the beauty of the young citizen made even Sir Mungo Malagrowth's grim features relax themselves a little, "is your father always as entertaining as he seems just now?"

Mistress Margaret simpered, bridled, looked to either side, then straight before her; and, having assumed all the airs of bashful embarrassment and timidity which were necessary, as she thought, to cover a certain shrewd readiness which really belonged to her character, at length replied, "That indeed her father was very thoughtful, but she had heard, that he took the habit of mind from her grandfather."

"Your grandfather!" said Sir Mungo,—after doubting if he had heard her aright,—"Said she her grandfather! The lassie is distraught!—I ken nae wench on this side of Temple-Bar that is derived from so distant a relation."

"She has got a godfather, however, Sir Mungo," said George Heriot, again interfering; "and I hope you will allow him interest enough with you, to request you will not put his pretty godchild to so deep a blush."

"The better—the better," said Sir Mungo. "It is a credit to her, that, bred and born within the sound of Bow-bell, she can blush for any thing; and, by my saul, Master George," he continued, chucking the irritated and reluctant damsel under the chin, "she is bonny enough to make amends for her lack of ancestry—at least, in such a region as Cheapside, where, d'ye mind me, the kettle cannot call the porridge-pot"—

The damsel blushed, but not so angrily as before. Master George Heriot hastened to interrupt the conclusion of Sir Mungo's homely proverb, by introducing him personally to Lord Nigel.

Sir Mungo could not at first understand what his host said.—"Bread of Heaven, wha say ye, man?"

Upon the name of Nigel Olifaunt, Lord Glenvarloch, being again hollacd into his ear, he drew up, and, regarding his entertainer with some austerity, rebuked him for not making persons of quality acquainted with each other, that they might exchange courtesies before they mingled with other folks. He then made as handsome and courtly a congee to his new acquaintance as a man maimed in foot and hand could do; and, observing he had known my lord, his father, bid him welcome to London, and hoped he should see him at Court.

Nigel in an instant comprehended, as well from Sir Mungo's manner, as from a strict compression of their entertainer's lips, which intimated the suppression of a desire to laugh, that he was dealing with an original of no ordinary description, and accordingly, returned his courtesy with suitable punctiliousness. Sir Mungo, in the meanwhile, gazed on him with much earnestness; and, as the contemplation of natural advantages was as odious to him as that of wealth, or other adventitious benefits, he had no sooner completely perused the handsome form and good features of the young lord, than, like one of the comforters of the Man of Uz, he drew close up to him, to enlarge on the former grandeur of the Lords of Glenvarloch, and the regret with which he had heard, that their representative was not likely to possess the domains of his ancestry. Anon, he enlarged upon the beauties of the principal mansion of Glenvarloch—the commanding site of the old castle, the noble expanse of the lake, stocked with wildfowl, the commanding screen of forest, terminating in a mountain-ridge abounding with deer, and all the other advantages of that fine and ancient rony, till Nigel, in spite of every effort to the contrary, was unwillingly obliged to sigh.

Sir Mungo, skilful in discerning when the value of those he conversed with were wrung, observed that his new acquaintance winced, and would not willingly have pressed the discussion; but the impatient knock upon the dresser with the handle of his dudgeon-knife, now gave a signal loud enough to be heard from the top of the house to the bottom, summoning, at the same time, the serving-men to place the dinner upon the table, and the guests to take of it.

Sir Mungo, who was an admirer of good cooking, and a taste which, by the way, might have some influence in reconciling his dignity to these city visits, tolled off by the sound, and left Nigel and the guests in peace, until his anxiety to arrange himself in his due place of pre-eminence at the genial dinner was duly gratified. Here, seated on the left hand, Aunt Judith, he beheld Nigel occupy the station yet higher honour on the right, dividing that honour from pretty Mistress Margaret; but he saw that the more patience, that there stood betwixt him and the young lord a superb larded capon.

The dinner proceeded according to the form of the times. All was excellent of the kind; and, in accordance with the Scottish cheer promised, the board displayed, besides the statutory dainties of Old England, a small cupboard of plate, very choicely and fully wrought, did not escape the compliments of some of the company, and an oblique sneer from Sir Mungo, as intimating the owner's excellence in his own mechanical craft.

"I am not ashamed of the workmanship, Sir Mungo," said the honest citizen. "They say, a good cook knows how to lick his own fingers; and I think, it were unseemly that I, who have furnished half the cupboards in broad Britain, should have my own covered with paltry pewter."

The blessing of the clergyman now left the guests at liberty to attack what was placed before them, and the meal went forward with great decorum, until Aunt Judith, in farther recommendation of the capon, assured her company that it was of a distinguished breed of poultry, which she had brought from Scotland.

"Then, like some of his countrymen, master Mungo," said the pitiless Sir Mungo, not without a touch of irony towards his landlord, "he has been well landed in England."

"There are some others of his countrymen," answered Master Heriot, "to whom all the good of England has not been able to render that good service."

Sir Mungo sneered and reddened, the rest of the company laughed; and the satirist, who had reasons for not coming to extremity with Sir Mungo, was silent for the rest of the dinner.

The dishes were exchanged for confectionery, wine of the highest quality and flavour; and Nigel saw the entertainments of the wealthiest burghers, which he had witnessed abroad, fairly outdone by the hospitality of a London citizen. Yet there was nothing ostentatious, or which seemed inconsistent with the degree of an opulent burgher.

While the collation proceeded, Nigel, according to the good-breeding of the time, addressed his discourse principally to Mrs. Judith; whom he took to be a woman of a strong Scottish understanding, more inclined towards the Puritans than was his brother George, (for in that relation she stood to him, though he always called her aunt,) attached to him in the strongest degree, and sedulously attentive to all his comforts. As the conversation of this dame was neither lively nor fascinating, the young lord naturally addressed himself next to the hostess's very pretty daughter, who sat upon the left hand. From her, however, there was no expecting any reply beyond the measure of a monosyllable.

and when the young gallant had said the best and most complimentary things which his courtesy supplied, the smile that mantled upon her pretty mouth was so slight and evanescent, as scarce to be discernible.

Nigel was beginning to tire of his company, for the old citizens were speaking with his host of commercial matters in language to him totally unintelligible, when Sir Mungo Malagrowther suddenly summoned their attention.

That amiable personage had for some time withdrawn from the company into the recess of a projecting window, so formed and placed, as to command a view of the door of the house, and of the street. This situation was probably preferred by Sir Mungo on account of the number of objects which the streets of a metropolis usually offer, of a kind congenial to the thoughts of a spleenetic man. What he had hitherto seen passing there, was probably of little consequence; but now a trampling of horse was heard without, and the knight suddenly exclaimed,—"By my faith, Master George, you had better go look to shop; for here comes Knighton, the Duke of Buckingham's groom, and two fellows after him, as if he were my Lord Duke himself."

"My cash-keeper is below," said Horiot, without disturbing himself, "and he will let me know if his Grace's commands require my immediate attention."

"Umph! cash-keeper?" muttered Sir Mungo to himself; "he would have had an easy office when I first found you. But," said he, speaking aloud, "will you not come to the window, at least? for Knighton has trundled a piece of silver plate into your house—ha! ha! he! he!—trundled it upon its edge, as a callan would drive a hoop. I cannot help laughing—ha! ha! he! he!—at the fellow's impudence."

"I believe you could not help laughing," said George Horiot, rung up and leaving the room, "if your best friend lay dying."

"Butter that, my lord—he?" said Sir Mungo, addressing Nigel. "Our friend is not a goldsmith for nothing—he hath no London wit. But I will go down and see what comes on't."

Horiot, as he descended the stairs, met his cash-keeper coming up, with some concern in his face—"Why, how now, Roberts?" said the goldsmith, "what means all this, man?"

"It is Knighton Master Horiot, from the court—Knighton, the Duke's man. He brought back the silver you carried to Whitehall, flung it into the entrance as if it had been an old pewter platter, and bade me tell you, the king would have some of your trumpery."

"Ay indeed!" said George Horiot—"None of my trumpery"—Come hither into the counting-room, Roberts. Sir Mungo," he added, bowing to the knight, who had joined, and was preparing to follow them, "I pray your forgiveness for an instant."

In virtue of this prohibition, Sir Mungo, who, as well as the rest of the company, had overheard what passed between George Horiot and his cash-keeper, saw himself condemned to wait in the outer business-room, where he would have endeavoured to stoke his eager curiosity by questioning Knighton, but that summary of greatness, after having added to the general message of his master some references of his own, had again scampered westward, with his entellias at his heels.

In the meanwhile, the name of the Duke of Buckingham, the omnipotent favourite both of the King and the Prince of Wales, had struck some anxiety into the party which remained in the great parlour. He was more feared than beloved, and, if not absolutely of a tyrannical disposition, was accounted haughty, violent, and vindictive. It pressed on Nigel's heart, that he himself, though he could not conceive how nor why might be the original cause of the resentment of the Duke against his benefactor. The others made their comments in whispers, until the sounds reached Ramsay, who had not heard a word of what had previously passed, but plunged in those studies with which he connected every other incident and event, took up only the catchword, and replied—"The Duke—the Duke of Buckingham—

George Villiers—ay—I have spoke with Lamb about him."

"Our Lord and our Lady! Now, how can you say so, father?" said his daughter, who had shrewdness enough to see that her father was treading upon dangerous ground.

"Why, ay, child," answered Ramsay; "the stars do but incline, they cannot compel. But well you wot, it is commonly said of his Grace, by those who have the skill to cast nativities, that there was a notable conjunction of Mars and Saturn—the apparent or true time of which, reducing the calculations of Echebodus made for the latitude of Oraniborough to that of London, gives seven hours, fifty-five minutes, and forty-one seconds."

"Hold your peace, old soothsayer," said Horiot, who at that instant entered the room with a calm and steady countenance; "your calculations are true and undeniable when they regard brass and wire, and mechanical force; but future events are at the pleasure of Him who bears the hearts of Kings in his hands."

"Ay, but, George," answered the watchmaker, "there was a concurrence of signs at this gentleman's birth, which showed his course would be a strange one. Long has it been said of him, he was born at the very meeting of night and day, and under crossing and contending influences that may affect both us and him."

*"Full moon and high sun, Great men shall thus be;
Rise at evening, starry day,
Shine death that thou die."*

"It is not good to speak of such things," said Horiot, "especially of the great, whose walks have ears, and a bird of the air shall carry the matter."

Several of the guests seemed to be of their host's opinion. The two merchants took brief leave, as if under consciousness that something was wrong. Mistress Margaret, her body-guard of 'prentices being in readiness, plucked her father by the sleeve, and, rescuing him from a brown study, (whether referring to the wheels of Time, or to that of Fortune, is uncertain,) wished good-night to her friend Mrs. Judith, and received her godfather's blessing, who, at the same time, put upon her slender finger a ring of much taste and some value; for he seldom suffered her to leave him without some token of his affection. Thus honourably dismissed, and accompanied by her escort, she set forth on her return to Fleet-street.

Sir Mungo had had some to Master Horiot as he came out from the back counting-room, but such was the interest which he took in the affairs of his friend that, when Master George went up stairs, he could not help walking into that sanctum sanctorum, to see how master Roberts was employed. The knight found the cash-keeper busy in making extracts from those huge brass-clasped leather-bound manuscript books, which are the pride and trust of dealers, and the dread of customers whose year of grace is out. The good knight bent his elbows on the desk, and said to the functionary in a condoling tone of voice,—"What! you have lost a good customer, I fear, Master Roberts, and are busied in making out his bill of charges?"

Now it chanced that Roberts, like Sir Mungo himself, was a little deaf, and, like Sir Mungo, knew also how to make the most of it; so that he answered at cross purposes. "I humbly crave your pardon, Sir Mungo for not having sent to your bill of charge sooner, but my master bade me not disturb you. I will bring the items together in a moment." So saying, he began to turn over the leaves of his book of data, murmuring, "Repairing one silver seal now clasp to his chain of office—also over-gilt brooch to his hat being a Saint Andrew's cross, with chuties—a copper gilt pair of spurs, thus to Daniel Drom, we not despoiling in the article."

He would have proceeded, but Sir Mungo, not prepared to endure the recital of the catalogue of his own petty debts, and still less willing to satisfy them on the spot, washed the book-keeper cavalierly, good-night, and left the house without farther ceremony. The clerk looked after him with a civil icy stare, and immediately resumed the more serious labours which Sir Mungo's intrusion had interrupted.

CHAPTER VII

Things could not have thought on — but the thing

The Christian.

When the rest of the company had taken their departure from Master Harriot's house, the young Lord of Glenvarloch also offered to take leave, but his host detained him for a few minutes, until all were gone excepting the clergyman.

"My lord," then said the worthy citizen, "we have had our protracted hour of honest and hospitable pastime, and now I would fain delay you for another and graver purpose, as it is our custom when we have the benefit of good Mr. Windsor's company, that he reads the prayers of the church for the evening before we separate. Your excellent father, my lord, would not have departed before family worship — I hope the same from your lordship."

"With pleasure," answered Nigel, "and you add to the invitation an additional obligation to those with which you have loaded me. When young men forget what is their duty, they owe deep thanks to the friend who will remind them of it."

While they talked together in this manner, the serving men had removed the folding tables, brought forward a portable reading desk, and placed chairs and bookshelves for their master, their mistress, and the noble stranger. Another low chair, or rather a sort of stool, was placed close beside that of Master Harriot, and though the circumstance was trivial, Nigel was induced to notice it, because when about to occupy that seat he was prevented by a sign from the old gentleman, and motivated to another of some what more elevation. The clergyman took his station behind the reading desk. The domestics, a numerous family both of clerks and servants, including Monaghan, attended with great gravity and were commensurated with benches.

The household were all seated, and, externally at least, composed to devout attention, when a low knock was heard at the door of the apartment. Mrs. Judith looked anxiously at her brother, as if desiring to know his pleasure. He smiled his head gravely and looked to the door. Mrs. Judith immediately opened the chamber, opened the door, and led into the apartment a beautiful creature, whose sudden and singular appearance might have made her almost pass for an apparition. She was deadly pale — there was not the least shade of red and to only white, which was exquisitely formed, and on her that circumstance has been noticed as deathly beautiful. Her long black hair fell down her shoulders and down her back, curled in and regularly, but without the least apparent direction or ornament, which looked very, at a period when head gear as it was called, dress was of pure white of the simplest fabric, hiding all her person excepting the throat, hands. Her form was rather beneath than the middle size, but so justly proportioned, elegantly made, that the spectator's attention entirely withdrawn from her size. In some of the extreme plainness of all the rest of her dress was a necklace which a darkness might seem to have and business were the ball which it was composed, and around her neck of value of scarce inferior value.

When this singular figure entered the apartment, her eyes on Nigel and paused, as if then whether to advance or retreat. The which she took of him seemed to be one of uncertainty and hesitation, than of bashful timidity. Aunt Judith took her by the hand, her countenance, her dark eyes, however turned to be fixed on Nigel with an earnest melancholy by which he felt strongly affected when she was seated on the vacant stool, and placed there, probably for her convenience, again looked on him more than once with a passive, lingering, and intense expression, but without shyness or embarrassment, not much as to call the slightest degree of emotion to her cheek.

She was as that singular female had taken prayer book, which was laid on her right, seemed absorbed in devout duty; and a Nigel's attention to the service was so much, by this extraordinary apparition, that he towards her repeatedly in the course of the he could never observe that her eyes or her attention so much as a single moment from in which she was engaged. Nigel himself, attracted by the appearance of this lady, an extraordinary that strictly as he had been by his father to pay the most respectful during performance of divine service, his thoughts of himself were distracted by her presence earnestly wished the prayers were ended, curiosity might almost have been to stand, service was concluded, and each had returned to the devout and edifying prayer church, concentrated in mental devotion to space, the mysterious constant scene ever a person started; and Nigel remarked that no domestics left their places, or even moved, had firm knotted on one knee to Harriot, who to bless her with his hand laid on her his melancholy uniformity of look and action. He bended her body, but without kneeling, to Mr. and having performed these two acts of piety she left the room; yet not in the act of her she once more turned her penetrating eyes with a fixed look, which compelled him to own aside. When he looked towards her, saw only the skirt of her white mantle as she departed.

The domestics then rose and dispersed to their work, and from and noise were reduced. Nigel said to the clergyman and the latter leave. The young lord would fain have accompanied him, in hope to get some explanation of what which he had beheld, but he was stopped, host, who requested to speak with him in his study room.

"I hope, my lord," said the citizen, "preparations for attending Court are in such state that you can go thither the day after to-morrow. It is perhaps the last day for some time. Majesty will hold open court for all who are persons by birth, rank, or office, to attend. On the subsequent day he goes to Theobald's

"It will perhaps be mentioned by some of my countrymen, that the ancient Scottish knight, as described in the preceding chapter, the baronet's name of his grandfather from a great wealth and as a noble baronet, who was to be met with in Edinburgh society about twenty five or thirty years ago. It is not by any means to be inferred, that the living person resembled the imaginary one, as the name of his grandfather to him, or as his personal appearance. But his fortune was very different from his great and the appearance of his family, and he possessed himself of this property, the worthy baronet was the descendant of a man who was a great and a fortune for the sake of his name. This he had the art of expressing under the pretence of a deep and a worthy melancholy, his most serious things by an affected gravity of what was said around him. For instance, of a job in making of a certain variety of quality products had chosen to display a good deal of such a property as had not been seen in quality for the better part of a century. The young man who then passed gained themselves with carrying him up his stairs, when he suddenly melted out one of the story. And if we think my dear said (quivering) — indeed it seems to me — (he) (I was the mark of a long career, and that was your grandfather, who was at the head of the trade in Edinburgh about the latter end of that century. I am positive enough when this type of the Harriot — Monaghan — happened to him a challenge, the high chief of one of those Scotch clans who were accused of passing very little attention in private life to the distant times of their clan. From addressing a gentleman of the upper class, as if he were a peer, there should be some interesting interest, when he was concerned to emphasize the nature of the man himself by saying, that he had a nephew, had once the great and the other gentleman a gentleman had called upon him, describing the origin of his little family as a baronet. It was to well imagined that among a family that have been always remembered about gentlemen, such a person, who had a general acquaintance with all the laws and customs in the details of the present, the past, and the coming times, must have had the same sense for excitement as a country or a city story.

he is so much occupied with hunting and other pleasures, that he cares not to be intruded on."

"I shall be in all outward readiness to pay my duty," said the young nobleman, "yet I have little heart to do it. The friends from whom I ought to have found encouragement and protection, have proved cold and false—I certainly will not trouble them for their countenance on this occasion—and yet I must confess my childish unwillingness to enter quite alone upon so new a scene."

"It is bold of a mechanic like me to make such an offer to a nobleman," said Heriot; "but I must attend at Court to-morrow. I can accompany you as far as the presence-chamber, from my privilege as being of the household. I can facilitate your entrance, should you find difficulty, and I can point out the proper manner and time of approaching the King. But I do not know," he added, smiling, "whether these little advantages will not be overbalanced by the incongruity of a nobleman receiving them from the hands of an old smith."

"From the hands rather of the only friend I have found in London," said Nigel, offering his hand.

"Nay, if you think of the matter in that way," replied the honest citizen, "there is no more to be said—I will come for you to-morrow, with a barge proper to the occasion.—But remember, my good young lord, that I do not, like some men of my degree, wish to take opportunity to step beyond it, and associate with my superiors in rank, and therefore do not fear to mortify my presumption, by suffering me to keep my distance in the presence, and where it is fitting for both of us to separate; and for what remains, most truly happy shall I be in proving of service to the son of my ancient patron."

The style of conversation led so far from the point which had interested the young nobleman's curiosity, that there was no returning to it that night. He therefore exchanged thanks and greeting with George Heriot, and took his leave, promising to be equipped and in readiness to embark with him on the second successive morning at ten o'clock.

The generation of linkboys, celebrated by Count Anthony Hamilton, as peculiar to London, had already, in the reign of James I., begun their functions, and the service of one of them, with his smoky torch, had been secured to light the young Scottish lord and his follower to their lodgings, which, though better acquainted than formerly with the city, they might in the dark have run some danger of missing. This gave the ingenious Mr. Moniplies an opportunity of gathering close up to his master, after he had gone through the form of slipping his left arm into the handles of his buckler, and loosening his broadsword in the sheath, that he might be ready for whatever should befall.

"If it were not for the wine and the good cheer which we have had in yonder old man's house, my lord," said the sapient follower, "and that I ken him by report to be a just living man in many respects, and a real Edinburgh gutterblood, I should have been well pleased to have seen how his feet were shaped, and whether he had not a cloven cloot under the braw roses and cordovan shoon of his."

"Why, you rascal," answered Nigel, "you have been too kindly treated, and now that you have filled your ravenous stomach, you are railing on the good gentleman that relieved you."

"Under favour, no, my lord," said Moniplies,—"I would only like to see something mair about him. I have eaten his meat, it is true—more shame that the like of him should have meat to give, when your lordship and me could scarce have gotten, on our own account, brose and a bear bannock—I have drunk his wine, too."

"I see you have," replied his master, "a great deal more than you should have done."

"Under your patience, my lord," said Moniplies, "you are pleased to say that, because I crushed a quart with that jolly boy Jenkin, as they call the 'prentice boy, and that was out of mere acknowledgment for his former kindness—I own that I, moreover, sung the good old song of Elsie Marley, so as they never heard it chanted in their lives"—

And withal (as John Bunyan says) as they went on their way, he sung—

"O, do ye ken Elsie Marley, honey—
The wife that sells the barley, honey?
For Elsie Marley's grown sae fine,
She winna get up to feed the swine.—
O, do ye ken"—

Here in mid career was the songster interrupted by the stern gripe of his master, who threatened to baton him to death if he brought the city-watch upon them by his ill-timed melody.

"I crave pardon, my Lord—I humbly crave pardon—only when I think of that Jen Win, as they call him, I can hardly help humming—'O, do ye ken'—But I crave your honour's pardon, and will be totally dumb, if you command me so."

"No, sirrah!" said Nigel, "talk on, for I well know you would say and suffer more under pretence of holding your peace, than when you get an unbridled license. How is it, then? What have you to say against Master Heriot?"

It seems more than probable, that in permitting this license, the young lord hoped his attendant would stumble upon the subject of the young lady who had appeared at prayers in a manner so mysterious. But whether this was the case, or whether he merely desired that Moniplies should utter, in a subdued and under tone of voice, those spirits which might otherwise have vented themselves in obstreperous song, it is certain he permitted his attendant to proceed with his story in his own way.

"And therefore," said the orator, availing himself of his immunity, "I would like to ken what sort of a carle this Maister Heriot is. He hath supplied your lordship with wealth of gold, as I can understand; and if he has, I make it for certain he hath had his ain end in it, according to the fashion of the world. Now, had your lordship your own good lands at your guiding, doubtless this person, with most of his craft—goldsmiths they call themselves—I say usurers—wad be glad to exchange so many pounds of African dust, by whilk I understand gold, against so many fair acres, and hundreds of acres, of broad Scottish land."

"But you know I have no land," said the young lord, "at least none that can be affected by any debt which I can at present become obliged for—I think you need not have reminded me of that."

"True, my lord, most true; and, as your lordship says, open to the meanest capacity, without any unnecessary expositions. Now, therefore, my lord, unless Maister George Heriot has something mair to allege as a motive for his liberality, vera different from the possession of your estate—and moreover, as he could gain little by the capture of your body, wherefore should it not be your soul that he is in pursuit of?"

"My soul, you rascal!" said the young lord; "what good should my soul do him?"

"What do I ken about that?" said Moniplies; "they go about roaring and seeking whom they may devour—doubtless, they like the food that they rage so much about—and, my lord, they say," added Moniplies, drawing up still closer to his master's side, "they say that Master Heriot has one spirit in his house already."

"How, or what do you mean?" said Nigel; "I will break your head, you drunken knave, if you palter with me any longer."

"Drunken?" answered his trusty adherent, "and is this the story?—why, how could I but drink your lordship's health on my bare knees, when Master Jenkin began it to me?—hang them that would not—I would have cut the impudent knave's hams with my broadsword, that should make scruple of it, and so have made him kneel when he should have found it difficult to rise again. But touching the spirit," he proceeded, finding that his master made no answer to his valorous tirade, "your lordship has seen her with your own eyes."

"I saw no spirit," said Glenvarloch, but yet breathing thick as one who expects some singular disclosure, "what mean you by a spirit?"

"You saw a young lady come in to prayers, that spoke not a word to any one, only made becks and bows to the old gentleman and lady of the house—ken ye wha she is?"

"No, indeed," answered Nigel; "some relation of the family, I suppose."

"Deil a bit—deil a bit," answered Monipies, hastily, "not a blood-drop's kin to them, if she had a drop of blood in her body—I tell you but what all human beings allege to be truth, that dwell within hie and cry of Lombard-street—that lady, or quean, or whatever you choose to call her, has been dead in the body these many a year, though she haunts them, as we have seen, even at their very devotions."

"You will allow her to be a good spirit at least," said Nigel Olifaunt, "since she chooses such a time to visit her friends?"

"For that I kenna, my lord," answered the superstitious follower; "I ken no spirit that would have faced the right down hammer-blow of Mess John Knox, whom my father stood by in his very warst days, bating a chance time when the Court, which my father supplied with butcher-meat, was against him. But yon divine has another airt from powerful Master Roslock, and Mess David Black, of North Leith, and sic like.—Alack-a-day! wha can ken, if it please your lordship, whether sic prayers as the Southron read out of their auld blethering black mess-book there, may not be as powerful to invite fiends, as a right red-hot prayer warm frae the heart, may be powerful to drive them away, even as the Evil Spirit was driven by the smell of the fish's liver from the bridal-chamber of Sara, the daughter of Raguel? As to whilk story, nevertheless, I make scruple to say whether it be truth or not, better men than I am having doubted on that matter."

"Well, well, well," said his master, impatiently, "we are now near home, and I have permitted you to speak of this matter for once, that we may have an end of your prying folly, and your idiotical superstitions, for ever. For whom do you, or your absurd authors or informers, take this lady?"

"I can say naething, precessely as to that," answered Monipies; "certain it is her body died and was laid in the grave many a day since, notwithstanding she still wanders on earth, and chiefly amongst Maister Heriot's family, though she hath been seen in other places by them that well knew her. But who she is, I will not warrant to say, or how she becomes attached, like a Highland Brownie, to some peculiar family. They say she has a row of apartments of her own, anteroom, parlour, and bedroom; but deil a bed she sleeps in but her own coffin, and the walls, doors, and windows, are so chinked up, as to prevent the least blink of daylight from entering; and then she dwells by torchlight."

"To what purpose, if she be a spirit?" said Nigel Olifaunt.

"How can I tell your lordship?" answered his attendant. "I thank God, I know nothing of her likings, or mislikings—only her coffin is there; and I leave your lordship to guess what a live person has to do with a coffin. As little as a ghost with a lantern, I trow."

"What reason," repeated Nigel, "can a creature, so young and so beautiful, have already habitually to contemplate her bed of last long rest?"

"In troth, I kenna, my lord," answered Monipies; "but there is the coffin, as they told me who have seen it: It is made of heben-wood, with silver nails, and lined all through with three-piled damask, might serve a princess to rest in."

"Singular," said Nigel, whose brain, like that of most active young spirits, was easily caught by the singular and the romantic; "does she not eat with the family?"

"Who!—she!"—exclaimed Monipies, as if surprised at the question; "they would need a lang spoon would sup with her I trow. Always there is something put for her into the Tower, as they call it, whilk is a whigmaleery of a whirling-box, that turns half on the tae side o' the wa', half on the tother."

"I have seen the contrivance in foreign nunneries," said the Lord of Glenvarloch. "And is it thus she receives her food?"

"They tell me something is put in ulka day, for fashion's sake," replied the attendant; "but it is no to be supposed she would consume it, any mair than the images of Bel and the Dragon consumed the dainty vivers that were placed before them. There are stout yeomen and chamber-queans in the house, enow to play the part of Lick-it-up-a', as weel as the threescore and ten priests of Bel, besides their wives and children."

"And she is never seen in the family but when the hour of prayer arrives?" said the master.

"Never, that I hear of," replied the servant.

"It is singular," said Nigel Olifaunt, musing. "Were it not for the ornaments which she wears, and still more for her attendance upon the service of the Protestant Church, I should know what to think, and should believe her either a Catholic votaress, who for some cogent reason, was allowed to make her cell here in London, or some unhappy Popish devotee, who was in the course of undergoing a dreadful penance. As it is, I know not what to deem of it."

His reverie was interrupted by the linkboy knocking at the door of honest John Christie, whose wife came forth with "quips, and becks, and wreathed smiles," to welcome her honoured guest on his return to his apartment.

CHAPTER VIII.

Ay! mark the matron well and laugh not, Harry.

At her old steeple-hat and velvet guard—

I've call'd her like the ear of Dionysus;

I mean that ear-form'd vault, built o'er his dungeon

To catch the groans and discontented murmurs

Of his poor bondsmen—Ev'n so doth Martha

Drink up, for her own purpose, all that passes,

Or is supposed to pass, in this wide city—

She can retail it too, if that her profit

Shall call on her to do so; and retail it

For your advantage, so that you can make

Your profit jump with hers.—The Conspiracy.

We must now introduce to the reader's acquaintance another character, busy and important far beyond her ostensible situation in society—in a word Dame Ursula Suddlechop, wife of Benjamin Suddlechop, the most renowned barber in all Fleet street. This dame had her own particular merits, the principal part of which was (if her own report could be trusted) an infinite desire to be of service to her fellow creatures. Leaving to her thin half-starved partner the boast of having the most dexterous snap with his fingers of any shaver in London, and the care of a shop where starved apprentices flayed the faces of those who were boobies enough to trust them, the dame drove a separate and more lucrative trade, which yet had so many odd turns and windings, that it seemed in many respects to contradict itself.

Its highest and most important duties were of a very secret and confidential nature, and Dame Ursula Suddlechop was never known to betray any transaction intrusted to her, unless she had either been indifferently paid for her service, or that some one found it convenient to give her a double douceur to make her disgorge the secret; and these contingencies happened in so few cases, that her character for trustiness remained as unimpeached as that for honesty and benevolence.

In fact, she was a most admirable matron, and could be useful to the impassioned and the frail in the rise, progress, and consequences of their passion. She could contrive an interview for lovers who could show proper reasons for meeting privately; she could relieve the frail fair one of the burden of a guilty passion, and perhaps establish the hopeful offspring of unlicensed love as the heir of some family whose love was lawful, but where an heir had not followed the union. More than this she could do, and had been concerned in deeper and dearer secrets: She had been a pupil of Mrs. Turner, and learned from her the secret of making the yellow starch, and, it may be, two or three other secrets of more consequence, though perhaps none that went to the criminal extent of those whereof her mistress was accused. But all that was deep and dark in her real character, was covered by the show of outward mirth and good-humour, the hearty laugh and buxom jest with which the dame know well how to conciliate the older part of her neighbours, and the many petty arts by which she could recommend herself to the younger, those especially of her own sex.

Dame Ureley was, in appearance, scarce past forty, and her full, but not overgrown form, and still comely features, although her person was plumped out, and her face somewhat coloured by good cheer, had a young expression of gaiety and good humour, which was all the remains of beauty in the waste. Marriage, a birth, and christenings, were seldom thought to be performed with sufficient ceremony for a comely dame, and she was never far from the scene. As they called her was present. She could contrive all sorts of pastimes, games, and jests, which might amuse the large company which the hospitable dame's succenters assembled together on such occasions, so that her presence was literally considered as indispensable in the families of all citizens of ordinary rank, at such joyous parties. So much was she known, and so much was she known to be, that she was the willing confidant of half the loving couples in the vicinity, most of whom used to communicate their secrets to, and receive their counsel from, Dame Ureley. The rich rewarded her services with rings, overha, or gold pieces, which she liked still better, and she very generously gave her succenters to a poor on the same mixed principles as young gentlemen in medicine assist them, partly from curiosity, and partly to keep her hand in use.

Dame Ureley's reputation in the city was the greater that her practice had extended beyond Temple-Bar, and that she had acquaintance, not patients and succenters, among the quality whose rank, as their members were much lower, and the prospect of approaching the courtly sphere much more difficult, but a degree of consequence unknown to the present day, when the toe of the citizen presses as close on the courtier's heel. Dame Ureley maintained her intercourse with this superior rank of customers, partly by driving a small trade in perfumes, essences, jessamines, hand-gears from France, dishes or ornaments from China, then already beginning to be fashionable, and to mention drugs of various descriptions, chiefly for the use of the ladies, and partly by other means more or less connected with the antique branches of her profession heretofore alluded to.

Possessing such and so many various modes of thriving, Dame Ureley was nevertheless no poor, though she might probably have mended her own circumstances, as well as her husband's, if she had renounced them all, and set herself quietly down to the care of her own household, and to assist Benjamin in the concerns of his trade. But Ureley was luxurious and genial in her habits, and could no more have endured the stunted economy of Benjamin's board, than she could have reconciled herself to the bald chat of his conversation.

It was on the evening of the day on which Lord Nigel Orlamund dined with the wealthy goldsmith, that we must introduce Ureley Suddlerhop, upon the stage. She had that morning made a long tour to Westminster, was fatigued, and had assumed a certain large elbow chair, rendered smooth by frequent use, placed on one side of her chimney, in which there was lit a small but bright fire. Here she observed, both at sleeping and waking, the simmering of a pot of water, spread ale on the brown surface of which bubbled a small crab-apple, sufficiently roasted, while a little mulatto girl watched, still more attentively, the process of dressing a real sweetbread, in a silver skewer which occupied the other side of the chimney. With these views, doubtless, Dame Ureley proposed concluding the well-spent day, of which she reckoned the labour over, and the rest at her own command. She was deceived, however, for just as she sat to quack technically, the lamb's-wool was fitted for crinkling, and the little dandy maiden intimated that the sweetbread was ready to be eaten, the thin cracked voice of Benjamin was heard from the bottom of the stairs.

"Why, Dame Ureley—why, with, I say—why, dame—why, love, you are wanted more than a drop for a blunt razor—why, dame?"

"I would some one would draw a rope across thy windows, thou howling ewe!" said the dame to herself, in the first moment of irritation against her clamorous helpmate, and then called aloud. "Why, what is the matter, Master Suddlerhop? I am just going to slip into bed, I have been dogged to and fro the whole day."

"Nay, sweetheart, it is not me," said the patient Benjamin, "but the Scots laundry-maid from neighbour Ramsey's, who must speak with you immediately."

At the word sweetheart, Dame Ureley cast a wistful look at the ewe which was stewed to a second in the stewpan, and then replied with a sigh. "And Scots Johnny come up, Master Suddlerhop. I shall be very happy to hear what she has to say;" then added in a lower tone, "and I hope she will go to the devil in the flame of a tar-barrel, like many a Scots witch last night."

The Scots laundry entered accordingly, and having heard nothing of the last kind wish of Dame Ureley, made her reverence with considerable respect, and her young mistress had returned home as well, and wished to see her neighbour Dame Ureley, directly.

"And why will it not do to-morrow, Jenny, my good woman?" said Dame Ureley; "for I have been as far as Whitehall to-day already, and I am well-nigh worn all my best my good woman."

"Aweel!" answered Jenny, with great composure, "and if that can be soe, I maun take the longer tramp myself, and maun go down the water-side for auld Mother Redcap, at the Hungerford Stairs, that deals in comforting young creatures, e'en as you do yourself, hanny, for one o' ye the bairn maun be before she dreeps, and that's a' that I ken on!"

On saying the old chimney without further ceremony, turned on her heel, and was about to retreat, when Dame Ureley exclaimed. "Nay, no, if the sweet child, your mistress, has any necessary occasion for good advice and kind reproof, you need not go to Mother Redcap, Janet. She may do very well for shippers, or sea, chandlers' daughters, and such like; but nobody shall wait on pretty Mistress Margaret, the daughter of his most feared Majesty's chorlagger, excepting and saving myself. And so I will but take my champagne and my chink, and put on my muffin, and cross the street to neighbour Ramsey's in an instant. But tell me yourself, good Jenny, are you not something tired of your young lady's frocks and change of mind twenty times a-day?"

"In troth, not I," said the patient drudge, "unless it may be when she is a wee feathery about washing her lace; but I have bairn her longer since she was a bairn, neighbour Suddlerhop, and that makes a difference."

"Ay," said Dame Ureley, still bowed putting on additional defences against the night air; "and you know for certain that she has two hundred pounds a year in good land, at her own free disposal?"

"Left by her grandmother, Heaven rest her soul!" said the Scots woman, "and to a daughter house she could not have bequeathed it."

"Very true, very true, mistress, for, with all her little whims, I have always said Mistress Margaret Ramsey was the prettiest girl in the ward; and, Jenny, I warrant the poor child has had no supper?"

Jenny could not say but it was the case, for her master being out, the two prentice lads had gone out after shutting shop, to fetch them home, and she and the other maid had gone out to Sandy MacGivran's, to see a friend free Scotland.

"As was very natural, Mrs. Janet," said Dame Ureley, who found her interest in assenting to all sorts of propositions from all sorts of persons.

"And so the fire went out, too," said Jenny. "Which was the most natural of the whole," said Dame Suddlerhop; "and so, to cut the matter short, Jenny, I'll carry over the little bit of supper that I was going to eat. For dinner I have tasted none, and it may be my young pretty Mistress Margaret will eat a morsel with me, for it is more christening, Mistress Jenny, that often puts these fancies of dainties into young folk's heads." So saying, she put the silver posset-cup with the ale into Jenny's hands, and assuming her mantle with the alacrity of one determined to sacrifice inclination to duty, she hid the stewpan under its folds, and commanded Wilsa, the little mulatto girl, to light them across the street.

"Whither away, so late?" said the barber, whom they passed seated with his starveling boys round a mess of stock-fish and parsnips, in the shop below.

"If I were to tell you, Gaffer," said the dame, with most contemptuous coolness, "I do not think you could do my errand, so I will e'en keep it to myself." Benjamin was too much accustomed to his wife's independent mode of conduct, to pursue his inquiry farther; nor did the dame tarry for farther question, but marched out at the door, telling the eldest of the boys "to sit up till her return, and to look to the house the whilst."

The night was dark and rainy, and although the distance betwixt the two shops was short, it allowed Dame Ursula leisure enough, while she strode along with high-tucked petticoats, to embitter it by the following grumbling reflections—"I wonder what I have done, that I must needs trudge at every old bel-dam's bidding, and every young minx's maggot! I have been marched from Temple-Bar to White-chapel, on the matter of a pinmaker's wife having pricked her fingers—marry, her husband that made the weapon might have salved the wound.—And here is this fantastic ape, pretty Mistress Marget, forsooth—such a beauty as I could make of a Dutch doll, and as fantastic, and humorous, and conceited, as if she were a duchess. I have seen her in the same day as changeable as a marmozet, and as stubborn as a mule. I should like to know whether her little conceited noddle, or her father's old crazy calculating jolter-pate, breeds most whimsies. But then there's that two hundred pounds a-year in dirty land, and the father is held a close chuff, though a fanciful—he is our landlord besides, and she has begged a late day from him for our rent; so, God help me, I must be comfortable—besides, the little capricious devil is my only key to get at Master George Heriot's secret, and it concerns my character to find that out; and so andiamos, as the lingua franca hath it."

Thus pondering, she moved forward with hasty strides until she arrived at the watchmaker's habitation. The attendant admitted them by means of a pass-key. Onward glided Dame Ursula, now in glimmer and now in gloom, not like the lovely Lady Cristabelle through Gothic sculpture and ancient armour, but creeping and stumbling amongst relics of old machines, and models of new inventions in various branches of mechanics, with which wrecks of useless ingenuity, either in a broken or half finished shape, the apartment of the fanciful though ingenious mechanist was continually lumbered.

At length they attained, by a very narrow staircase, pretty Mistress Margaret's apartment, where she, the cynosure of the eyes of every bold young bachelor in Fleet-street, sat in a posture which hovered between the discontented and the disconsolate. For her pretty back and shoulders were rounded into a curve, her round and dimpled chin reposed in the hollow of her little palm, while the fingers were folded over her mouth; her elbow rested on a table, and her eyes seemed fixed upon the dying charcoal, which was expiring in a small grate. She scarce turned her head when Dame Ursula entered, and when the presence of that estimable matron was more precisely announced in words by the old Scots-woman, Mistress Margaret, without changing her posture, inutered some sort of answer that was wholly unintelligible.

"Go your ways down to the kitchen with Wilsa, good Mistress Jenny," said Dame Ursula, who was used to all sorts of freaks on the part of her patients or clients, whichever they might be termed; "put the stewpan and the porringer by the fire-side, and go down below—I must speak to my pretty love, Mistress Margaret, by myself—and there is not a bachelor betwixt this and Bow but will envy me the privilege."

The attendants retired as directed, and Dame Ursula, having availed herself of the embers of charcoal, to place her stewpan to the best advantage, drew herself as close as she could to her patient, and began in a low, soothing, and confidential tone of voice, to inquire what ailed her pretty flower of neighbours.

"Nothing, dame," said Margaret, somewhat pettishly, and changing her posture so as rather to turn her back upon the kind inquirer.

"Nothing, lady-bird!" answered Dame Suddlechop; "and do you use to send for your friends out of bed at this hour for nothing?"

"It was not I who sent for you, dame," replied the malecontent maiden.

"And who was it, then?" said Ursula; "for if I had not been sent for, I had not been here at this time of night, I promise you!"

"It was the old Scotch fool Jenny, who did it of her own head, I suppose!" said Margaret; "for she has been stunning me these two hours about you and Mother Redcap."

"Me and Mother Redcap!" said Dame Ursula "an old fool indeed, that couples folk up so.—But come, come, my sweet little neighbour, Jenny is a such fool after all; she knows young folks waz more and better advice than her own, and she knows too, where to find it for them; so you must take heart of grace, my pretty maiden, and tell me what you are moping about, and then let Dame Ursula alee for finding out a cure."

"Nay, an ye be so wise, Mother Ursula," replied the girl, "you may guess what I ail without me telling you."

"Ay, ay, child," answered the complaisant matron "no one can play better than I at the good old game of What is my thought like? Now I'll warrant that little head of yours is running on a new head-trail a foot higher than those our city dames wear—or you are all for a trip to Islington or Ware, and your father is cross and will not consent—or"—

"Or you are an old fool, Dame Suddlechop," said Margaret, peevishly, "and must needs trouble yourself about matters you know nothing of."

"Fool as much as you will, mistress," said Dame Ursula, offended in her turn, "but not so very many years older than yourself, mistress."

"Oh! we are angry, are we?" said the beauty; "and pray, Madam Ursula, how come you, that are not so many years older than me, to talk about such nonsense to me, who am so many years younger and who yet have too much sense to care about head-gears and Islington?"

"Well, well, young mistress," said the safe counsellor, rising, "I perceive I can be of no use here; and methinks, since you know your own matters so much better than other people do, you might dispense with disturbing folks at midnight to ask their advice."

"Why, now you are angry, mother," said Margaret, detaining her; "this comes of your coming out at eventide without eating your supper—I never heard you utter a cross word after you had finished your little morsel.—Here, Janet, a trencher and salt for Dame Ursula;—and what have you in that porringer, dame?—Filthy clummy ale, as I would live—Let Janet fling it out of the window, or keep it for my father's morning draught; and she shall bring you the pottle of sack that was set ready for him—good man, he will never find out the difference, for ale will wash down his dusty calculations quite as well as wine."

"Truly, sweetheart, I am of your opinion," said Dame Ursula, whose temporary displeasure vanished at once before these preparations for good cheer; and so, settling herself on the great easy-chair, with a three-legged table before her, she began to despatch with good appetite, the little delicate dish which she had prepared for herself. She did not, however, fail in the duties of civility, and earnestly, but in vain, pressed Mistress Margaret to partake her dainties. The damsel declined the invitation.

"At least pledge me in a glass of sack," said Dame Ursula; "I have heard my grandam say, that before the gospellers came in, the old Catholic father confessors and their penitents always had a cup of sack together before confession; and you are my penitent."

"I shall drink no sack, I am sure," said Margaret:

"and I told you before, that if you cannot find out what ails me, I shall never have the heart to tell it."

So saying, she turned away from Dame Ursula once more, and resumed her musing posture, with her hand on her elbow, and her back, at least one shoulder, turned towards her confidant.

"Nay, then," said Dame Ursula, "I must exert my skill in good earnest.—You must give me this pretty hand, and I will tell you by palmistry, as well as any gipsy of them all, what foot it is you halt upon."

"As if I halted on any foot at all," said Margaret, something scornfully, but yielding her left hand to Ursula, and continuing at the same time her averted position.

"I see brave lines here," said Ursula, "and not ill to read neither—pleasure and wealth, and merry nights and late mornings to my Beauty, and such an equipage as shall shake Whitehall. O, have I touched you there?—and smile you now my pretty one?—for why should not he be Lord Mayor, and go to court in his gilded caroch, as others have done before him?"

"Lord Mayor? pshaw!" replied Margaret.

"And why pshaw at my Lord Mayor, sweet-heart? or perhaps you pshaw at my prophecy; but there is a cross in every one's line of life as well as in yours, darling. And what though I see a 'prentice's flat cap in this pretty palm, yet there is a sparkling black eye under it, hath not its match in the Ward of Farringdon-Without."

"Whom do you mean, dame?" said Margaret, coldly.

"Whom should I mean," said Dame Ursula, "but the prince of 'prentices, and king of good company, Jenkin Vincent?"

"Out, woman—Jenkin Vincent?—a clown—a Cockney!" exclaimed the indignant damsel.

"Ay, sets the wind in that quarter, Beauty!" quoth the dame; "why, it has changed something since we spoke together last, for then I would have sworn it blew fairer for poor Jin Vin; and the poor lad dotes on you too, and would rather see your eyes than the first glimpse of the sun on the great holyday on May-day."

"I would my eyes had the power of the sun to blind his, then," said Margaret, "to teach the drudge his place."

"Nay," said Dame Ursula, "there be some who say that Frank Tunstall is as proper a lad as Jin Vin, and of surety he is third cousin to a knighthood, and come of a good house; and so mayhap you may be for northward ho!"

"Maybe I may"—answered Margaret, "but not with my father's 'prentice—I thank you, Dame Ursula."

"Nay, then, the devil may guess your thoughts for me," said Dame Ursula; "this comes of trying to shoe a filly that is eternally wincing and shifting ground!"

"Hear me, then," said Margaret, "and mind what I say.—This day I dined abroad"—

"I can tell you where," answered her counsellor,—"with your godfather the rich goldsmith—ay, you see I know something—nay, I could tell you, an I would, with whom, too."

"Indeed!" said Margaret, turning suddenly round with an accent of strong surprise, and colouring up to the eyes.

"With old Sir Mungo Malagrowth," said the oracular dame,—"he was trimmed in my Benjamin's shop in his way to the city."

"Pshaw! the frightful old mouldy skeleton!" said the damsel.

"Indeed you say true, my dear," replied the confidant,—"it is a shame to him to be out of Saint Pancras's charnel-house, for I know no other place he is fit for, the foul-mouthed old railer. He said to my husband"—

"Somewhat which signifies nothing to our purpose, I dare say," interrupted Margaret. "I must speak, then.—There dined with us a nobleman"—

"A nobleman! the maiden's mad!" said Dame Ursula.

"There dined with us, I say," continued Margaret, without regarding the interruption, "a nobleman—a Scottish nobleman."

"Now Our Lady keep her!" said the confidant, "she is quite frantic!—heard ever any one of a watchmaker's daughter falling in love with a nobleman—and a Scots nobleman, to make the matter complete, who are all as proud as Lucifer, and as poor as Job?—A Scots nobleman, quotha? I had as lief you told me of a Jew pedler. I would have you think how all this is to end, pretty one, before you jump in the dark."

"That is nothing to you, Ursula—it is your assistance," said Mistress Margaret, "and not your advice, that I am desirous to have, and you know I can make it worth your while."

"O, it is not for the sake of lucre, Mistress Margaret," answered the obliging dame; "but truly I would have you listen to some advice—bethink you of your own condition."

"My father's calling is mechanical," said Margaret, "but our blood is not so. I have heard my father say that we are descended, at a distance indeed, from the great Earls of Dalwalsey."*

"Ay, ay," said Dame Ursula; "even so—I never knew a Scot of you but was descended, as ye call it, from some great house or other; and a piteous descent it often is—and as for the distance you speak of, it is so great as to put you out of sight of each other. Yet do not toss your pretty head so scornfully, but tell me the name of this lordly northern gallant, and we will try what can be done in the matter."

"It is Lord Glenvarloch, whom they call Lord Nigel Olifaunt," said Margaret in a low voice, and turning away to hide her blushes.

"Marry, Heaven forefend!" exclaimed Dame Suddlechop; "this is the very devil, and something worse!"

"How mean you?" said the damsel, surprised at the vivacity of her exclamation.

"Why, know ye not," said the dame, "what powerful enemies he has at Court? know ye not—But blisters on my tongue, it runs too fast for my wit—enough to say, that you had better make your bridal-bed under a falling house, than think of young Glenvarloch."

"He is unfortunate, then?" said Margaret; "I knew it—I divined it—there was sorrow in his voice when he said even what was gay—there was a touch of misfortune in his melancholy smile—he had not thus clung to my thoughts had I seen him in all the mid-day glare of prosperity."

"Romances have cracked her brain!" said Dame Ursula; "she is a castaway girl—utterly distraught—loves a Scots lord—and likes him the better for being unfortunate! Well, mistress, I am sorry this is a matter I cannot aid you in—it goes against my conscience, and it is an affair above my condition, and beyond my management; but I will keep your counsel."

"You will not be so base as to desert me, after having drawn my secret from me?" said Margaret, indignantly; "if you do, I know how to have my revenge; and if you do not, I will reward you well. Remember the house your husband dwells in is my father's property."

"I remember it but too well, Mistress Margaret," said Ursula, after a moment's reflection, "and I would serve you in any thing in my condition; but to meddle with such high matters—I shall never forget poor Mistress Turner,† my honoured patroness,

* The head of the ancient and distinguished house of Ramsay, and of whom, as their chief, the individuals of that name look as their origin and source of gentry. Allan Ramsay, the pastoral poet in the same manner, makes "Dalhousie of an auld descent,

My chief, my stoup, my ornament."

† Mrs. Anne Turner was a dame somewhat of the occupation of Mrs. Suddlechop in the text; that is, half milliner half procuress, and secret agent in all manner of proceedings. She was a trafficker in the poisoning of Sir Thomas Overbury, for which so many subordinate agents lost their lives, while, to the great scandal of justice, the Earl of Somerset and his Countess were suffered to escape, upon a threat of Somerset to make public some secret which nearly affected his master, King James. Mrs. Turner introduced into England a French custom of using yellow starch in getting up bands and cuffs, and, by Lord Coke's orders, she appeared in that fashion at the place of execution.

peace be with her!—she had the ill-luck to meddle in the matter of Somerset and Overbury, and so the great earl and his lady slipt their necks out of the collar, and left her and some half-dozen others to suffer in their stead. I shall never forget the sight of her standing on the scaffold with the ruff round her pretty neck, all done up with the yellow starch which I had so often helped her to make, and that was so soon to give place to a rough hempen cord. Such a sight, sweetheart, will make one loath to meddle with matters that are too hot or heavy for their handling."

"Out, you fool!" answered Mistress Margaret; "am I one to speak to you about such criminal practices as that wretch died for? All I desire of you is, to get me precise knowledge of what affair brings this young nobleman to Court."

"And when you have his secret," said Ursula, "what will it avail you, sweetheart?—and yet I would do your errand, if you could do as much for me."

"And what is it you would have of me?" said Mistress Margaret.

"What you have been angry with me for asking before," answered Dame Ursula. "I want to have some light about the story of your godfather's ghost, that is only seen at prayers."

"Not for the world," said Mistress Margaret, "will I be a spy on my kind godfather's secrets—No, Ursula—that I will never pry into, which he desires to keep hidden. But thou knowest that I have a fortune of my own, which must at no distant day come under my own management—think of some other recompense."

"Ay, that I well know," said the counsellor—"it is that two hundred per year, with your father's indulgence, that makes you so wilful, sweetheart."

"It may be so,"—said Margaret Ramsay; "meanwhile, do you serve me truly, and here is a ring of value in pledge, that when my fortune is in my own hand, I will redeem the token with fifty broad pieces of gold."

"Fifty broad pieces of gold;" repeated the dame; "and this ring, which is a right fair one, in token you fail not of your word!—Well, sweetheart, if I must put my throat in peril, I am sure I cannot risk it for a friend more generous than you; and I would not think of more than the pleasure of serving you, only Benjamin gets more idle every day, and our family"—

"Say no more of it," said Margaret; "we understand each other. And now, tell me what you know of this young man's affairs, which made you so unwilling to meddle with them?"

"Of that I can say no great matter, as yet," answered Dame Ursula; "only I know, the most powerful among his own countrymen are against him, and also the most powerful at the Court here. But I will learn more of it; for it will be a dim print that I will not read for your sake, pretty Mistress Margaret. Know you where this gallant dwells?"

"I heard by accident," said Margaret, as if ashamed of the minute particularity of her memory upon such an occasion,— "he lodges, I think—at one Christie's—if I mistake not—at Paul's Wharf—a ship-chandler's."

"A proper lodging for a young baron!—Well, but cheer you up, Mistress Margaret—If he has come up a caterpillar, like some of his countrymen, he may cast his slough like them, and come out a butterfly.—So I drink good-night, and sweet dreams to you, in another parting cup of sack; and you shall hear tidings of me within four-and-twenty hours. And, she was the widow of a physician, and had been eminently beautiful, as appears from the description of her in the poem called Overbury's Vision. There was produced in court a parcel of dolls or puppets belonging to this lady, some naked, some dressed, and which she used for exhibiting fashions upon. But, greatly to the horror of the spectators, who accounted these figures to be magical devices, there was, on their being shown, "heard a crack from the scaffold, which caused great fear, tumult, and confusion, among the spectators and throughout the hall, every one fearing hurt, as if the devil had been present, and grown angry to have his workmanship showed to such as were not his own scholars." Compare this curious passage in the History of King James for the First Fourteen Years, 1651, with the Aulicus Coquinarius of Dr. Heylin. Both works are published in the Secret History of King James.

once more, I commend you to your pillow, my of pearls, and Marguerite of Marguerites!"

So saying, she kissed the reluctant cheek of young friend, or patroness, and took her departure with the light and stealthy pace of one accustomed to accommodate her footsteps to the purposes of patch and secrecy.

Margaret Ramsay looked after her for some time in anxious silence. "I did ill," she at length murmured, "to let her wring this out of me; but artful, bold, and serviceable—and I think so or, if not, she will be true at least to her interest that I can command. I would I had not, however—I have begun a hopeless work. For he has said to me, to warrant my meddling in tunes?—Nothing but words of the most ordinary port—mere table-talk, and terms of course. 'You know'—she said, and then broke off, looking in the glass the while; which, as it reflected back a great beauty, probably suggested to her mind a favourable conclusion of the sentence than she to trust her tongue withal."

CHAPTER IX.

So pitiful a thing is suitor's state!
Most miserable man, whom wicked fate
Hath brought to Court to sue, for Had I wist,
That few have found, and many a one hath miss'
Full little knowest thou, that hast not tried,
What hell it is, in suing long to bide:
To lose good days that might be better spent;
To waste long nights in pensive discontent;
To speed to-day, to be put back to-morrow;
To feed on hope, to pine with fear and sorrow;
To have thy Prince's grace yet want her Peers';
To have thy asking, yet wait many years;
To fret thy soul with crosses and with cares—
To eat thy heart through comfortless despair.
To fawn, to crouch, to wait, to ride, to run,
To spend, to give, to want, to be undone.

Mother Hubbard's

On the morning of the day on which George had prepared to escort the young Lord of Glenvarloch to the Court at Whitehall, it may be reasonably supposed, that the young man, whose fortune likely to depend on this cast, felt himself more usually anxious. He rose early, made his toilet with uncommon care, and, being enabled, by the gift of his more plebeian countryman, to set out in a handsome person to the best advantage, he obtained a momentary approbation of himself as he looked at the mirror, and a loud and distinct plaud from his landlady, who declared at once, that, in his opinion, he would take the wind out of the sails of the gallant in the presence—so much had she been to enrich her discourse with the metaphors of the man with whom her husband dealt.

At the appointed hour, the barge of Master Heriot arrived, handsomely manned and appointed, having a tilt with his own cipher, and the name of his company painted thereupon.

The young Lord of Glenvarloch received his friend, who had evinced such disinterestedness, with the kind courtesy which well became him.

Master Heriot then made him acquainted with the bounty of his Sovereign; which he paid over to his young friend, declining what he had himself advanced to him. Nigel felt all the gratitude which the citizen's disinterested friendship had developed, and was not wanting in expressing it suitably.

Yet, as the young and high-born nobleman barked to go to the presence of his Prince, under the patronage of one whose best, or most distinguishing qualification, was his being an eminent member of the Goldsmith's Incorporation, he felt a little surprised, if not abashed, at his own situation. Richie Moniplies, as he stepped over the gangway to take his place forward in the boat, could not help muttering,— "It was a changed day betwixt Master Heriot and his honest father in the Kræmes; doubtless, there was a difference between clinking gold and silver, and clattering upon pewter."

On they glided, by the assistance of the four stout watermen, along the Thames, which served for the principal high-road betwixt London and Westminster; for few ventured on hor-through the narrow and crowded streets of the city, and coaches were then a luxury reserved only for the higher nobility, and to which no citizen, whatever was his wealth, presumed to aspire. The beauty of the banks, especially on the northern side, where the gardens of the nobility descended from their hotels, in many places, down to the water's edge, was pointed out to Nigel by his kind conductor, and was pointed out in vain. The mind of the young Lord of Glenvarloch was filled with anticipations, not the most pleasant, concerning the manner in which he was likely to be received by that monarch, in whose behalf his family had been nearly reduced to ruin; and he was, with the usual mental anxiety of those in such a situation, framing imaginary questions from the King, and over-toiling his spirit in devising answers to them.

His conductor saw the labour of Nigel's mind, and avoided increasing it by farther conversation; so that, when he had explained to him briefly the ceremonies observed at Court on such occasions of presentation, the rest of their voyage was performed in silence.

They landed at Whitehall Stairs, and entered the Palace after announcing their names,—the guards paying to Lord Glenvarloch the respect and honours due to his rank.

The young man's heart beat high and thick within him as he came into the royal apartments. His education abroad, conducted, as it had been, on a narrow and limited scale, had given him but imperfect ideas of the grandeur of a Court; and the philosophical reflections which taught him to set ceremonial and exterior splendour at defiance, proved, like other maxims of mere philosophy, ineffectual, at the moment they were weighed against the impression naturally made on the mind of an inexperienced youth, by the unusual magnificence of the scene. The splendid apartments through which they passed, the rich apparel of the grooms, guards, and domestics in waiting, and the ceremonial attending their passage through the long suite of apartments, had something in it, trifling and commonplace as it might appear to practised courtiers, embarrassing and even alarming, to one, who went through these forms for the first time, and who was doubtful what sort of reception was to accompany his first appearance before his Sovereign.

Heriot, in anxious attention to save his young friend from any momentary awkwardness, had taken care to give the necessary password to the warders, grooms of the chambers, ushers, or by whatever name they were designated; so they passed on without interruption.

In this manner they passed several anterooms, filled chiefly with guards, attendants of the Court, and their acquaintances, male and female, who, dressed in their best apparel, and with eyes rounded by eager curiosity to make the most of their opportunity, stood, with beseeching modesty, ranked against the wall, in a manner which indicated that they were spectators, not performers, in the courtly exhibition.

Through these exterior apartments Lord Glenvarloch and his city friend advanced into a large and splendid withdrawing-room, communicating with the presence-chamber, into which anteroom were admitted those only, who, from birth, their posts in the state or household, or by the particular grant of the King, had right to attend the Court, as men entitled to pay their respects to their Sovereign.

Amid this favoured and selected company, Nigel observed Sir Mungo Malagrowth, who, avoided and discountenanced by those who knew how low he stood in Court interest and favour, was but too happy in the opportunity of hooking himself upon a person of Lord Glenvarloch's rank, who was, as yet, so inexperienced as to feel it difficult to shake off an intruder.

The knight forthwith framed his grim features to a ghastly smile, and, after a preliminary and patronising nod to George Heriot, accompanied with an aristocratic wave of the hand, which intimated at once superiority and protection, he laid aside altogether the honest citizen, to whom he owed many a dinner, to attach himself exclusively to the young lord, although he suspected he might be occasionally in the predicament of needing one as much as himself. And even the notice of this original, singular and unamiable as he was, was not entirely indifferent to Lord Glenvarloch, since the absolute and somewhat constrained silence of his good friend Heriot, which left him at liberty to retire painfully to his own agitating reflections, was now relieved; while on the other hand, he could not help feeling interest in the sharp and sarcastic information poured upon him by an observant, though discontented courtier, to whom a patient auditor, and he a man of title and rank, was as much a prize, as his acute and communicative disposition rendered him an entertaining companion to Nigel Olifaunt. Heriot, in the meantime, neglected by Sir Mungo, and avoiding every attempt by which the grateful politeness of Lord Glenvarloch strove to bring him into the conversation, stood by, with a kind of half smile on his countenance; but whether excited by Sir Mungo's wit, or arising at his expense, did not exactly appear.

In the meantime, the trio occupied a nook of the anteroom, next to the door of the presence-chamber, which was not yet thrown open, when Maxwell, with his rod of office, came bustling into the apartment, where most men, excepting those of high rank, made way for him. He stopped beside the party in which we are interested, looked for a moment at the young Scots nobleman, then made a slight obeisance to Heriot, and lastly, addressing Sir Mungo Malagrowth, began a hurried complaint to him of the misbehaviour of the gentlemen-pensioners and warders, who suffered all sort of citizens, suitors, and scriveners, to sneak into the outer apartments, without either respect or decency.—“The English,” he said, “were scandalized, for such a thing durst not be attempted in the Queen's days. In her time, there was then the court-yard for the mobility; and the apartments for the nobility; and it reflects on your place, Sir Mungo,” he added, “belonging to the household as you do, that such things should not be better ordered.”

Here Sir Mungo, afflicted, as was frequently the case on such occasions, with one of his usual fits of deafness, answered, “It was no wonder the mobility used freedoms, when those whom they saw in office were so little better in blood and havings than themselves.”

“Were you lauding the taste of my embroidery, Maister Maxwell?” answered the knight, who apparently interpreted the deputy chamberlain's meaning rather from his action than his words;—“it is of an ancient and liberal pattern, having been made by your mother's father, auld James Stitchell, a master-fashioner of honest repute, in Merlin's Wynd, whom I made a point to employ, as I am now happy to remember, seeing your father thought fit to intermarry with sic a person's daughter.”*

Maxwell looked stern; but conscious there was nothing to be got of Sir Mungo in the way of amends, and that prosecuting the quarrel with such an adversary would only render him ridiculous, and make a public mis-alliance of which he had no reason to be proud, he covered his resentment with a sneer; and expressing his regret that Sir Mungo was become too deaf to understand or attend to what was said to him, walked on, and planted himself beside the folding-doors of the presence-chamber, at which he was to perform the duty of deputy-chamberlain, or usher, so soon as they should be opened.

“The door of the presence is about to open,” said the goldsmith, in a whisper, to his young friend; “my condition permits me to go no farther with you. Fail not to present yourself boldly, according to your birth, and offer your Supplication; which the King will not refuse to accept, and, as I hope, to consider favourably."

As he spoke, the door of the presence-chamber opened accordingly, and, as is usual on such occasions, the courtiers began to advance towards it, and to enter in a slow, but continuous and uninterrupted stream.

As Nigel presented himself in his turn at the entrance, and mentioned his name and title, Maxwell seemed to hesitate. "You are not known to any one," he said. "It is my duty to suffer no one to pass to the presence, my lord, whose face is unknown to me, unless upon the word of a responsible person."

"I came with Master George Heriot," said Nigel, in some embarrassment at this unexpected interruption.

"Master Heriot's name will pass current for much gold and silver, my lord," replied Maxwell, with a civil sneer, "but not for birth and rank. I am compelled by my office to be peremptory.—The entrance is impeded—I am much concerned to say it—your lordship must stand back."

"What is the matter?" said an old Scottish nobleman, who had been speaking with George Heriot, after he had separated from Nigel, and who now came forward, observing the altercation betwixt the latter and Maxwell.

"It is only Master Deputy Chamberlain Maxwell," said Sir Mungo Malagrowth, "expressing his joy to see Lord Glenvarloch at Court, whose father gave him his office—at least I think he is speaking to that purport—for your lordship kens my imperfection." A subdued laugh, such as the situation permitted, passed round amongst those who heard this specimen of Sir Mungo's sarcastic temper. But the old nobleman stepped still more forward, saying—What!—the son of my gallant old opponent, Ochtrede Olfaut?—I will introduce him to the presence myself."

So saying, he took Nigel by the arm, without farther ceremony, and was about to lead him forward, when Maxwell, still keeping his rod across the door, said, but with hesitation and embarrassment—"My lord, this gentleman is not known, and I have orders to be scrupulous."

"Tutti-taiti, man," said the old lord, "I will be answerable he is his father's son, from the cut of his eyebrow—and thou, Maxwell, knewest his father well enough to have spared thy scruples. Let us pass, man." So saying, he put aside the deputy chamberlain's rod, and entered the presence-room, still holding the young nobleman by the arm.

"Why, I must know you, man," he said; "I must know you. I knew your father well, man, and I have broke a lance and crossed a blade with him; and it is to my credit that I am living to brag of it. He was king's-man, and I was Queen's-man, during the Douglas wars—young fellows both, that feared neither fire nor steel; and we had some old feudal quarrels besides, that had come down from father to son, with our seal-rings, two-handed broadswords, and plate-coats, and the crests on our burgonets."

"Too loud, my Lord of Huntinglen," whispered a gentleman of the chamber—"the King!—the King!"

The old Earl (for such he proved) took the hint, and was silent; and James, advancing from a side-door, received in succession the compliments of strangers, while a little group of favourite courtiers, or officers of the household, stood around him, to whom he addressed himself from time to time. Some more pains had been bestowed on his toilet than upon the occasion when we first presented the monarch to our readers; but there was natural awkwardness about his figure which prevented his clothes from sitting handsomely, and the prudence or timidity of his disposition had made him adopt the custom already noticed, of wearing a dress so thickly quilted as might withstand the stroke of a dagger, which added an ungainly stiffness to his whole appearance, contrasting oddly with the frivolous, ungraceful, and fidgeting motions with which he accompanied his conversation. And yet, though the King's deportment was very undignified, he had a manner so kind, familiar, and good-humoured, was so little apt to veil over or conceal his own foibles, and had so much indulgence and sympathy for those of others, that in address, joined to his learning, and a certain proportion of shrewd mother-wit, failed not to make a favourable impression on those who approached his person.

When the Earl of Huntinglen had presented Nigel to his sovereign, a ceremony which the good peer took upon himself, the King received the young lord very graciously, and observed to his introducer, that he "was fain to see them twa stand side by side; for I trow, my Lord Huntinglen," continued he, "your ancestors, ay, and e'en your lordship's self and the lad's father, have stood front to front at the sword-point, and that is a worse posture."

"Until your Majesty," said Lord Huntinglen, "made Lord Ochtrede and me cross palms, upon this memorable day when your Majesty feasted all the nobles that were at feud together, and made us join hands in your presence."

"I mind it weel," said the King; "I mind it weel—it was a blessed day, being the nineteen of September of all days in the year—and it was a blithe sport to see how some of the carls girmed as they clapped hands together. By my saul, I thought some of the mair special the Highland chiefs, wad have broken in our own presence; but we caused them to march hand in hand to the Cross, ourselves leading in way, and there drink a blithe cup of kindness with ilk other, to the stanching of feud, and perpetuation of amity. Auld John Anderson was Provost the year—the carle grat for joy, and the Bailies and Councillors danced bareheaded in our presence the five year-auld-colts, for very triumph."

"It was indeed a happy day," said Lord Huntinglen, "and will not be forgotten in the history of your Majesty's reign."

"I would not that it were, my lord," replied the Monarch—"I would not that it were pretermitted in our annals. Ay, ay—Beati pacifici. My English lieges here may weel make much of me, for I would have them to know, they have gotten the only peaceable man that ever came of my family. If James with the Fiery Face had come amongst you," he said, looking round him, "or my great grandsire, of Flodden memory!"

"We should have sent him back to the north again," whispered one English nobleman.

"At least," said another, in the same inaudible tone, "we should have had a man to our sovereign, though he were but a Scotsman."

"And now, my young springald," said the King to Lord Glenvarloch, "where have you been spending your calf-time?"

"At Leyden, of late, may it please your Majesty," answered Lord Nigel.

"Aha! a scholar," said the King; "and by my saul, a modest and ingenuous youth, that hath not forgotten how to blush, like most of our travelled Monsieurs. We will treat him conformably."

Then drawing himself up, coughing slightly, and looking around him with the conscious importance of superior learning, while all the courtiers who understood, or understood not, Latin, pressed eagerly forward to listen, the sapient monarch prosecuted his inquiries as follows:—

"Hem! hem! Salve his, quaterque salve, Glenvarlochides noster! Nuperumne ab Lugduno Batarorum Britanniam rediisti?

The young nobleman replied, bowing low—

"Imo, Rex augustissime—biennium fere apud Lugdunenses moratus sum."

James proceeded—

"Biennium dicis? bene, bene, optime factum est—Non uno die, quod dicunt—intelligisti, Domine Glenvarlochiensis? Aha!"

Nigel replied by a reverend bow, and the King, turning to those behind him, said—

"Adolescens quidem ingenui rullus ingenuique pudoris." Then resumed his learned queries. "Et quid hodie Lugdunenses loquuntur—Vossius rector nihil noli scripsit?—nihil certe, quod doleo, typis recens edidit."

"Valeat quidem Vossius, Rex benecole," replied Nigel.

gel, "ast senex veneratissimus annum agit, ni fallor, septuagesimum."

"Virum, mehercle, vix tam grandætum crediderim," replied the Monarch. "Et Vorstius iste?—Arminii improbi successor æque ac sectator—Herosne adhuc, ut cum Homero loquar, Ζῶδς ἐστὶ καὶ ἐπὶ λθῶνι δέσπων?"

Nigel, by good fortune, remembered that Vorstius, the divine last mentioned in his Majesty's queries about the state of Dutch literature, had been engaged in a personal controversy with James, in which the King had taken so deep an interest, as at length to hint in his public correspondence with the United States, that they would do well to apply the secular arm to stop the progress of heresy by violent measures against the Professor's person—a demand which their Mighty Mightinesses' principles of universal toleration induced them to elude, though with some difficulty. Knowing all this, Lord Glenvarloch, though a courtier of only five minutes' standing, had address enough to reply—

"Virum quidem, haud diu est, hominem ridebam—vigere autem quis dicat qui sub fulminibus eloquentiæ tuæ, Rex magne, jamdudum pronus jacet, et prostratus."*

This last tribute to his polemical powers completed James's happiness, which the triumph of exhibiting his erudition had already raised to a considerable height.

He rubbed his hands, snapped his fingers, fidgeted, chuckled, exclaimed—"Euge! belle! optime!" and turning to the Bishops of Exeter and Oxford, who stood behind him, he said,—“Ye see, my lords, no bad specimen of our Scottish Latinity, with which language we would all our subjects of England were as well imbued as this, and other youths of honourable birth, in our auld kingdom; also, we keep the genuine and Roman pronunciation, like other learned nations on the continent, sae that we hold communion with any scholar in the universe, who can but speak the Latin tongue; whereas ye, our learned subjects of England, have introduced into your universities, otherwise most learned, a fashion of pronouncing like unto the 'nippit foot and clippit foot' of the bride in the fairy tale, whilk manner of speech (take it not amiss that I be round with you) can be understood by no nation on earth saving yourselves; whereby Latin, quoad Anglos, ceaseth to be communis lingua, the general dragoman, or interpreter, between all the wise men of the earth.”

The Bishop of Exeter bowed, as in acquiescence to the royal censure; but he of Oxford stood upright, as mindful over what subjects his see extended, and as being equally willing to become food for fagots in defence of the Latinity of the university, as for any article of his religious creed.

The King, without awaiting an answer from either prelate, proceeded to question Lord Nigel, but in the vernacular tongue,—“Weel, my likely Alumnus of the Muses, and what make you so far from the north?”

“To pay my homage to your Majesty,” said the young nobleman, kneeling on one knee, “and to lay before you,” he added, “this my humble and dutiful Supplication.”

The presenting of a pistol would certainly have startled King James more, but could (setting apart the fright) hardly have been more displeasing to his indolent disposition.

“And is it even so, man?” said he; “and can no single man, were it but for the rarity of the case, ever come up frae Scotland, excepting ex proposito—on set purpose, to see what he can make out of his loving sovereign? It is but three days syne that we had weel-nigh lost our life, and put three kingdoms into dule-weeds, from the over haste of a clumsy-handed peasant, to thrust a packet into our hand, and now we are beset by the like impediment in our very Court. To our Secretary with that gear, my lord—to our Secretary with that gear.”

* Let any lady or gentleman should suspect there is aught of mystery concealed under the sentences printed in Italics, they will be pleased to understand that they contain only a few commonplace Latin phrases, relating to the state of letters in Holland, which neither deserve, nor would endure a literal translation.

F

“I have already offered my humble Supplication to your Majesty's Secretary of State,” said Lord Glenvarloch—“but it seems”—

“That he would not receive it, I warrant?” said the King, interrupting him; “by my saul, our Secretary kens that point of king-craft, called refusing, better than we do, and will look at nothing but what he likes himself—I think I wad make a better Secretary to him than he to me.—Weel, my lord, you are welcome to London; and, as ye seem an acute and learned youth, I advise ye to turn your neb northward as soon as ye like, and settle yoursell for a while at Saint Andrews, and we will be right glad to hear that you prosper in your studies.—Incumbite remis fortiter.”

While the King spoke thus, he held the petition of the young lord carelessly, like one who only delayed till the suppliant's back was turned, to throw it away, or at least lay it aside to be no more looked at. The petitioner, who read this in his cold and indifferent looks, and in the manner in which he twisted and crumpled together the paper, arose with a bitter sense of anger and disappointment, made a profound obeisance, and was about to retire hastily. But Lord Huntinglen, who stood by him, checked his intention by an almost imperceptible touch upon the skirt of his cloak, and Nigel, taking the hint, retreated only a few steps from the royal presence, and then made a pause. In the meantime, Lord Huntinglen kneeled before James, in his turn, and said—“May it please your Majesty to remember, that upon one certain occasion you did promise to grant me a boon every year of your sacred life.”†

“I mind it weel, man,” answered James, “I mind it weel, and good reason why—it was when you unclasped the fause traitor Ruthven's fangs from about our royal throat, and drove your dirk into him like a true subject. We did then, as you remind us, (whilk was unnecessary,) being partly beside ourselves with joy at our liberation, promise we would grant you a free boon every year; whilk promise, on our coming to menseful possession of our royal faculties, we did confirm, restrictivè always and conditionaliter, that your lordship's demand should be such as we, in our royal discretion, should think reasonable.”

“Even so, gracious Sovereign,” said the old Earl, “and may I yet farther crave to know if I have ever exceeded the bounds of your royal benevolence?”

“By my word, man, no!” said the King; “I cannot remember you have asked much for yourself, if it be not a dog, or a hawk, or a buck out of our park, at Theobald's, or such like. But to what serves this preface?”

“To the boon which I am now to ask of your Grace,” said Lord Huntinglen; “which is, that your Majesty would be pleased, on the instant, to look at the placet of Lord Glenvarloch, and do upon it what your own just and royal nature shall think meet and just, without reference to your Secretary or any other of your Council.”

“By my saul, my lord, this is strange,” said the King; “ye are pleading for the son of your enemy!”

“Of one who was my enemy till your Majesty made him my friend,” answered Lord Huntinglen.

“Weel spoken, my lord!” said the King; “and with a true Christian spirit. And, respecting the Supplication of this young man, I partly guess where the matter lies; and in plain troth I had promised to George Heriot to be good to the lad—But then, here the shoe pinches. Steenie and Baby Charles cannot abide him—neither can your own son, my lord; and so, methinks, he had better go down to Scotland before he comes to ill luck by them.”

† The credit of having rescued James I. from the dagger of Alexander Ruthven, is here fictitiously ascribed to an imaginary Lord Huntinglen. In reality, as may be read in every history, his preserver was John Ramsay, afterwards created Earl of Holderness, who stabbed the younger Ruthven with his dagger while he was struggling with the King. Sir Anthony Weldon informs us, that, upon the annual return of the day, the King's deliverance was commemorated by an anniversary feast. The time was the fifth of August, “upon which,” proceeds the satirical historian, “Sir John Ramsay, for his good service in that preservation, was the principal guest, and so did the King grant him any boon he would ask that day. But he had such limitation made to his asking, as made his suit as unprofitable, as the action for which he asked it for was unserviceable to the King.”

"My son, an it please your Majesty, so far as he is concerned, shall not direct my doings," said the Earl, "nor any wild-headed young man of them all."

"Why, neither shall they mine," replied the Monarch; "by my father's soul, none of them all shall play Rex with me—I will do what I will, and what I aught, like a free King."

"Your Majesty will then grant me my boon?" said the Lord Huntinglen.

"Ay, marry will I—marry will I," said the King; "but follow me this way, man, where we may be more private."

He led Lord Huntinglen with rather a hurried step through the courtiers, all of whom gazed earnestly on this unwonted scene, as is the fashion of all courts on similar occasions. The King passed into a little cabinet, and bade, in the first moment, Lord Huntinglen lock or bar the door; but countermanded his direction in the next, saying—"No, no, no—bread o' life, man, I am a free King—will do what I will and what I should—I am justus et tenax propositi, man—nevertheless, keep by the door, Lord Huntinglen, in case Steenie should come in with his mad humour."

"O my poor master!" groaned the Earl of Huntinglen. "When you were in your own cold country, you had warmer blood in your veins."

The King hastily looked over the petition or memorial, every now and then glancing his eye towards the door, and then sinking it hastily on the paper, ashamed that Lord Huntinglen, whom he respected, should suspect him of timidity.

"To grant the truth," he said, after he had finished his hasty perusal, "this is a hard case; and harder than it was represented to me, though I had some inkling of it before. And so the lad only wants payment of the siller due from us, in order to reclaim his paternal estate? But then, Huntinglen, the lad will have other debts—and why burden himself with so many acres of barren woodland? let the land gang, man, let the land gang; Steenie has the promise of it from our Scottish Chancellor—it is the best hunting ground in Scotland—and Baby Charles and Steenie want to kill a buck there this next year—they maun hae the land—they maun hae the land; and our debt shall be paid to the young man plack and bawbee, and he may have the spending of it at our Court; or if he has such an eard hunger, wouns! man, we'll stuff his stomach with English land, which is worth twice as much, ay, ten times as much, as these accursed hills and heughis, and mosses and muirs, that he is so keen after."

All this while the poor King ambled up and down the apartment in a piteous state of uncertainty, which was made more ridiculous by his shambling circular mode of managing his legs, and his ungainly fashion on such occasions of fiddling with the bunches of ribands which fastened the lower part of his dress.

Lord Huntinglen listened with great composure, and answered, "An it please your Majesty, there was an answer yielded by Naboth when Ahab coveted his vineyard—The Lord forbid that I should give the inheritance of my fathers unto thee."

"Ey, my lord—ey, my lord!" ejaculated James, while all the colour mounted both to his cheek and nose; "I hope ye mean not to teach me divinity?—Ye need not fear, my lord, that I will shun to do justice to every man; and, since your lordship will give me no help to take up this in a more peaceful manner—whilk, methinks, would be better for the young man, as I said before,—why—since it maun be so—'sdeath, I am a free King, man, and he shall have his money and redeem his land, and make a kirk and a miln of it, an he will." So saying, he hastily wrote an order on the Scottish Exchequer for the sum in question, and then added, "How they are to pay it, I see not; but I warrant he will find money on the order among the goldsmiths, who can find it for every one but me.—And now you see, my Lord of Huntinglen, that I am neither an untrue man, to deny you the boon whilk I became bound for, nor an Ahab, to covet Naboth's vineyard; nor a mere nose-of-wax, to be twisted this way and that, by favourites and counsellors at their pleasure. I think you will grant now that I am none of those?"

"You are my own native and noble Prince," said Huntinglen, as he knelt to kiss the royal hand—"just and generous, whenever you listen to the workings of your own heart."

"Ay, ay," said the King, laughing good-naturedly, as he raised his faithful servant from the ground, "that is what ye all say when I do any thing to please ye. There—there, take the sign-manual, and away with you and this young fellow. I wonder Steenie and Baby Charles have not broken in on us before now."

Lord Huntinglen hastened from the cabinet, foreseeing a scene at which he was unwilling to be present, but which sometimes occurred when James roused himself so far as to exert his own free will of which he boasted so much, in spite of that of his imperious favourite Steenie, as he called the Duke of Buckingham, from a supposed resemblance between the very handsome countenance, and that with which the Italian artists represented the proto-martyr Stephen. In fact, the haughty favourite, who had the unusual good fortune to stand as high in the opinion of the heir-apparent as of the existing monarch, had considerably diminished in his respect towards the latter; and it was apparent, to the more shrewd courtiers, that James endured his domination rather for habit, timidity, and a dread of encountering his stormy passions, than from any heartfelt continuance of regard towards him, whose greatness had been the work of his own hands. To save himself the pain of seeing what was likely to take place on the Duke's return, and to preserve the King from the additional humiliation which the presence of such a witness must have occasioned, the Earl left the cabinet as speedily as possible, having first carefully pocketed the important sign-manual.

No sooner had he entered the presence-room, than he hastily sought Lord Glenvarloch, who had withdrawn into the embrasure of one of the windows from the general gaze of men who seemed disposed only to afford him the notice which arises from surprise and curiosity, and, taking him by the arm, without speaking, led him out of the presence-chamber into the first anteroom. Here they found the worthy goldsmith, who approached them with looks of curiosity, which were checked by the old lord, who said hastily,—"All is well.—Is your barge in waiting?" Heriot answered in the affirmative. "Then," said Lord Huntinglen, "you shall give me a cast in it, as the watermen say, and I, in requital, will give you both your dinner; for we must have some conversation together."

They both followed the Earl without speaking, and were in the second anteroom when the important announcement of the ushers, and the hasty murmur with which all made ample way as the company repeated to each other,—"The Duke—the Duke!" made them aware of the approach of the omnipotent favourite.

He entered, that unhappy minion of court favour, sumptuously dressed in the picturesque attire which will live for ever on the canvass of Vandyke, and which marks so well the proud age, when aristocracy, though undermined and nodding to its fall, still, by external show and profuse expense, endeavoured to assert its paramount superiority over the inferior orders. The handsome and commanding countenance, stately form, and graceful action and manner of the Duke of Buckingham, made him become the picturesque dress beyond any man of his time. At present, however, his countenance seemed discomposed, his dress a little more disordered than became the place, his step hasty, and his voice imperative.

All marked the angry spot upon his brow, and bore back so suddenly to make way for him, that the Earl of Huntinglen, who affected no extraordinary haste on the occasion, with his companions, who could not, if they would, have decently left him, remained as it were by themselves in the middle of the room, and in the very path of the angry favourite. He touched his cap sternly as he looked on Huntinglen, but unbonneted to Heriot, and sunk his beaver, with its shadowy plume, as low as the floor, with a profound air of mock respect. In returning his greeting which he did simply and unaffectedly; the citizen only said,—“Too much courtesy, my lord duke, is often the reverse of kindness.”

“I grieve you should think so, Master Heriot,” answered the Duke; “I only meant, by my homage, to claim your protection, sir—your patronage. You are become, I understand, a solicitor of suits—a promoter—an undertaker—a fautor of court suitors of merit and quality, who chance to be penniless. I trust your bags will bear you out in your new boast.”

“They will bear me the farther, my lord duke,” answered the goldsmith, “that my boast is but small.”

“O, you do yourself less than justice, my good Master Heriot,” continued the Duke, in the same tone of irony; “you have a marvellous court-faction, to be the son of an Edinburgh tinker. Have the goodness to prefer me to the knowledge of the high-born nobleman who is honoured and advantaged by your patronage.”

The Duke coloured still more high as he bowed to Lord Glenvarloch scornfully, a courtesy which the other returned haughtily, and with restrained indignation. “We know each other, then,” said the Duke, after a moment’s pause; and as if he had seen something in the young nobleman which merited more serious notice than the bitter railery with which he had commenced—“we know each other—and you know me, my lord, for your enemy.”*

“I thank you for your plainness, my lord duke,” replied Nigel; “an open enemy is better than a hollow friend.”

“For you, my Lord Huntinglen,” said the Duke, “methinks you have but now overstepped the limits of the indulgence permitted to you, as the father of the Prince’s friend, and my own.”

“By my word, my lord duke,” replied the Earl, “it is easy for any one to outstep boundaries, of the existence of which he was not aware. It is neither to secure my protection nor approbation, that my son keeps such exalted company.”

“O, my lord, we know you, and indulge you,” said the Duke; “you are one of those who presume for a life-long upon the merit of one good action.”

“In faith, my lord, and if it be so,” said the old Earl, “I have at least the advantage of such as presume more than I do, without having done any action of merit whatever. But I mean not to quarrel with you, my lord—we can neither be friends nor enemies—you have your path, and I have mine.”

Buckingham only replied by throwing on his bonnet, and shaking its lofty plume with a careless and scornful toss of the head. They parted thus; the Duke walking onwards through the apartments, and the others leaving the palace and repairing to Whitehall stairs, where they embarked on board the barge of the citizen.

CHAPTER X.

Did not thy fortune troll upon the wheels
Of yonder dancing cubes of mottled bone;
And drown it not, like Egypt’s royal harlot, Dissolving her rich pearl in the brimm’d wine cup.
These are the arts, Lothario, which shrink across Into brief yards—bring sterling pounds to farthings,
Credit to infamy; and the poor gull,
Who might have lived an honour’d, easy life,
To ruin, and an unregarded grave.—The Changes.

WHEN they were fairly embarked on the Thames, the Earl took from his pocket the Supplication, and,

* Buckingham, who had a frankness in his high and irascible ambition, was always ready to bid defiance to those by whom he was thwarted or opposed. He aspired to be created Prince of Tipperary in Ireland, and Lord High Constable of England. Coventry, then Lord Keeper, opposed what seemed such an unreasonable extent of power as was annexed to the office of Constable. On this opposition, according to Sir Anthony Weldon, “the Duke peremptorily accosted Coventry, ‘Who made you pointing out to George Heriot the royal warrant endorsed thereon, asked him, if it were in due and regular form? The worthy citizen hastily read it over, thrust forth his hand as if to congratulate the Lord Glenvarloch, then checked himself, pulled out his barnacles, (a present from old David Ramsay,) and again perused the warrant with the most business-like and critical attention. “It is strictly correct and formal,” he said, looking to the Earl of Huntinglen; “and I sincerely rejoice at it.”

“I doubt nothing of its formality,” said the Earl; “the King understands business well, and, if he does not practice it often, it is only because indolence obscures parts which are naturally well qualified for the discharge of affairs. But what is next to be done for our young friend, Master Heriot? You know how I am circumstanced. Scottish lords living at the English Court have seldom command of money; yet, unless a sum can be presently raised on this warrant, matters standing as you hastily hinted to me, the mortgage, wadset, or whatever it is called, will be foreclosed.”

“It is true,” said Heriot, in some embarrassment; “there is a large sum wanted in redemption—yet, if it is not raised, there will be an expiry of the legal, as our lawyers call it, and the estate will be evicted.”

“My noble—my worthy friends, who have taken up my cause so undeservedly, so unexpectedly,” said Nigel, “do not let me be a burden on your kindness. You have already done too much where nothing was merited.”

“Peace, man, peace,” said Lord Huntinglen, “and let old Heriot and I puzzle this scent out. He is about to open—hark to him!”

“My lord,” said the citizen, “the Duke of Buckingham sneers at our city money-bags; yet they can sometimes open, to prop a falling and a noble house.”

“We know they can,” said Lord Huntinglen—“mind not Buckingham, he is a Peg-a-Ramsay—and now for the remedy.”

“I partly hinted to Lord Glenvarloch already,” said Heriot, “that the redemption money might be advanced upon such a warrant as the present, and I will engage my credit that it can. But then, in order to secure the lender, he must come in the shoes of the creditor to whom he advances payment.”

“Come in his shoes!” replied the Earl; “Why, what have boots or shoes to do with this matter my good friend?”

“It is a law phrase, my lord. My experience has made me pick up a few of them,” said Heriot.

“Ay, and of better things along with them, Master George,” replied Lord Huntinglen; “but what means it?”

“Simply this,” resumed the citizen; “that the lender of this money will transact with the holder of the mortgage, or wadset, over the estate of Glenvarloch, and obtain from him such a conveyance to his right as shall leave the lands pledged for the debt, in case the warrant upon the Scottish Exchequer should prove unproductive. I fear, in this uncertainty of public credit, that without some such counter security, it will be very difficult to find so large a sum.”

“Ho la!” said the Earl of Huntinglen, “Halt there! a thought strikes me.—What if the new creditor should admire the estate as a hunting-field, as much as my Lord Grace of Buckingham seems to do, and should wish to kill a buck there in the summer season? It seems to me, that on your plan, Master George, our new friend will be as well entitled to block Lord Glenvarloch out of his inheritance as the present holder of the mortgage.”

The citizen laughed. “I will engage,” he said, “that the keenest sportsman to whom I may apply on this occasion, shall not have a thought beyond

Lord Keeper, Coventry?” He replied, “The King.” Buckingham replied, “It’s false; ’twas I did make you, and you shall know that I, who made you, can, and will unmake you.” Coventry thus answered him, “Did I conceive that I held my place by your favour, I would presently unmake myself, by rendering up the seals to his Majesty.” Then Buckingham, in a scorn and fury, flung from him, saying, “You shall not keep it long;” and surely, had not Felton prevented him, he had made good his word.”—WELDON’S Court of King James and Charles.

the Lord Mayor's Easter-hunt, in Epping-Forest. But your lordship's caution is reasonable. The creditor must be bound to allow Lord Glenvarloch sufficient time to redeem his estate by means of the royal warrant, and must waive in his favour the right of instant foreclosure, which may be, I should think, the more easily managed, as the right of redemption must be exercised in his own name.

"But where shall we find a person in London fit to draw the necessary writings?" said the Earl. "If my old friend Sir John Skene of Halyards had lived, we should have had his advice; but time presses, and"— "I know," said Heriot, "an orphan lad, a scrivener, that dwells by Temple-Bar; he can draw deeds both after the English and Scottish fashion, and I have trusted him often in matters of weight and of importance. I will send one of my serving-men for him, and the mutual deeds may be executed in your lordship's presence; for, as things stand, there should be no delay." His lordship readily assented; and, as they now landed upon the private stairs leading down to the river from the gardens of the handsome hotel which he inhabited, the messenger was dispatched without loss of time.

Nigel, who had sat almost stupefied while these zealous friends volunteered for him in arranging the measures by which his fortune was to be disembarrassed, now made another eager attempt to force upon them his broken expressions of thanks and gratitude. But he was again silenced by Lord Huntinglen, who declared he would not hear a word on that topic, and proposed instead, that they should take a turn in the leafed alley, or sit upon the stone bench which overlooked the Thames, until his son's arrival should give the signal for dinner.

"I desire to introduce Dalgarno and Lord Glenvarloch to each other," he said, "as two who will be near neighbours, and I trust will be more kind ones than their fathers were formerly. There is but three Scots miles betwixt the castles, and the turrets of the one are visible from the battlements of the other."

The old Earl was silent for a moment, and appeared to muse upon the recollections which the vicinity of the castles had summoned up.

"Does Lord Dalgarno follow the Court to Newmarket next week?" said Heriot, by way of removing the conversation.

"He proposes so, I think," answered Lord Huntinglen, relapsed into his reverie for a minute or two, and then addressed Nigel somewhat abruptly:—

"My young friend, when you attain possession of your inheritance, as I hope you soon will, I trust you will not add one to the idle followers of the Court, but reside on your patrimonial estate, cherish your ancient tenants, relieve and assist your poor kinsmen, protect the poor against subaltern oppression, and do what our fathers used to do, with fewer lights and with less means than we have."

"And yet the advice to keep the country," said Heriot, "comes from an ancient and constant ornament of the Court."

"From an old courtier, indeed," said the Earl, "and the first of my family that could so write himself—my gray beard falls on a cambric ruff, and a silken doublet—my father's descended upon a buff coat and a breastplate. I would not that those days of battle returned; but I should love well to make the oaks of my old forest of Dalgarno ring once more with halloo, and horn, and hound, and to have the old stone-arched hall return the hearty shout of my vassals and tenants, as the bicker and the quaigh walked their rounds amongst them. I should like to see the broad Tay once more before I die—not even the Thames can match it, in my mind."

"Surely, my lord," said the citizen, "all this might be easily done—it costs but a moment's resolution, and the journey of some brief days, and you will be where you desire to be—what is there to prevent you?"

"Habits, Master George, habits," replied the Earl, "which to young men are like threads of silk, so lightly are they worn, so soon broken; but which hang on our old limbs as if time had stiffened them into gyves of iron. To go to Scotland for a brief space were but labour in vain; and when I think of abating there, I cannot bring myself to leave my old Master, to whom I fancy myself sometimes useful and whose weal and woe I have shared for so many years. But Dalgarno shall be a Scottish noble."

"Has he visited the north?" said Heriot.

"He was there last year, and made such a report of the country, that the Prince has expressed a longing to see it."

"Lord Dalgarno is in high grace with his Highness, and the Duke of Buckingham?" observed the goldsmith.

"He is so," answered the Earl.—"I pray it may be for the advantage of them all. The Prince is just and equitable in his sentiments, though cold and strict in his manners, and very obstinate in his trifling purposes; and the Duke, noble and gallant and generous and open, is fiery, ambitious, and impetuous. Dalgarno has none of these faults, so such as he may have of his own, may perchance be corrected by the society in which he moves.—So here he comes."

Lord Dalgarno accordingly advanced from the farther end of the alley to the bench on which his father and his guests were seated, so that Nigel had leisure to peruse his countenance and figure. He was dressed point device, and almost to extremity in the splendid fashion of the time, which suited well with his age, probably about five-and-twenty, with noble form and fine countenance, in which last easily betrayed the manly features of his father, softened by a more habitual air of assiduous courtesy than the stubborn old Earl had ever condescended to assume towards the world in general. In every respect, his address was gallant, free, and unembarrassed, rather by pride or ceremony—far remote certainly from the charge either of haughty coldness or forward impetuosity; and so far his father had freed him from the marked faults which he ascribed to the manners of the Prince and his favourite Buckingham.

While the old Earl presented his young acquaintance Lord Glenvarloch to his son, as one whom he would have him love and honour, Nigel marked the countenance of Lord Dalgarno closely, to see if he could detect aught of that secret dislike which the King had, in one of his broken expostulations, seemed to intimate, as arising from a clashing of interest betwixt his new friend and the great Buckingham. But nothing of this was visible; on the contrary, Lord Dalgarno received his new acquaintance with the frankness and courtesy which makes conquest once, when addressed to the feelings of an ingenious young man.

It need hardly be told that his open and friendly address met equally ready and cheerful acceptance in Nigel Olifaunt. For many months, and while a young man not much above two-and-twenty, he had been restrained by circumstances from the conversation of his equals. When, on his father's sudden death, he left the Low Countries for Scotland, he had found himself involved, to all appearance inextricably, with the details of the law, all of which threatened to end in the alienation of the patrimony which should support his hereditary rank. His term of sincere mourning, joined to injured pride, and the swelling of a heart under unexpected and undeserved misfortune, together with the uncertainty attending the issue of his affairs, had induced the young Lord of Glenvarloch to live, while in Scotland, in a very private and reserved manner. How he had passed his time in London, the reader is acquainted with. But this melancholy and secluded course of life was neither agreeable to his age nor to his temper, which was gay and sociable. He hailed, therefore, with sincere pleasure, the approaches which a young man of his own age and rank made towards him; and when he had exchanged with Lord Dalgarno some of those words and signals by which, as surely as by those of freemasonry, young people recognise a mutual wish to be agreeable to each other, it seemed as if the two noble men had been acquainted for some time.

Just as this tacit intercourse had been established, one of Lord Huntinglen's attendants came down the alley, marshalling onwards a man dressed in black buckram, who followed him with tolerable speed, considering that, according to his sense of reverence and propriety, he kept his body bent and parallel to the horizon from the moment that he came in sight of the company to which he was about to be presented.

"Who is this, you cuckoldy knave," said the old Lord, who had retained the keen appetite and impatience of a Scottish Baron even during a long alienation from his native country; "and why does John Cook, with a murrain to him, keep back dinner?"

"I believe we are ourselves responsible for this person's intrusion," said George Heriot; "this is the scrivener whom we desired to see.—Look up, man, and see us in the face as an honest man should, instead of bearing thy noddle charged against us thus, like a battering-ram."

The scrivener did look up accordingly, with the action of an automaton which suddenly obeys the impulse of a pressed spring. But, strange to tell, not even the haste he had made to attend his patron's mandate, a business, as Master Heriot's message expressed, of weight and importance—nay, not even the state of depression in which, out of sheer humility doubtless, he had his head stooped to the earth, from the moment he had trod the demesnes of the Earl of Huntinglen, had called any colour into his countenance. The drops stood on his brow from haste and toil, but his cheek was still pale and tallow-coloured as before; nay, what seemed stranger, his very hair, when he raised his head, hung down on either cheek as straight and sleek and undisturbed as it was when we first introduced him to our readers, seated at his quiet and humble desk.

Lord Dalgarno could not forbear a stifled laugh at the ridiculous and puritanical figure which presented itself like a starved anatomy to the company, and whispered at the same time into Lord Glenvarloch's ear—

"The devil damn thee b'ack, thou cream-faced loon, Where got'st thou that goose-look?"

Nigel was too little acquainted with the English stage, to understand a quotation which had already grown matter of common allusion in London. Lord Dalgarno saw that he was not understood, and continued, "That fellow, by his visage, should either be a saint, or a most hypocritical rogue—and such is my excellent opinion of human nature, that I always suspect the worst. But they seem deep in business. Will you take a turn with me in the garden, my lord, or will you remain a member of the serious conclave?"

"With you, my lord, most willingly," said Nigel; and they were turning away accordingly, when George Heriot, with the formality belonging to his station, observed, that, "as their business concerned Lord Glenvarloch, he had better remain, to make himself master of it, and witness to it."

"My presence is utterly needless, my good lord;—and, my best friend, Master Heriot," said the young nobleman, "I shall understand nothing the better for cumbering you with my ignorance in these matters; and can only say at the end, as I now say at the beginning, that I dare not take the helm out of the hand of the kind pilots who have already guided my course within sight of a fair and unhopèd-for haven. Whatever you recommend to me as fitting, I shall sign and seal; and the import of the deeds I shall better learn by a brief explanation from Master Heriot, if he will bestow so much trouble in my behalf, than by a thousand learned words and law terms from this person of skill."

"He is right," said Lord Huntinglen; "our young friend is right, in confiding these matters to you and me, Master George Heriot—he has not misplaced his confidence."

Master George Heriot cast a long look after the two young noblemen, who had now walked down the alley arm-in-arm, and at length said, "He hath not, indeed, misplaced his confidence, as your lordship well and truly says—but, nevertheless, he is not in the right path; for it behooves every man to become acquainted with his own affairs, so soon as he hath any that are worth attending to."

When he had made this observation, they applied themselves, with the scrivener, to look into various papers, and to direct in what manner writings should be drawn, which might at once afford sufficient security to those who were to advance the money, and at the same time preserve the right of the young nobleman to redeem the family estate, provided he should obtain the means of doing so, by the expected reimbursement from the Scottish Exchequer, or otherwise. It is needless to enter into those details. But it is not unimportant to mention, as an illustration of character, that Heriot went into the most minute legal details with a precision which showed that experience had made him master even of the intricacies of Scottish conveyancing; and that the Earl of Huntinglen, though far less acquainted with technical detail, suffered no step of the business to pass over, until he had attained a general but distinct idea of its import and its propriety.

They seemed to be admirably seconded in their benevolent intentions towards the young Lord Glenvarloch, by the skill and eager zeal of the scrivener, whom Heriot had introduced to this piece of business, the most important which Andrew had ever transacted in his life, and the particulars of which were moreover agitated in his presence between an actual Earl, and one whose wealth and character might entitle him to be alderman of his ward, if not to be lord mayor, in his turn.

While they were thus in eager conversation on business, the good Earl, even forgetting the calls of his appetite, and the delay of dinner, in his anxiety to see that the scrivener received proper instructions, and that all was rightly weighed and considered, before dismissing him to engross the necessary deeds, the two young men walked together on the terrace which overhung the river, and talked on the topics which Lord Dalgarno, the elder, and the more experienced, thought most likely to interest his new friend.

These naturally regarded the pleasures attending a court life; and Lord Dalgarno expressed much surprise at understanding that Nigel proposed an instant return to Scotland.

"You are jesting with me," he said. "All the Court rings—it is needless to mince it—with the extraordinary success of your suit—against the highest interest, it is said, now influencing the horizon at Whitehall. Men think of—talk of you—fix their eyes on you—ask each other, who is this young Scottish lord, who has stepped so far in a single day? They augur in whispers to each other, how high and how far you may push your fortune—and all that you design to make of it, is, to return to Scotland, eat raw oatmeal cakes, baked upon a peat-fire, have your hand shaken by every loon of a blue-bonnet who chooses to dub you cousin, though your relationship comes by Noah; drink Scots twopenny ale, eat half-starved red-deer venison, when you can kill it, ride upon a galloway, and be called my right honourable and naïst worthy lord!"

"There is no great gayety, in the prospect before me, I confess," said Lord Glenvarloch, "even if your father and good Master Heriot should succeed in putting my affairs on some footing of plausible hope. And yet I trust to do something for my vassals, as my ancestors before me, and to teach my children, as I have myself been taught, to make some personal sacrifices, if they be necessary, in order to maintain with dignity the situation in which they are placed by Providence."

Lord Dalgarno, after having once or twice stifled his laughter during this speech, at length broke out into a fit of mirth, so hearty and so resistless, that, angry as he was, the call of sympathy swept Nigel along with him, and, despite of himself, he could not forbear to join in a burst of laughter, which he thought not only causeless, but almost impertinent.

He soon recollected himself, however; and said, in a tone qualified to allay Lord Dalgarno's extreme mirth, "This is all well, my lord; but how am I to understand your merriment?" Lord Dalgarno only answered him with redoubled peals of laughter, and at length held by Lord Glenvarloch's cloak, as if to prevent his falling down on the ground, in the extremity of his convulsion.

At length, while Nigel stood half abashed, half angry, at becoming thus the subject of his new acquaintance's ridicule, and was only restrained from expressing his resentment against the son by a sense of the obligations he owed the father, Lord Dalgarno recovered himself, and spoke in a half-broken voice, his eyes still running with tears. "I crave your pardon, my dear Lord Glenvarloch—ten thousand times do I crave your pardon. But that last picture of rural dignity, accompanied by your grave and angry surprise at my laughing at what would have made any court-bred hound laugh, that had but so much as bayed the moon once from the court-yard at Whitehall, totally overcame me. Why, my liege and dearest lord, you, a young and handsome fellow, with high birth, a title, and the name of an estate, so well received by the King at your first starting, as makes your farther progress scarce matter of doubt, if you know how to improve it—for the King has already said you are a 'braw lad, and well studied in the more humane letters'—you, too, whom all the women, and the very marked beauties of the court, desire to see, because you came from Leyden, were born in Scotland, and have gained a hard-contested suit in England—you, I say, with a person, like a prince, an eye of fire, and a wit as quick, to think of throwing your cards on the table when the game is in your very hand, running back to the frozen north, and marrying—let me see—a tall, stalking, blue-eyed, fair-skinned, bony wench, with eighteen quarters in her scutcheon, a sort of Lot's wife, newly descended from her pedestal, and with her to shut yourself up in your tapestried chamber! Uh, gad!—Swoons, I shall never survive the idea!"

It is seldom that youth, however high-minded, is able, from mere strength of character and principle, to support itself against the force of ridicule. Half angry, half mortified, and, to say truth, half ashamed of his more manly and better purpose, Nigel was unable, and flattered himself it was unnecessary, to play the part of a rigid moral patriot, in presence of a young man whose current fluency of language, as well as his experience in the highest circles of society, gave him, in spite of Nigel's better and firmer thoughts, a temporary ascendancy over him. He sought, therefore, to compromise the matter, and avoid farther debate, by frankly owning, that, if to return to his own country were not his choice, it was at least a matter of necessity. "His affairs," he said, "were unsettled, his income precarious."

"And where is he whose affairs are settled, or whose income is less than precarious, that is to be found in attendance on the Court?" said Lord Dalgarno; "all are either losing or winning. Those who have wealth, come hither to get rid of it, while the happy gallants who, like you and I, dear Glenvarloch, have little or none, have every chance to be sharers in their spoils."

"I have no ambition of that sort," said Nigel, "and if I had, I must tell you plainly, Lord Dalgarno, I have not the means to do so. I can scarce as yet call the suit I wear my own; I owe it, and I do not blush to say so, to the friendship of yonder good man."

"I will not laugh again, if I can help it," said Lord Dalgarno. "But, Lord! that you should have gone to a wealthy goldsmith for your habit—why, I could have brought you to an honest, confiding tailor, who should have furnished you with half-a-dozen, merely for love of the little word, 'lord,' which you place before your name;—and then your goldsmith, if he be really a friendly goldsmith, should have equipped you with such a purse of fair rose-nobles as would have bought you thrice as many suits, or done better things for you."

"I do not understand these fashions, my lord," said Nigel, his displeasure mastering his shame; "were I to attend the Court of my Sovereign, it should be when I could maintain, without shifting or borrowing, the dress and retinue which my rank requires."

"Which my rank requires!" said Lord Dalgarno, repeating his last words; "that, now, is as good as if my father had spoke it. I fancy you would love to move to Court with him, followed by a round score of old blue-bottles, with white heads and red noses with bucklers and broadswords, which their hands trembling betwixt age and strong waters, can make no use of—as many huge silver badges on their arms, to show whose fools they are, as would furnish forth a court cupboard of plate—rogues fit for nothing but to fill our antechambers with the flavour of onion and genievre—pah!"

"The poor knaves?" said Lord Glenvarloch. "they have served your father, it may be, in the war. What would become of them were he to turn them off?"

"Why, let them go to the hospital," said Dalgarno, "or to the bridge-end, to sell switches. The King, a better man than my father, and you see those who have served in his wars do so every day; or when their blue coats were well worn out, they would make rare scarecrows. Here is a fellow, now, come down the walk; the stoutest raven dared not eat within a yard of that copper nose. I tell you, there is more service, as you will soon see, in my valet in the chamber, and such a lither lad as my page Lutz than there is in a score of these old memorials of the Douglas wars,* where they cut each other's throats for the chance of finding twelve pennies Scots in the persons of the slain. Marry, my lord, to me amends, they will eat mouldy victuals, and drink stale ale, as if their bellies were puncheons.—But the dinner bell is going to sound—hark, it is clearing a rusty throat, with a preliminary jowl. That is another clamorous relic of antiquity, that, were I married, should soon be at the bottom of the Thames. He the foul fiend can it interest the peasants and mechanics in the Strand, to know that the Earl of Huntinglen is sitting down to dinner? But my father looks our way—we must not be late for the grace;—we shall be in dis-grace, if you will forgive a quibble which would have made his Majesty laugh. You will find us all of a piece, and, having been accustomed to eat in saucers abroad, I am ashamed you should witness our larded capons, our mountains of beef and oceans of brewis, as large as Highland hills and lochs; but you shall see better cheer to-morrow.—Where lodge you? I will call for you. I must take your guide through the peopled desert, to certain enchanted lands, which you will scarce discover without chart and pilot. Where lodge you?"

"I will meet you in Paul's," said Nigel, a good deal embarrassed, "at any hour you please to name."

"O, you would be private," said the young lord. "Nay, fear not me. I will be no intruder. But we have attained this huge larder of flesh, fowl, and fish. I marvel the oaken boards groan not under it."

They had indeed arrived in the dining-parlour of the mansion, where the table was superabundantly loaded, and where the number of attendants, to a certain extent, vindicated the sarcasms of the young nobleman. The chaplain and Sir Mungo Malagoutier, were of the party. The latter complimented Lord Glenvarloch upon the impression he had made at Court. "One would have thought ye had brought the apple of discord in your pouch, my lord, or that you were the very firebrand of which Althea was delivered, and that she had lain in in a barrel of gunpowder; for the King, and the Prince, and the Duke have been by the lugs about ye, and so have many more, that kendna before this blessed day that there was such a man living on the face of the earth."

"Mind your victuals, Sir Mungo," said the Earl; "they get cold while you talk."

"Troth, and that needsa, my lord," said the knight; "your lordship's dinners seldom scald one's mouth—the serving-men are turning mild, like oysters, my lord, and it is far between the kitchen and the hall."

With this little explosion of his spleen, Sir Mungo remained satisfied, until the dishes were removed, when fixing his eyes on the brave new doublet of Lord Dalgarno, he complimented him on his economy, pretending to recognise it as the same which he had worn in Edinburgh in the Spanish ambassador's time. Lord Dalgarno, too much a man of the world to be moved by any thing from such a source, proceeded to crack some nuts with great decision, as he replied, that the doublet was in some of his father's, as it was likely to cost him fifty pounds some day soon. Sir Mungo forthwith proposed in his own way to convey this agreeable intelligence to the Earl, observing, that his son was a better maker of bargains than his lordship, for he had bought a doublet as rich as that his lordship had when the Spanish ambassador was at Holyrood, and it had cost him but fifty pounds Scots;—it was no fool's bargain, my lord."

"Fifty pounds sterling, if you please, Sir Mungo," answered the Earl calmly; "and a fool's bargain it is, if you so tense. Dalgarno was a fool when he said—I will be a fool when I pay—and you, Sir Mungo, craving your pardon, are a fool in presenti, in asking of what concerns you not."

Saying, the Earl addressed himself to the serious business of the table, and sent the wine around with discretion which increased the hilarity, but rather moderated the temperance, of the company, until the evening was interrupted by the announcement of the scrivener had engrossed such deeds as were to be presently executed.

George Heriot rose from the table, observing, that the laws and legal documents were unseemly neighbours.

The Earl asked the scrivener, if they had received the respectful answer, that Heaven forbid should be such an ungracious beast as to eat and drink until his lordship's pleasure was performed. "You shalt eat before thou goest," said Lord Glenvarloch; "and I will have thee try, moreover, to get a cup of sack cannot bring some colour into the cheeks of thine. It were a shame to my old age, thou shouldst glide out into the Strand in such a spectre-fashion as thou now wearest.—Go it, Dalgarno, for the honour of our roof is at stake."

Dalgarno gave directions that the man should be called to. Lord Glenvarloch and the citizen, meanwhile, signed and interchanged, and thus a transanction, of which the principal parties understood little, save that it was under the management of a zealous and faithful friend, who took that the money should be forthcoming, the estate released from forfeiture, by payment of a stipulated sum for which it stood pledged, and the term of Lambmas, and at the hour of midnight, and beside the tomb of the Regent Earl of Albany, in the High Kirk of Saint Giles, at Edinburgh, being the day and place assigned for such redemption.*

In this business was transacted, the old Earl of Albany have renewed his carouse; but the citizen, regarding the importance of the deeds he had undertaken, and the business he had to transact before he next morning, not only refused to return to the boat, but carried with him to his barge Lord Glenvarloch, who might, perhaps, have been otherwise more tractable.

When they were seated in the boat, and fairly once afloat on the river, George Heriot looked back longly on the mansion they had left—"There live," he said, "the old fashion and the new. The father had a noble old broadsword; but harmed with age, from neglect and inactivity; the son is your nephew, a rapier, well mounted, fairly gilt, and fashionable taste of the time—and it is time must evince that metal be as good as the show. God grant it do so, says an old friend to the family."

Nothing of consequence passed betwixt them, until Lord Glenvarloch, landing at Paul's Wharf, took leave of his friend the citizen, and retired to his own apartment; where his attendant Richie, not a little amused with the events of the day, and with the hostess of Lord Huntinglen's housekeeping, gave a most splendid account of them to the buxom Dame Nelly, who rejoiced to hear that the sun at length was shining upon what Richie called "the right side of the hedge."

CHAPTER XI.

You are not for the manner nor the times.
They have their vices now most like to virtues;
You cannot know them apart by any difference,
They wear the same clothes, eat the same meat—
Sleep in the self same beds, ride in those coaches,
Or, very like, four horses in a coach,
As the best men and women.—BEN JONSON.

On the following morning, while Nigel, his breakfast finished, was thinking how he should employ the day, there was a little bustle upon the stairs which attracted his attention, and presently entered Dame Nelly, blushing like scarlet, and scarce able to bring out—"A young nobleman, sir—no one less," she added, drawing her hand slightly over her lips, "would be so saucy—a young nobleman, sir, to wait on you!"

And she was followed into the little cabin by Lord Dalgarno, gay, easy, disembarrassed, and apparently as much pleased to rejoin his new acquaintance as if he had found him in the apartments of a palace. Nigel, on the contrary, (for youth is slave to such circumstances,) was discountenanced and mortified at being surprised by so splendid a gallant in a chamber, which, at the moment the elegant and high-dressed cavalier appeared in it, seemed to its inhabitant, yet lower, narrower, darker, and meaner, than it had ever shown before. He would have made some apology for the situation, but Lord Dalgarno cut him short—

"Not a word of it," he said, "not a single word—I know why you ride at anchor here—but I can keep counsel—so pretty a hostess would recommend worse quarters."

"On my word—on my honour,"—said Lord Glenvarloch—

"Nay, nay, make no words of the matter," said Lord Dalgarno; "I am no tell-tale, nor shall I cross your walk; there is game enough in the forest, thank Heaven, and I can strike a doe for myself."

All this he said in so significant a manner, and the explanation which he had adopted seemed to put Lord Glenvarloch's gallantry on so respectable a footing, that Nigel ceased to try to undeceive him; and less ashamed, perhaps, (for such is human weakness,) of supposed vice than of real poverty, changed the discourse to something else, and left poor Dame Nelly's reputation and his own at the mercy of the young courtier's misconstruction.

He offered refreshments with some hesitation. Lord Dalgarno had long since breakfasted, but had just come from playing a set of tennis, he said, and would willingly taste a cup of the pretty hostess's single beer. This was easily procured, was drunk, was commended, and, as the hostess failed not to bring the cup herself, Lord Dalgarno profited by the opportunity to take a second and more attentive view of her, and then gravely drank to her husband's health, with an almost imperceptible nod to Lord Glenvarloch. Dame Nelly was much honoured, smoothed her apron down with her hands, and said—"Her John was greatly and truly honoured by their lordships—he was a kind, pains-taking man for his family, as was in the alley, or indeed, as far north as Paul's Chain."

She would have proceeded probably to state the difference betwixt their ages, as the only alloy to their nuptial happiness; but her lodger, who had no mind to be further exposed to his gay friend's raillery, gave her, contrary to his wont, a signal to leave the room.

Lord Dalgarno looked after her, then looked at Glenvarloch, shook his head, and repeated the well-known lines—

"My lord, beware of jealousy—
It is the green-eyed monster which doth make The meat it feeds on."

But come," he said, changing his tone, "I know not why I should worry you thus—I who have so many

* Each covenant in those days of accuracy had a special appointed for execution, the tomb of the Regent Earl of Albany in Saint Giles's Church was frequently assigned for the folly of my own, when I should rather make excuse for being here at all, and tell you wherefore I came."

So saying, he reached a seat and placing another for Lord Glenvarloch, in spite of his anxious haste to anticipate this act of courtesy, he proceeded in the same tone of easy familiarity.

"We are neighbours, my lord, and are just made known to each other. Now, I know enough of the dear North, to be well aware that Scottish neighbours must be either dear friends or deadly enemies—must either walk hand-in-hand, or stand sword-point to sword-point, so I choose the hand-in-hand, unless you should reject my proffer."

"How were it possible, my lord," said Lord Glenvarloch, "to refuse what is offered so frankly, even if your father had not been a second father to me?"—And as he took Lord Dalgarno's hand, he added, "I have, I think, lost no time, since, during one day's attendance at Court, I have made a kind friend and a powerful enemy."

"The friend thanks you," replied Lord Dalgarno, "for your just opinion; but, my dear Glenvarloch—or rather, for titles are too formal between us of the better file—what is your Christian name?"

"Nigel," replied Lord Glenvarloch.

"Then we will be Nigel and Malcolm to each other," said his visitor, "and my lord to the plebeian world around us. But I was about to ask you whom you supposed your enemy?"

"No less than the all-powerful favourite, the great Duke of Buckingham."

"You dream! What could possess you with such an opinion?" said Dalgarno.

"He told me so himself," replied Glenvarloch; "and, in so doing, dealt frankly and honourably with me."

"O, you know him not yet," said his companion; "the Duke is moulded of an hundred noble and fiery qualities, that prompt him, like a generous horse, to spring aside in impatience at the least obstacle to his forward course. But he means not what he says in such passing heats—I can do more with him, I thank Heaven, than most who are around him; you shall go visit him with me, and you will see how you shall be received."

"I told you, my lord," said Glenvarloch firmly, and with some haughtiness, "the Duke of Buckingham, without the least offence, declared himself my enemy in the face of the Court, and he shall retract that aggression as publicly as it was given, ere I will make the slightest advance towards him."

"You would act becomingly in every other case," said Lord Dalgarno, "but here you are wrong. In the court horizon, Buckingham is Lord of the Ascendant, and as he is adverse or favouring, so sinks or rises the fortune of a suitor. The King would bid you remember your Phœdrus."

"Arrispius geminus, ripe cadentibus, alit"—and so forth. You are the vase of earth; beware of knocking yourself against the vase of iron."

"The vase of earth," said Glenvarloch, "will avoid the encounter, by getting ashore out of the current—I mean to go no more to Court."

"O, to Court you necessarily must go; you will find your Scottish suit move ill without it, for there is both patronage and favour necessary to enforce the sign-manual you have obtained. Of that we will speak more hereafter; but tell me in the meanwhile, my dear Nigel, whether you did not wonder to see me here so early?"

"I am surprised that you could find me out in this obscure corner," said Lord Glenvarloch.

"My page Lutin is a very devil for the sort of discovery," replied Lord Dalgarno; "I have but to say, 'Goblin, I would know where he or she dwells,' and he guides me thither as if by art magic."

"I hope he waits not now in the street, my lord," said Nigel; "I will send my servant to seek him."

"Do not concern yourself—he is by this time," said Lord Dalgarno, "playing at hustle-cap and chuck-farthing with the most blackguard imps upon the wharf, unless he hath forgone his old customs."

"Are you not afraid," said Lord Glenvarloch, "that in such company his morals may become—"

"Let his company look to their own," Lord Dalgarno, coolly; "for it will be a cruel fiend in which Lutin cannot teach more than he can learn—he is, I thank the gods, roughly turned in evil for his years. I am a trouble of looking after his moralities, for no make them either better or worse."

"I wonder you can answer this to his parent lord," said Nigel.

"I wonder where I should find his parent his companion," to render an account to it.

"He may be an orphan," said Lord Nigel, surely, being a page in your lordship's family rents must be of rank."

"Of as high rank as the gallows could set to," replied Lord Dalgarno, with the sentence; "they were both hanged, I believe—gibbets, from whom I bought him five years timated as much to me.—You are surprised now. But is it not better that, instead of a cecited, whey faced slip of gentility, to whom old-world ideas of the matter, I was bound Sir Pedagogue, and see that he washed his face, and his prayers, learned his accidents, naughty words, brushed his hat, and worn doublet only on Sunday,—that, instead of my Goodchild, I should have something like it."

He whistled shrill and clear, and the page of darted into the room, almost with the actual apparition. From his height he was fifteen, but, from his face, might be two or three years older, very neatly made, and richly with a thin bronzed visage, which marked descent, and a pair of sparkling black eyes seemed almost to pierce through those whom he met.

"There he is," said Lord Dalgarno, "fit element prompt to execute every command bad, or indifferent—unmatched in his tribe, thief, and liar."

"All which qualities," said the undaunted "have each in turn stood your lordship in a

"Out, you imp of Satan!" said his master,—"before—or my conjuring rod goes a-cars." The boy named, and disappeared as he had entered. "You see," said Lord Nigel, "that, in coming my household, the best can pay to gentle blood, is to exclude it from vice—that very gallows-land were enough to a whole antechamber of pages, though they ascended from Kings and Knaves."

* About this time the ancient customs arising from prevalence of chivalry began to be grossly varied for ginal purposes of the institution. None was more than the change which took place in the breeding of pages. This peculiar species of manual education of youths of noble birth, who, that they might to the exercise of arms were early removed from the homes where too much indulgence might have been to be placed in the family of some prince or man of military renown where they served, as it were, an apprenticeship to the duties of chivalry and courtesy. They were severely moral and pursued with great strictness in useful exercises, and what were deemed elegant games. From being pages, they were advanced to education of squires from squires, these candidates for of knighthood were frequently made knights.

But in the sixteenth century the page had become instances a mere domestic, who, sometimes, by the of his address and appearance, was expected to make for the absence of a whole band of retainers with a bookish. We have Sir John's authority when he of his train.

"Falstaff will learn the humor of the age, French thrust, you rascals, myself and stirred p Jonson, in a high tone of moral indignation, thus the change. The Host of the New Inn replies to who asks to have his son for a page, that he would own trade, hang him sooner."

"Tis a damn'd time to this desperate course of Love. Call you that desperate, which, by a Of institution from our ancestors Hath been derived down to us, and received in a succession, for the noblest way Of brushing up our youth, in letters, arms, Fair men deserves civil exercises, And so the blazon of a gentleman! Where can he learn to vault, to ride, to fence, To move his body gracefully, to speak The language pure, or to turn his mind Or manners more to the harmony of nature."

"I can scarce think that a nobleman should need the offices of such an attendant as your goblin," said Nigel; "you are but jesting with my inexperience."

"Time will show whether I jest or not, my dear Nigel," replied Dalgarno; "in the meantime, I have to propose to you to take the advantage of the flood-tide, to run up the river for pastime; and at noon I trust you will dine with me."

Nigel acquiesced in a plan which promised so much amusement; and his new friend and he, attended by Latin and Moniplices, who greatly resembled, when thus associated, the conjunction of a bear and a monkey, took possession of Lord Dalgarno's wherry, which, with its badged watermen, bearing his lordship's crest on their arms, lay in readiness to receive them. The air was delightful upon the river; and the lively conversation of Lord Dalgarno added zest to the pleasures of the little voyage. He could not only give an account of the various public buildings and nobleman's houses which they passed in ascending the Thames, but knew how to season his information with abundance of anecdote, political innuendo, and personal scandal; if he had not very much wit, he was at least completely master of the fashionable tone, which in that time, as in ours, more than amply supplies any deficiency of the kind.

It was a style of conversation entirely new to his companion, as was the world which Lord Dalgarno opened to his observation; and it is no wonder that Nigel, notwithstanding his natural good sense and high spirits, admitted, more readily than seemed consistent with either, the tone of authoritative instruction which his new friend assumed towards him. There would, indeed, have been some difficulty in making a stand. To attempt a high and stubborn one of morality, in answer to the light strain of Lord Dalgarno's conversation, which kept on the frontiers between jest and earnest, would have seemed pedantic and ridiculous; and every attempt which Nigel made to combat his companion's propositions, by reasoning as jocose as his own, only showed his inferiority in that gay species of controversy. And it must be owned, besides, though internally disapproving much of what he heard, Lord Glenvarloch, young as he was in society, became less alarmed by the language and manners of his new associate, than in prudence he ought to have been.

Lord Dalgarno was unwilling to startle his protegee, by insisting upon any topic which appeared particularly to jar with his habits or principles; and he blended his mirth and his earnest so dexterously, that it was impossible for Nigel to discover how far

Than in these nurseries of nobility?

Host. Ay, that was when the nursery's self was noble,
And only virtue made it, not the market
That titles were not vended at the drum
And common outcry; goodness gave the greatness,
And greatness worship; every house became

Lord. Why do you say so,
Or think so enviously? do they not still Learn us the Centaur's skill, the art of Thrace,
To ride? or Pollux' mystery, to fence?
The Pyrrhick gestures, both to stand and spring
In armour: to be active for the wars;
To study figures, numbers, and proportions,
May yield them great in counsels and the arts;
To make their English sweet upon the tongue?
As reverend Chaucer says,

Host. Sir you mistake;
To play Sir Pandarus, my copy hath it,
And carry messages to Madam Cressid;
Instead of backing the brave steed o' mornings,
To kiss the chambermaid, and for a leap
O' the vaulting horse, to ply the vaulting house;
For exercise of arms a bale of dice,
And two or three packs of cards to show the cheat
And nimbleness of hand; mis-take a cloak
From my lord's back, and pawn it: ensue his pockets
Of a superfluous watch, or gold a jewel
Of an odd stone or so; twinge three or four buttons
From off my lady's gown. These are the arts,
Or seven liberal deadly sciences,
Of pagery, or rather paganism,
As the tides run; to which, if he apply him,
He may, perhaps, take a degree at Tyburn,
A year the earlier come to read a lecture
Upon Aquinas, at Saint Thomas-a-Watering's,
And so go forth a laureate in hemp circle."

The New Inn, Act I.

he was serious in his propositions, or how far they flowed from a wild and extravagant spirit of railery. And, ever and anon, those flashes of spirit and honour crossed his conversation, which seemed to intimate, that, when stirred to action by some adequate motive, Lord Dalgarno would prove something very different from the court-haunting and ease-loving voluptuary, which he was pleased to represent as his chosen character.

As they returned down the river, Lord Glenvarloch remarked, that the boat passed the mansion of Lord Huntingdon, and noticed the circumstance to Lord Dalgarno, observing, that he thought they were to have dined there. "Surely no," said the young nobleman, "I have more mercy on you than to gorge you a second time with raw beef and canary wine. I propose something better for you, I promise you, than such a second Scythian festivity. And as for my father, he proposes to dine to-day with my grave, ancient Earl of Northampton, whilome that celebrated putter-down of pretended prophecies, Lord Henry Howard."*

"And do you not go with him?" said his companion.

"To what purpose?" said Lord Dalgarno. "To hear his wise lordship speak musty politics in false Latin, which the old fox always uses, that he may give the learned Majesty of England an opportunity of correcting his slips in grammar? That were a rare employment!"

"Nay," said Lord Nigel, "but out of respect, to wait on my lord your father."

"My lord my father," replied Lord Dalgarno, "has blue-bottles enough to wait on him, and can well dispense with such a butterfly as myself. He can lift the cup of sack to his head without my assistance; and, should the said paternal head turn something giddy, there be men enough to guide his right honourable lordship to his lordship's right honourable couch. — Now, do not stare at me, Nigel, as if my words were to sink the boat with us. I love my father—I love him dearly—and I respect him, too, though I respect not many things; a trustier old Trojan never belted a broadsword by a loop of leather. But what then? He belongs to the old world, I to the new. He has his follies, I have mine; and the less either of us sees of the other's peccadilloes, the greater will be the honour and respect—that, I think, is the proper phrase—I say the respect in which we shall hold each other. Being apart, each of us is himself, such as nature and circumstances have made him; but, couple us up too closely together, you will be sure to have in your leash either an old hypocrite or a young one, or perhaps both the one and the other."

As he spoke thus, the boat put into the landing-place at Blackfriars. Lord Dalgarno sprung ashore, and, flinging his cloak and rapier to his page, recommended to his companion to do the like. "We are coming among a press of gallants," he said; "and, if we walk thus muffled, we shall look like your tawny-visaged Don, who wraps him close in his cloak, to conceal the defects of his doublet."

"I have known many an honest man do that, if it please your lordship," said Richie Moniplices, who had been watching for an opportunity to intrude himself on the conversation, and probably remembered what had been his own condition, in respect to cloak and doublet, at a very recent period.

Lord Dalgarno stared at him, as if surprised at his assurance; but immediately answered, "You may have known many things, friend; but, in the meanwhile, you do not know what principally concerns

* Lord Henry Howard was the second son of the poetical Earl of Surrey, and possessed considerable parts and learning. He wrote, in the year 1593, a book called, "A Defensive against the Poison of supposed Prophecies." He gained the favour of Queen Elizabeth, by having, he says, directed his battery against a set of prophets and pretended soothsayers, whom he accounted infetti regibus, as he expresses it. In the last years of the Queen, he became James's most ardent partisan, and conducted with great pedantry, but much intrigue, the correspondence betwixt the Scottish King and the younger Cecil. Upon James's accession, he was created Earl of Northampton, and Lord Privy Seal. According to De Beaumont the French Ambassador, Lord Henry Howard was one of the greatest flatterers and calumniators that ever lived.

your master, namely, how to carry his cloak, so as to show to advantage the gold-laced seams, and the lining of sable. See how Latin holds the sword, with the cloak cast partly over it, yet so as to set off the embossed hilt, and the silver work of the mounting.—Give your familiar your sword, Nigel," he continued, addressing Lord Glenvarloch, "that he may practise a lesson in an art so necessary."

"Is it altogether prudent," said Nigel, unclasping his weapon, and giving it to Richie, "to walk entirely unarmed?"

"And wherefore not?" said his companion. "You are thinking now of Auld Reekie, as my father fondly calls your good Scottish capital, where there is such bandying of private feuds and public factions, that a man of any note shall not cross your High Street twice, without endangering his life thrice.* Here, sir, no brawling in the street is permitted. Your bull-headed citizen takes up the case so soon as the sword is drawn, and clade is the word."

"And a hard word it is," said Richie, "as my brain-pan kens at this blessed moment."

"Were I your master, sirrah," said Lord Dalgarno, "I would make your brain-pan, as you call it, boil over, were you to speak a word in my presence before you were spoken to."

Richie murmured some indistinct answer, but took the hint, and tucked himself behind his master along with Latin, who failed not to expose his new companion to the ridicule of the passers by, by mimicking, as often as he could do so unobserved by Richie, his stiff and upright staking gait and discontented physiognomy.

"And tell me now, my dear Malcolm," said Nigel, "where we are bending our course, and whether we shall dine at an apartment of yours?"

"An apartment of mine—yes, surely," answered Lord Dalgarno, "you shall dine at an apartment of mine, and an apartment of yours, and of twenty gallants besides; and where the board shall present better cheer, better wine, and better attendance, than if our whole united exhibitions went to maintain it. We are going to the most noted ordinary of London."

"That is, in common language, an inn, or a tavern," said Nigel.

"An inn, or a tavern, my most green and simple friend!" exclaimed Lord Dalgarno. "No, no—these are places where greasy citizens take pipe and pot, where the knavish pettifoggers of the law sponge on their most unhappy victims—where Templars crack jests as empty as their nuts, and where small gentry imbibe such thin potations, that they get droopier instead of getting drunk. An ordinary is a late invented institution, sacred to Bacchus and Comus, where the choicest noble gallants of the time meet with the first and most ethereal wits of the age, where the wine is the very soul of the choicest grape, refined as the genius of the poet, and ancient and generous as the blood of the nobles. And then the fare is something beyond your ordinary gross terrestrial food! Sea and land are ransacked to supply it, and the invention of six ingenious cooks kept eternally upon the rack to make their art hold pace with, and if possible enhance, the exquisite quality of the materials."

"By all which rhapsody," said Lord Glenvarloch, "I can only understand, as I did before, that we are going to a choice tavern, where we shall be handsomely entertained, on paying probably as handsome a reckoning."

* Edinburgh appears to have been one of the most disorderly towns in Europe, during the strength and beginning of the seventeenth century. The Diary of the honest citizen Birrel, repeatedly records such incidents as the following:—"The 24 of November [1667] at two afternoon the Laird of Arth and the Laird of Weenis met on the High Gate of Edinburgh and they and their foil wets fought a very bloody skirmish, where there were many hurt on both sides with shot of pistol. These skirmishes also took place in London itself. In 1660 we lay by of the Secwires an old rake thus longer of his early exploits. 'I knew the Hectors, and before them the Muns and the Tityres, they were brave fellows indeed.' In these days a man could go from the Rose Garden to the Piazza once, but he must venture his life twice, my dear Sir Willie. But it appears that the affrays, which in the Scotch capital arose out of hereditary quarrels and ancient feuds, were in London the growth of the licentiousness and arrogance of young debauchees."

"Reckoning!" in the same tone as before. What profanation! Jeu, pink of Paris can tell the age of distils his sauces in philosophy, who cautions, that he gives portion of the phlegm his rank—nay, he v twelve parts with twelve guests not of the other in a hair of a drachm, yet you in the same breath known and eternal the mysteries of Panacea, and Vergil is King of the Card—he call a reckoning son of the vulgar spirit a word you have! That you know but such blasphemy; as for to have been a Benjamin is not to know man the less hold yourself in no uttered."

"Well, but mark chevalier keeps not court, does he?"

"No, no," answered sort of ceremony w intimates understand business at present a symbolism to be the exchange of courtes and his guests. I the dinner and wine suit their own selfish hour of noon and it let a present of a that, beside a Comus sublimary others, worshipped at Beau, priest, laith, as an advantage for a set."

"In other words, man keeps a room."

"A house in which Lord Dalgarno, if you have a name; played a hand at the French game of Paul; that once, say, and the wheel and a blind woman."

"For all this, I gravely," "I cannot ordinary."

"And wherefore, you draw back from?"

"I do not retract bound, by an early enter the doors of a."

"I tell you this is not, in plain French, a civil term; and than others in this amuse themselves men of honour, any more than they can could not be, such you to avoid. Beside you swear you would of an inn, tavern, or ception of any kind public resort but w nated by the sight of board, and your ear little spotted circles where we go, we m ty amusing themsel nary houses you will meet bullies and sharpers, who will strive either to cheat or to swagger you out of your money."

"I am sure you would not willingly lead me to do what is wrong," said Nigel; "but my father had a horror of games of chance, religious I believe, as well as prudential. He judged from I know not what circumstance, a fallacious one I should hope, that I had a propensity to such courses, and I have told you the promise which he exacted from me."

"Now, by my honour," said Dalgarno, "what you have said affords the strongest reason for my insisting that you go with me. A man who would shun any danger, should first become acquainted with its real bearing and extent, and that in the company of a confidential guide and guard. Do you think I myself game? Good faith, my father's oaks grow too far from London, and stand too fast rooted in the rocks of Perthshire, for me to troll them down with a die, though I have seen whole forests go down like nine-pins. No, no—these are sports for the wealthy Southron, not for the poor Scottish noble. The place is an eating-house, and as such you and I will use it. If others use it to game in, it is their fault, but neither that of the house nor ours."

Unsatisfied with this reasoning, Nigel still insisted upon the promise he had given to his father, until his companion appeared rather displeased, and disposed to impute to him injurious and unhandsome suspicions. Lord Glenvarloch could not stand this change of tone: He recollected that much was due from him to Lord Dalgarno, on account of his father's ready and efficient friendship, and something also on account of the frank manner in which the young man himself had offered him his intimacy. He had no reason to doubt his assurances, that the house where they were about to dine did not fall under the description of places to which his father's prohibition referred; and finally, he was strong in his own resolution to resist every temptation to join in games of chance. He therefore pacified Lord Dalgarno, by intimating his willingness to go along with him; and, the good-humour of the young courtier instantaneously returning, he again ran on in a grotesque and rodomontade account of the host, Monsieur de Beaujeu, which he did not conclude until they had reached the temple of Hospitality over which that eminent professor presided.

CHAPTER XII.

— This is the very barn-yard,
Where muster daily the prime cocks o' the game
Ruffle their pinions, crow till they are hoarse,
And spar about a barleycorn. Here too chickens,
The callow, unfledged brood of forward folly,
Learn first to rear the crest, and aim the spur,
And tune their note like full-plumed Chanticleer.

The Bear-Garden.

THE Ordinary, now an ignoble sound, was in the days of James, a new institution, as fashionable among the youth of that age as the first-rate modern lub-houses are amongst those of the present day. It differed chiefly, in being open to all whom good clothes and good assurance combined to introduce here. The company usually dined together at an hour fixed, and the manager of the establishment resided as master of the ceremonies.

Monsieur le Chevalier, (as he qualified himself,) saint Priest de Beaujeu, was a sharp, thin Gascon, about sixty years old, banished from his own country, as he said, on account of an affair of honour, in which he had the misfortune to kill his antagonist, though the best swordsman in the south of France. His pretensions to quality were supported by a feathered hat, a long rapier, and a suit of embroidered affeta, not much the worse for wear, in the extreme fashion of the Parisian court, and fluttering like a laypole with many knots of riband, of which it was computed he bore at least five hundred yards about his person. But notwithstanding this profusion of decoration, there were many who thought Monsieur Chevalier so admirably calculated for his present situation, that nature could never have meant to lace him an inch above it. It was, however, part of the amusement of the place, for Lord Dalgarno and other young men of quality to treat Monsieur de Beaujeu with a great deal of mock ceremony, which being observed by the herd of more ordinary and simple gulls, they paid him, in clumsy imitation, much real deference. The Gascon's natural forwardness being much enhanced by these circumstances, he was often guilty of presuming beyond the limits of his situation, and of course had sometimes the mortification to be disagreeably driven back into them.

When Nigel entered the mansion of this eminent person, which had been but of late the residence of a great Baron of Queen Elizabeth's court, who had retired to his manors in the country on the death of that princess, he was surprised at the extent of the accommodation which it afforded, and the number of guests who were already assembled. Feathers waved, spurs jingled, lace and embroidery glanced every where; and, at first sight at least, it certainly made good Lord Dalgarno's encomium, who represented the company as composed almost entirely of youth of the first quality. A more close review was not quite so favourable. Several individuals might be discovered who were not exactly at their ease in the splendid dresses which they wore, and who, therefore, might be supposed not habitually familiar with such finery. Again, there were others, whose dress, though on a general view it did not seem inferior to that of the rest of the company, displayed, on being observed more closely, some of those petty expedients, by which vanity endeavours to disguise poverty.

Nigel had very little time to make such observations, for the entrance of Lord Dalgarno created an immediate bustle and sensation among the company, as his name passed from one mouth to another.—Some stood forward to gaze, others stood back to make way—those of his own rank hastened to welcome him—those of inferior degree endeavoured to catch some point of his gesture, or of his dress, to be worn and practised upon a future occasion, as the newest and most authentic fashion.

The Genius Loci, the Chevalier himself, was not the last to welcome this prime stay and ornament of his establishment. He came shuffling forward with a hundred apish congrés and chers milors, to express his happiness at seeing Lord Dalgarno again.—"I hope you do bring back the sun with you, milor—You did carry away the sun and moon from your pauvre Chevalier when you leave him for so long. Pardieu, I believe you take them away in your pockets."

"That must have been because you left me nothing else in them, Chevalier," answered Lord Dalgarno; "but Monsieur le Chevalier, I pray you to know my countryman and friend, Lord Glenvarloch."

"Ah, lia! très honoré—Je m'en souviens—oui. J'ai connu autrefois un Milor Kenfarloque en Ecosse. Yes, I have memory of him—le père de milor apparemment—we were vera intimate when I was at Oly Root with Monsieur de la Motte—I did often play at tennis vit Milor Kenfarloque at l'Abbaie d'Oly Root—il étoit même plus fort que moi—Ah le beaucoup de revers qu'il avoit!—I have memory, too, that he was among the pretty girls—ah, un vrai diable déchainé—Aha! I have memory"—

"Better have no more memory of the late Lord Glenvarloch," said Lord Dalgarno, interrupting the Chevalier without ceremony; who perceived that the encomium which he was about to pass on the deceased was likely to be as disagreeable to the son, as it was totally undeserved by the father, who, far from being either a gamester or libertine, as the Chevalier's reminiscences falsely represented him, was, on the contrary, strict and severe in his course of life, almost to the extent of rigour.

"You have the reason, milor," answered the Chevalier, "you have the right—Qu'est ce que nous avons a faire avec le temps passé!—the time passed did belong to our fathers—our ancêtres—very well—the time present is to us—they have their pretty tombs, with their memories and armorials, all in brass and marble—we have the petits plats exquis, and the soupe-a-Chevalier, which I will cause to mount up immediately."

So saying, he made a pirouette on his heel, and put his attendants in motion to place dinner on the table. Dalgarno laughed, and, observing his young friend looked grave, said to him in a tone of reproach—"Why, what!—you are not gull enough to be angry with such an ass as that?"

"I keep my anger, I trust, for better purposes," said Lord Glenvarloch; "but I confess I was moved to hear such a fellow mention my father's name—and you, too, who told me this was no gaming house, talked to him of having left it with emptied pockets."

"Psha, man!" said Lord Dalgarno, "I spoke but according to the trick of the time; besides, a man must set a piece or two sometimes, or he would be held a cullionly niggard. But here comes dinner, and we will see whether you like the Chevalier's good cheer better than his conversation."

Dinner was announced accordingly, and the two friends, being seated in the most honourable station at the board, were ceremoniously attended to by the Chevalier, who did the honours of his table to them and to the other guests, and seasoned the whole with his agreeable conversation. The dinner was really excellent, in that piquant style of cookery which the French had already introduced, and which the home-bred young men of England, when they aspired to the rank of connoisseurs and persons of taste, were under the necessity of admiring. The wine was also of the first quality, and circulated in great variety, and no less abundance. The conversation among so many young men was, of course, light, lively, and amusing; and Nigel, whose mind had been long depressed by anxiety and misfortune, naturally found himself at ease, and his spirits raised and animated.

Some of the company had real wit, and could use it both politely and to advantage; others were coxcombs, and were laughed at without discovering it; and, again, others were originals, who seemed to have no objection that the company should be amused with their folly instead of their wit. And almost all the rest who played any prominent part in the conversation, had either the real tone of good society which belonged to the period, or the jargon which often passes current for it.

In short, the company and conversation was so agreeable, that Nigel's rigour was softened by it, even towards the master of ceremonies, and he listened with patience to various details which the Chevalier de Beaujeu, seeing, as he said, that Milor's taste lay for the "curieux and l'utile," chose to address to him in particular, on the subject of cookery. To gratify, at the same time, the taste for antiquity, which he somehow supposed that his new guest possessed, he launched out in commendation of the great artists of former days, particularly one whom he had known in his youth, "Maitre de Cuisine to the Maréchal Strozzi—très bon gentil homme pour tant;" who had maintained his master's table with twelve covers every day during the long and severe blockade of le petit Leith, although he had nothing better to place on it than the quarter of a carrion-horse now and then, and the grass and weeds that grew on the ramparts. "Despardieux c'étoit un homme superbe! With one thistle-head, and a nettle or two, he could make a soupe for twenty guests—an haunch of a little puppy-dog made a roti des plus excellens; but his coup de maître was when the rendition—what you call the surrender, took place and appened; and then, dieu me damme, he made out of the hind quarter of one salted horse, forty-five converts; that the English and Scottish officers and nobility, who had the honour to dine with Monseigneur upon the rendition, could not tell what the devil any one of them were made upon at all."*

* The exertion of French ingenuity mentioned in the text is noticed by some authorities of the period: the siege of Leith was also distinguished by the protracted obstinacy of the beleaguered, in which was displayed all that the age possessed of defensive war, so that Frantome records that those who witnessed this siege, had, from that very circumstance, a degree of consequence yielded to their persons and opinions. He tells a story of Strozzi himself, from which it appears that his pests "by a good deal in the line of the cuisine." He caused a rule to be stolen from one Brusquet, on whom he wished to play a trick, and served up the flesh of that unclean animal so well disguised, that it passed with Brusquet for venison.

The good wine had by this time gone so round, and had such genial effect on the guests of the lower end of the table, who had been listeners, began, not greatly to their own or that of the ordinary, to make innovations.

"You speak of the siege of Leith," said a raw-boned man, with thick mustaches tu with a military twist, a broad buff belt, a long and other outward symbols of the honoured sion, which lives by killing other people,—"of the siege of Leith, and I have seen the pretty kind of a hamlet it is, with a plain rampart, and a pigeon-house or so of a tower angle. Uds daggers and scabbards, if a lot our days had been twenty-four hours, not many months, before it, without carrying it and all its cocklofts, one after another by it they would have deserved no better grace the Provost-Marshal gives when his noose is ree"

"Saar," said the Chevalier, "Monsieur taine, I was not at the siege of the petit Leith I know not what you say about the cockloft will say for Monseigneur de Strozzi, that he stood the grande guerre, and was grand cap plus grand—that is more great, it may be, than of the capitaines of Angleterre, who do speak loud—tenez, Monsieur, car c'est à vous!"

"O Monsieur," answered the swordsman, "know the Frenchman will fight well behind a rier of stone, or when he is armed with back and pot."

"Pot!" exclaimed the Chevalier, "what mean by pot—do you mean to insult me and noble guests? Saar, I have done my duty as a gentilhomme under the Grand Henri Quatre at Courtrai and Yvry, and, ventre saint gris! neither pot nor marmite, but did always change our shirt."

"Which refutes another base scandal," said Dalgarno, laughing, "alleging that linen was among the French gentlemen-at-arms."

"Gentlemen out at arms and elbows be mean, my lord," said the captain, from the of the table. "Craving your lordship's pardon know something of these same gens-d'armes"

"We will spare your knowledge at present, and save your modesty at the same time the of telling us how that knowledge was answered Lord Dalgarno, rather contemptuous"

"I need not speak of it, my lord," said a of war; "the world knows it: all, perhaps, men of molhair—the poor sneaking citizens, don, who would see a man of valour eat hilts for hunger, ere they would draw a from their long purses to relieve them. O, if of the honest fellows I have seen were once near that cuckoo's nest of theirs!"

"A cuckoo's nest!—and that said of the London!" said a gallant who sat on the side of the table, and who, wearing a splendid fashionable dress, seemed yet scarce at home "I will not brook to hear that repeated."

* The quarrel in this chapter between the pretender and the citizen of London, is taken from a farlous called "The Counter Scuffle, that is, the Scuffle in the Wood street, so called. It is a piece of low humour, but at the time very considerable vogue. The prisoners, had fallen into a dispute amongst themselves, "which was of most repute," and a lawyer put in his claim to highly considered. The man of war repelled his pret much arrogance

"'Wer't not for us, thou swad,' quoth he
'Where wouldst thou lay to get a fee?
But to defend such things as thee
Tis pity;
For such as you esteem us least,
Who ever have been ready prest
To guard you and your cuckoo's nest,
The City."

The offence is no sooner given than it is caught up lant citizen, a goldsmith, named Edis.

"'Of London city I am free,
And there I first my wife did see,
And from that very cause," said he,
I love it,
And he that calls it cuckoo's nest,
Except he say he speaks in jest,
He is a villain and a beast,— I'll prove it!"

What!" said the soldier, bending a most terrific frown from a pair of broad black eyebrows, handling the hilt of his weapon with one hand, and twirling the other his huge mustaches; "will you quarrel your city?"

Ay, marry will I," replied the other. "I am a zen, I care not who knows it; and he who shall speak a word in dispraise of the city, is an ass and a empty gull, and I will break his pate, to teach him sense and manners."

The company, who probably had their reasons for valuing the captain's courage at the high rate which he himself put upon it, were much entertained by the manner in which the quarrel was taken up by the indignant citizen; and they exclaimed on all sides, "Well rung, Bow-bell!"—"Well crowed, the cock of Saint Paul's!"—"Sound a charge there, or the soldier will mistake his signals, and retreat when he should advance."

You mistake me, gentlemen," said the captain, turning round with an air of dignity. "I will but inquire whether this cavaliero citizen is of rank and free fitted to measure swords with a man of action; if, conceive me, gentlemen, it is not with every one that I can match myself without loss of reputation; if in that case he shall soon hear from me honourably, by way of cartel."

You shall feel me most dishonourably in the way of cudgel," said the citizen, starting up, and taking his sword, which he had laid in a corner. "Follow

It is my right to name the place of combat, by the rules of the sword," said the captain; "and to nominate the Maze, in Tothill-Fields, for place of gentlemen, who shall be indifferent judges, for witnesses;—and for time—let me say this day forth, at daybreak."

And I," said the citizen, "do nominate the bowling-alley behind the house for place, the present odd company for witnesses, and for time the present moment."

So saying, he cast on his beaver, struck the soldier across the shoulders with his sheathed sword, and went down stairs. The captain showed no instant anxiety to follow him; yet, at last, roused by the glances and sneers around him, he assured the company, that what he did, he would do deliberately, and turning his hat, which he put on with the air of a great Pistol, he descended the stairs to the place of combat, where his more prompt adversary was already stationed, with his sword unsheathed. Of the company, all of whom seemed highly delighted with the approaching fray, some ran to the windows which overlooked the bowling-alley, and others followed the combatants down stairs. Nigel could not resist asking Dalgarno whether he would not interfere to prevent mischief.

"It would be a crime against the public interest," answered his friend; "there can no mischief happen between two such originals, which will not be a positive benefit to society, and particularly to the Chevalier's establishment, as he calls it. I have been asked of that captain's buff belt, and red doublet, for a month past, as if I was of aught; and now I see this bold linendraper will cudgel the ass out of that filthy lion's hide. See, Nigel, see the gallant citizen has taken his ground about a bowl's-cast forward, in the midst of the alley—the very model of a gentleman in armour. Behold how he prances with his only foot, and brandishes his blade, much as if he were about to measure forth cambric with it.—See how he brings on the reluctant soldado, and plants him opposite to his fiery antagonist, twelve paces still dividing them—Lo, the captain draws his tool, but, as a good general, looks over his shoulder to secure

For though I am a man of trade,
And free of London city made,
Yet can I use gun, bill, and blade,
In battle.

And citizens, if need require,
Themselves can force the foe retire,
Whatever this low countryquire
May prattle."

The dispute terminates in the scuffle which is the subject of the poem. The whole may be found in the second edition of Johnson's Miscellany, 12mo. vol. iii. 1716.

his retreat, in case the worse come on't. Behold the valiant shopkeeper stoops his head, confident, doubtless, in the civic helmet with which his spouse has fortified his skull—Why, this is the rarest of sport. By Heaven, he will run a tilt at him like a ram."

It was even as Lord Dalgarno had anticipated; for the citizen, who seemed quite serious in his zeal for combat, perceiving that the man of war did not advance towards him, rushed onwards with as much good fortune as courage, beat down the captain's guard, and, pressing on, thrust, as it seemed, his sword clear through the body of his antagonist, who, with a deep groan, measured his length on the ground. A score of voices cried to the conqueror, as he stood fixed in astonishment at his own feat, "Away, away with you!—fly, fly—fly by the back door!—get into the Whitefriars, or cross the water to the Bankside, while we keep off the mob and the constables." And the conqueror, leaving his vanquished foeman on the ground, fled accordingly, with all speed.

"By Heaven," said Lord Dalgarno, "I could never have believed that the fellow would have stood to receive a thrust—he has certainly been arrested by positive terror, and lost the use of his limbs. See, they are raising him."

Stiff and stark seemed the corpse of the swordsman, as one or two of the guests raised him from the ground; but, when they began to open his waistcoat to search for the wound which nowhere existed, the man of war collected his scattered spirits; and, conscious that the ordinary was no longer a stage on which to display his valour, took to his heels as fast as he could run, pursued by the laughter and shouts of the company.

"By my honour," said Lord Dalgarno, "he takes the same course with his conqueror. I trust in heaven he will overtake him, and then the valiant citizen will suppose himself haunted by the ghost of him he has slain."

"Despardieux, milor," said the Chevalier, "if he had staid one moment, he should have had a torchon—what you call a dishelout, pinned to him for a piece of shroud, to show he be de ghost of one grand fanfaron."

"In the meanwhile," said Lord Dalgarno, "you will oblige us, Monsieur le Chevalier, as well as maintain your own honoured reputation, by letting your drawers receive the man-at-arms with a cudgel, in case he should venture to come this way again."

"Ventre saint gris, milor," said the Chevalier, "leave that to me.—Begar, the maid shall throw the wash-bud upon the grand poltron!"

When they had laughed sufficiently at this ludicrous occurrence, the party began to divide themselves into little knots—some took possession of the alley, late the scene of combat, and put the field to its proper use of a bowling-ground, and it soon resounded with all the terms of the game, as "run, run—rub, rub—hold him, you infernal trundling timber!" thus making good the saying, that three things are thrown away in a bowling-green, namely, time, money, and oaths.

In the house, many of the gentlemen betook themselves to cards or dice, and parties were formed at Ombre, at Bassett, at Gleek, at Primero, and other games then in fashion; while the dice were used at various games, both with and without the tables, as Hazard, In and In, Passage, and so forth. The play, however, did not appear to be extravagantly deep; it was certainly conducted with great decorum and fairness; nor did there appear anything to lead the young Scotsman in the least to doubt his companion's assurance, that the place was frequented by men of rank and quality, and that the recreations they adopted were conducted upon honourable principles.

Lord Dalgarno neither had proposed play to his friend, nor joined in the amusement himself, but sauntered from one table to another, remarking the luck of the different players, as well as their capacity to avail themselves of it, and exchanging conversation with the highest and most respectable of the guests. At length, as if tired of what in modern phrase would have been termed lounging, he suddenly remembered that Burbage was to act Shakspeare's King Richard, at the Fortune, that afternoon, and that he could not the stronger in London, the Lord Glenvarloch, a higher consideration than to carry him to that existence; "entire, entire," he added, in a whisper, "there is a natural interdict of the theatre as well as of the ordinary."

"I never heard my father speak of stage-plays," said Lord Glenvarloch, "for they are shows of a modern date, and unknown in Scotland. Yet, if what I have heard of their popularity be true, I doubt much whether he would have approved of them."

"Approved of them?" exclaimed Lord Dalgarno—"why, George Buchanan wrote tragedies, and his page, learned and wise as himself, goes to see them, as it is not due to treason to abstain; and the distinguished men in England write for the stage, and the greatest women in London resort to the playhouse, and I have a brace of hags at the door which will carry me along the streets like whiffles, and the rick will dispose our venians and orisons, and dissipate the fumes of the wine, and so let's to hump—Good-night to you, gentlemen—Good-night, Chevalier de la Fortune."

Lord Dalgarne's guests were in attendance with two horses, and the young men mounted, the propriety upon a favourite park, and Nigel upon a high-stepped pillion scarce less beautiful. As they rode towards the theatre, Lord Dalgarne endeavoured to discover his friend's opinion of the company to which he had introduced him, and to combat the exceptions which he might suppose him to have taken. "And wherefore lookest thou and," he said, "my private prophecy? Sage son of the Alpine Master of Low Dutch learning, what aileth thee? Is the leaf of the living world which we have turned over in company, less floury written than thou hast been taught to expect?
Is comforted, and pass over one little blot or two,
thou wilt be doomed to read through many a page, as black as ink, with but sorry penmen, can make them. Remember most immaculate Nigel, that we are in London, not Leyden—that we are studying life, not law. Stand bull against the reproach of these over-landed connoisseurs, men, and when thou comest up, like a good arithmetician, the arithmetician of the day, before you balance the account upon your pillow, tell the accounting spirit, to his benighted board, that if these eyes have heard the clatter of the devil's bones, thy hand hath not crowded them—that if thine eye hath seen the brewing of two angry boys, thy hand hath not been raised in their fray."

"Now, all this may be wise and witty," replied Nigel; "yet I own I cannot think but that your lordship, and other men of good quality with whom we dined, might have chosen a place of meeting free from the intrusion of bores, and a better manner of your entertainment than yonder foreign adventures."

"All shall be amended, Gentle Nigel, when thou shalt come forth a new Peter the Hermit, to preach a crusade against drinking, drinking, and company keeping. We will meet for dinner in Saint Stephen's Church; we will dine in the church, drink our flask in the vestry, the parson shall draw every cork, and the clerk cry amen to every breath. Come, men, close up, and get rid of this sour and unsocial humour. Credit me, that the Puritans who object to us the follies and the frictions incident to human nature, have themselves the vices of absolute devils, envy malice and backbiting hypocrisy, and spiritual pride in all its ramifications. There is much, too, in life when we must own, were it only to learn to shun it.
Will Shakespeare, who lives after death, and who is generally to afford this such pleasure as come but himself can confer, has described the gallant Fabian bridge as calling that man a bastard to the time,

That does not much of observation
Which, though I will not praise to doctors,
Yet, to great doctors, I mean to learn."

But here we are at the door of the Fortune, where we shall have matchless Will speaking for himself.— Gobbs, and you other lout, leave the horses to the groom, and make way for us through the press."

They dismounted, and the continuous efforts of La-da, elbowing, bullying, and perambulating his master's name and title, made way through a crowd of magnifying citizens, and clamorous apprentices, to the door, where Lord Dalgarne specifically pointed of stools upon the stage for his companions and, where, seated among the gallants of class, they had an opportunity of displaying dresses and fashionable manners, while they the press during the program, thus forming same time, a conspicuous part of the scene an important proportion of the audience.

Nigel Oldmont was too eagerly and deeply in the interest of the scene, to be capable of his part as became the place where he was.
He felt all the magic of that career, who played, within the paltry circle of a wooden long way of York and Lancaster, competitors of other bar to stall across the acquaint and fashion as they lived, as if they given up the dead for the amusement and of the living. "Duchess" concerned the business of the scene, played the instant and with much truth and liveliness, that when the play worth seemed concluded by his death, the play and deception were strongly reminding Glenvarloch's imagination, and it required young himself from his reverie, to arrange disposed at first sound when his companion
King Richard should step with them at the

They were joined, at the same time, by a of the gentlemen with whom they had dined they recruited by moving two or three of accomplished wife and party, who seldom attend the Fortune Theatre, and were ever ready to conclude a day of amusement with of pleasure. Thither the whole party adjourned between festive cups of such excited spirit emulous was of their lively companions, some like the joyous host of one of Ben Jonson's poets, when reminding the lord of "Thou lovest the bottle

Where men with rioting have
As night their senses void, out went;
While yet our senses are about us,
Quoted the next, quoted the bottle wine."

CHAPTER XIII.

Let the friend within guess the brother's heart That stroke and then for a long time—He will then out your line that it shall be a long time from the world's eye, as you will find it long. You must have patience—The story will which is his true, both sides come to a close and the deep rest both sides and change round to see your feeling—You see we have reached the end of the story.

It is seldom that a day of pleasure, upon which altogether an exquisite as the partial festivity may have felt it while passing over Nigel Oldmont at least did not feel it so, and a visit from his new acquaintance, Lord Dal-garne, he returned to himself. But this place early after breakfast, and his friend's was preceded with a question, How he liked any of the preceding evening?

"Why, excellently well," said Lord Glenvarloch; "only I should have liked the wit better to flow more freely. Every man's seemed on the stretch, and each extravagant seemed to set one half of your men of own early friend identified with his character. This

With his whole army took the city way,
And in whom Richard was a lord of power,
Duchess of himself as might and all his forces
I will tell you they were. Why he would tell
The story of his life and death, which was Richard's story of his life and death for much say,
He had no other story to tell from the play Which I might guess by a morning up the

But Richard's story was a story of a story,
Which he would tell a story of a story,
But when he would have said that Richard III and called, a story of a story, he (Duchess) called Richard's story of a story, which was brown study to produce something which should out-herod it."

"And wherefore not?" said Lord Dalgarno, "or what are these fellows fit for, but to play the intellectual gladiators before us? He of them who declares himself recreant, should, d—n him, be restricted to muddy ale, and the patronage of the Waterman's Company. I promise you, that many a pretty fellow has been mortally wounded with a quibble or a car-wicket at the Mermaid, and sent from thence, in a pitiable estate, to Wit's hospital in the Vintry, where they languish to this day amongst fools and aldermen."

"It may be so," said Lord Nigel; "yet I could swear by my honour, that last night I seemed to be in company with more than one man whose genius and learning ought either to have placed him higher in our company, or to have withdrawn him altogether from a scene, where, sooth to speak, his part seemed unworthily subordinate."

"Now, out upon your tender conscience," said Lord Dalgarno; "and the fido for such outcasts of Parnassus! Why, these are the very leavings of that noble banquet of pickled herrings and Rhenish, which lost London so many of her principal wit-mongers and bards of misrule. What would you have said had you seen Nash or Green, when you interest yourself about the poor mimes you supped with last night? Suffice it, they had their drench and their doze, and they drank and slept as much as may save them from any necessity of eating till evening, when, if they are industrious, they will find patrons or players to feed them.* For the rest of their wants, they can be at no loss for cold water while the New River head holds good; and your doublets of Parnassus are eternal in duration."

"Virgil and Horace had more efficient patronage," said Nigel.

"Aye," replied his countryman, "but these fellows are neither Virgil nor Horace; besides, we have other spirits of another sort, to whom I will introduce you on some early occasion. Our Swan of Avon hath sung his last; but we have stout old Ben, with as much learning and genius as ever prompted the trader of sock and buskin. It is not, however, of him I mean now to speak; but I come to pray you, of dear love, to row up with me as far as Richmond, where two or three of the gallants whom you saw yesterday, mean to give music and syllabubs to a set of beauties, with some curious bright eyes among them—such, I promise you, as might win an astrologer from his worship of the galaxy. My sister leads the bevy, to whom I desire to present you. She hath her admirers at Court; and is regarded, though I might dispense with sounding her praise, as one of the beauties of the time."

There was no refusing an engagement, where the presence of the party invited, late so low in his own regard, was demanded by a lady of quality, one of the choice beauties of the time. Lord Glenvarloch accepted, as was inevitable, and spent a lively day among the gay and the fair. He was the gallant in attendance, for the day, upon his friend's sister, the beautiful Countess of Blackchester, who aimed at once at superiority in the realms of fashion, of power, and of wit.

She was, indeed, considerably older than her brother, and had probably completed her six lustres; but the deficiency in extreme youth was more than atoned for, in the most precise and curious accuracy in attire, an early acquaintance with every foreign mode, and a peculiar gift in adapting the knowledge which she acquired, to her own particular features and complexion. At Court, she knew as well as any lady in the circle, the precise tone, moral, political, learned, or jocose, in which it was proper to answer the Monarch, according to his prevailing humour; and was supposed to have been very active, by her personal interest, in procuring her husband a high situation, which the gouty old viscount could never have deserved by any merit of his own commonplace conduct and understanding.

* The condition of men of wit and talents was never more melancholy than about this period. Their lives were so irregular, and their means of living so precarious, that they were alternately rioting in debauchery, or encountering and struggling with the meanest necessities. Two or three lost their lives by a surfeit brought on by that fatal banquet of Rhenish wine and pickled herrings, which is familiar to those who study the lighter literature of that age. The whole history is a most melancholy picture of genius, degraded at once by its own debaucheries, and the patronage of heartless rakes and profligates.

It was far more easy for this lady than for her brother, to reconcile so young a courtier as Lord Glenvarloch to the customs and habits of a sphere so new to him. In all civilized society, the females of distinguished rank and beauty give the tone to manners, and, through these, even to morals. Lady Blackchester had, besides, interest either in the Court, or over the Court, (for its source could not be well traced,) which created friends, and overawed those who might have been disposed to play the part of enemies.

At one time, she was understood to be closely leagued with the Buckingham family, with whom her brother still maintained a great intimacy; and, although some coldness had taken place betwixt the Countess and the Duchess of Buckingham, so that they were little seen together, and the former seemed considerably to have withdrawn herself into privacy, it was whispered, that Lady Blackchester's interest with the great favourite was not diminished in consequence of her breach with his lady.

Our accounts of the private Court intrigues of that period, and of the persons to whom they were intrusted, are not full enough to enable us to pronounce upon the various reports which arose out of the circumstances we have detailed. It is enough to say, that Lady Blackchester possessed great influence on the circle around her, both from her beauty, her abilities, and her reputed talents for Court intrigue; and that Nigel Olifaunt was not long of experiencing its power, as he became a slave in some degree to that species of habit, which carries so many men into a certain society at a certain hour, without expecting or receiving any particular degree of gratification, or even amusement.

His life for several weeks may be thus described. The ordinary was no bad introduction to the business of the day; and the young lord quickly found, that if the society there was not always irreproachable, still it formed the most convenient and agreeable place of meeting with the fashionable parties, with whom he visited Hyde Park, the theatres, and other places of public resort, or joined the gay and glittering circle which Lady Blackchester had assembled around her. Neither did he entertain the same scrupulous horror which led him originally even to hesitate entering into a place where gaming was permitted; but, on the contrary, began to admit the idea, that as there could be no harm in beholding such recreation when only indulged in to a moderate degree, so, from a party of reasoning, there could be no objection to joining in it, always under the same restrictions. But the young lord was a Scotsman, habituated to early reflection, and totally unaccustomed to any habit which inferred a careless risk or profuse waste of money. Profusion was not his natural vice, or one likely to be acquired in the course of his education; and, in all probability, while his father anticipated with noble horror the idea of his son approaching the gaming-table, he was more startled at the idea of his becoming a gaining than a losing adventurer. The second, according to his principles, had a termination, a sad one indeed, in the loss of temporal fortune—the first quality went on increasing the evil which he dreaded, and perilled at once both body and soul.

However, the old lord might ground his apprehension, it was so far verified by his son's conduct, that, from an observer of the various games of chance which he witnessed, he came, by degrees, by moderate hazards, and small bets or wagers, to take a certain interest in them. Nor could it be denied, that his rank and expectations entitled him to hazard a few pieces (for his game went no deeper) against persons, who, from the readiness with which they staked their money, might be supposed well able to afford to lose it.

It chanced, or, perhaps, according to the common belief, his evil genius had so decreed, that Nigel's adventures were remarkably successful. He was temed that you now see me less than formerly : The stag-hunting is commenced, and the Prince looks that I should attend him more frequently. I must also maintain my attendance on the Duke, that I may have an opportunity of pleading your cause when occasion shall permit."

"I have no cause to plead before the Duke," said Nigel, gravely ; "I have said so repeatedly."

"Why, I meant the phrase no otherwise, thou churlish and suspicious disputant," answered Dalgarno, "than as I am now pleading the Duke's cause with thee. Surely I only mean to claim a share in our royal master's favourite benediction, Beati pacifici."

Upon several occasions, Lord Glenvarloch's conversations, both with the old Earl and his son, took a similar turn and had a like conclusion. He sometimes felt as if, betwixt the one and the other, not to mention the more unseen and unboasted, but scarce less certain influence of Lady Blackhester, his affair, simple as it had become, might have been somehow accelerated. But it was equally impossible to doubt the rough honesty of the father, and the eager and officious friendship of Lord Dalgarno ; nor was it easy to suppose that the countenance of the lady, by whom he was received with such distinction, would be wanting, could it be effectual in his service.

Nigel was farther sensible of the truth of what Lord Dalgarno often pointed out, that the favourite being supposed to be his enemy, every petty officer, through whose hands his affair must necessarily pass, would desire to make a merit of throwing obstacles in his way, which he could only surmount by steadiness and patience, unless he preferred closing the breach, or, as Lord Dalgarno called it, making his peace with the Duke of Buckingham.

Nigel might, and doubtless would, have had recourse to the advice of his friend George Heriot upon this occasion, having found it so advantageous formerly ; but the only time he saw him after their visit to Court, he found the worthy citizen engaged in hasty preparation for a journey to Paris, upon business of great importance in the way of his profession, and by an especial commission from the Court and the Duke of Buckingham, which was likely to be attended with considerable profit. The good man smiled as he named the Duke of Buckingham. He had been, he said, pretty sure that his disgrace in that quarter, would not be of long duration.

Lord Glenvarloch expressed himself rejoiced at their reconciliation, observing, that it had been a most painful reflection to him, that Master Heriot should, in his behalf, have incurred the dislike, and perhaps exposed himself to the ill offices, of so powerful a favourite.

"My lord," said Heriot, "for your father's son I would do much ; and yet truly, if I know myself, I would do as much, and risk as much, for the sake of justice, in the case of a much more insignificant person, as I have ventured for yours. But as we shall not meet for some time, I must commit to your own wisdom the farther prosecution of this matter."

And thus they took a kind and affectionate leave of each other.

There were other changes in Lord Glenvarloch's situation, which require to be noticed. His present occupations, and the habits of amusement which he had acquired, rendered his living so far in the city a considerable inconvenience. He may also have become a little ashamed of his cabin on Paul's Wharf, and desirous of being lodged somewhat more according to his quality. For this purpose, he had hired a small apartment near the Temple. He was, nevertheless, almost sorry for what he had done, when he observed that his removal appeared to give some pain to John Christie, and a great deal to his cordial and officious landlady. The former, who was grave and saturnine in every thing he did, only hoped that all had been to Lord Glenvarloch's mind, and that he had not left them on account of any unbecoming negligence on their part. But the tear twinkled in Dame Nelly's eye, while she recounted the various improvements she had made in the apartment, of express purpose to render it more convenient to his lordship.

H

"There was a great sea-chest," she said, "had been taken up stairs to the shopman's garret, though it left the poor lad scarce eighteen inches of opening to creep betwixt it and his bed ; and Heaven knew—she did not—whether it could ever be brought down that narrow stair again. Then the turning the closet into an alcove, had cost a matter of twenty round shillings ; and to be sure, to any other lodger but his lordship, the closet was more convenient. There was all the linen, too, which she had bought on purpose—But Heaven's will be done—she was resigned."

Every body likes marks of personal attachment ; and Nigel, whose heart really smote him, as if in his rising fortunes he were disdaining the lowly accommodations and the civilities of the humble friends which had been but lately actual favours, failed not by every assurance in his power, and by as liberal payment as they could be prevailed upon to accept, to alleviate the soreness of their feelings at his departure ; and a parting kiss from the fair lips of his hostess sealed his forgiveness.

Richie Monplies lingered behind his master, to ask whether, in case of need, John Christie could help a canny Scotsman to a passage back to his own country ; and receiving assurance of John's interest to that effect, he said at parting, he would remind him of his promise soon—"For," said he, "if my lord is not weary of this London life, I ken one that is, videlicet, mysell ; and I am weel determined to see Arthur's Seat again ere I am many weeks older."

CHAPTER XIV.

Bingo, why, Bingo ! hey, boy—here, sir, here !—
He's gone and off, but he'll be home before us ;—
'Tis the most wayward cur e'er mumbled bone,
Or dogg'd a master's footstep—Bingo loves me
Better than ever beggar loved his alms ;
Yet, when he takes such humour, you may coax
Sweet Mistress Fantasy, your worship's mistress,
Out of her sullen moods, as soon as Bingo.

The Dervile and his Dog.

RICHIE MONPLIES was as good as his word. Two or three mornings after the young lord had possessed himself of his new lodgings, he appeared before Nigel, as he was preparing to dress, having left his pillow at an hour much later than had formerly been his custom.

As Nigel looked upon his attendant, he observed there was a gathering gloom upon his solemn features, which expressed either additional importance, or superadded discontent, or a portion of both.

"How now," he said, "what is the matter this morning, Richie, that you have made your face so like the grotesque mask on one of the spouts yonder?" pointing to the Temple Church, of which Gothic building they had a view from the window.

Richie swivelled his head a little to the right with as little alacrity as if he had the crick in his neck, and instantly resuming his posture, replied—"Mask here, mask there—it were nae such matters that I have to speak anent."

"And what matters have you to speak anent, then?" said his master, whom circumstances had inured to tolerate a good deal of freedom from his attendant.

"My lord," said Richie, and then stopped to cough and hem, as if what he had to say stuck somewhat in his throat.

"I guess the mystery," said Nigel, "you want a little money, Richie ; will five pieces serve the present turn?"

"My lord," said Richie, "I may, it is like, want a trifle of money ; and I am glad at the same time and sorry, that it is mair plenty with your lordship than formerly."

"Glad and sorry, man!" said Lord Nigel, "why, you are reading riddles to me, Richie."

"My riddle will be briefly read," said Richie ; "I come to crave of your lordship your commands for Scotland."

"For Scotland!—why, art thou mad, man?" said Nigel ; "canst thou not tarry to go down with me?"

"I could be of little service," said Richie, "since you purpose to hire another page and groom."

"Why, thou jealous ass," said the young lord, "will not thy load of duty be the lighter?—Go, take thy breakfast, and drink thy ale double strong, to put such absurdities out of thy head—I could be angry with thee for thy folly, man; but I remember how thou hast stuck to me in adversity."

"Adversity, my lord, should never have parted us," said Richie; "methinks, had the worst come to worst, I could have starved as gallantly as your lordship, or more so, being in some sort used to it; for, though I was bred at a fisher's stall, I have, not through my life, had a constant intimacy with collops."

"Now, what is the meaning of all this trash?" said Nigel; "or has it no other end than to provoke my patience? You know well enough, that, had I twenty serving-men, I would hold the faithful follower that stood by me in my distress the most valued of them all. But it is totally out of reason to plague me with your solemn capriccios."

"My lord," said Richie, "in declaring your trust in me, you have done what is honourable to yourself, if I may with humility say so much, and in no way undeserved on my side. Nevertheless, we must part."

"Body of me, man, why?" said Lord Nigel; "what reason can there be for it, if we are mutually satisfied?"

"My lord," said Richie Monplies, "your lordship's occupations are such as I cannot own or countenance by my presence."

"How now, srrah!" said his master angrily.

"Under favour, my lord," replied his domestic, "it is unequal dealing to be equally offended by my speech and by my silence. If you can hear with patience the grounds of my departure, it may be, for aught I know, the better for you here and hereafter—if not, let me have my license of departure in silence, and I do no more about it."

"Go to, sir!" said Nigel; "speak out your mind—only remember to whom you speak it."

"Weel, weel, my lord—I speak it with humility;" (never did Richie look with more stretched dignity than when he uttered the word;) "but do you think this dining and earl-shuffling, and haunting of taverns and playhouses, suits your lordship—for I am sure it does not suit me?"

"Why, you are not turned precisian or puritan, fool?" said Lord Glenvarloch, laughing, though betwixt resentment and shame, it cost him some trouble to do so.

"My lord," replied the follower, "I ken the purport of your query. I am, it may be, a little of a precisian, and I wish to Heaven I was mair worthy of the name; but let that be a pass-over.—I have stretched the duties of a serving-man as far as my northern conscience will permit. I can gae my gude word to my master, or to my native country, when I am in a foreign land, even though I should leave downright truth a wee bit behind me. Ay, and I will take or give a slash with any man that speaks to the derogation of either. But this chambering, dining, and playhaunting, is not my element—I can not draw breath in it—and when I hear of your lordship winning the siller that some poor creature may fall sa' rly by—by my saul, if it wad serve your necessities, rather than you gained it from him, I wad tak a jump over the hedge with your lordship, and cry 'Stee!' to the first grazier we met, that was coming from Smith's, for the price of his Essex calves in his hand."

"You are a simpleton," said Nigel, who, however, much conscience-struck; "I never played for small sums."

"Ay, my lord," replied the any-thing domestic, "and still with reverence—it is even so, with the wrong. If you played with your equals, it would be like sin, but there wad be mair warlike honour in it. Your lordship kens, or may ken by experience, of your ain, whilk is not as yet many weeks out, that small sums can ill be missed by those that have none; and I mun' e'en be plain with you, that men of it of your lordship, that ye play wi' naught but the misguided creatures that can but afford to lose their stakes."

"No man dare say so!" replied Nigel, very angry. "I play with whom I please, but I will only play in what stake I please."

"That is just what they say, my lord," said the unrepentant Richie, whose natural love of lecturing, as well as his bluntness of feeling, prevented him from having any idea of the pain which he was inflicting on his master; "these are even their own very words. It was but yesterday your lordship was pleased at that same ordinary, to win from yonder young huffing gentleman, with the crimson velvet doublet, and the cock's feather in his beaver—him, I mean, who fought with the ranting captain—a matter of five pounds, or thereby. I saw him come through the hall; and, if he was not cleaned out of cross and pile, I never saw a ruined man in my life."

"Impossible!" said Lord Glenvarloch—"Who is he? he looked like a man of substance."

"All is not gold that glistens, my lord," replied Richie; "brocade and bullion buttons make the pouches. And if you ask who he is—maybe I had guess, and care not to tell."

"At least, if I have done any such a fellow's injury," said Lord Nigel, "let me know how I can repair it."

"Never fash your beard about that, my lord,—I reverence always," said Richie,—"he shall be sorely cared after. Think on him but as one who is running post to the devil, and got a shoulder from your lordship to help him on his journey. But I will stop him, if reason can; and so your lordship needs ask nae mair about it, for there is no use in your knowing it, but much the contrair."

"Hark you srrah," said his master, "I have been with you thus far, for certain reasons; but above good-nature no farther—and since you must needs why, go a God's name, and here is to pay your money." So saying, he put gold into his hand, which Richie told over, piece by piece, with the utmost accuracy.

"Is it all right—or are they wanting in weight—what the devil keeps you, when your hurry was a great five minutes since?" said the young lord, now thoroughly nettled at the presumptuous precision with which Richie dealt forth his canons of morality.

"The tale of coin is complete," said Richie, with the most unperturbable gravity; "and, for the weight, though they are sae scrupulous in this town, as was months at a piece that is a wee bit light, or has been cracked within the ring, my sooth, we will jump at them in Edinburgh like a cock at grosert. Gold pieces are not so plenty there, there the pity!"

"The more is your folly, then," said Nigel, whose anger was only momentary, "that leave the best where there is enough of them."

"My lord," said Richie, "to be round with you, the grace of God is better than gold pieces. When God has, as you call yonder Monsieur Latin,—and he might as well call him Glibet, since that is what he is like to end in,—shall recommend a page to you, I will hear little such doctrine as ye have heard from me.—And if they were my last words," he said, raising his voice, "I would say you are misled, and are forsaking the paths which your honourable fate has led you; and, what is more, you are going—under correction—to the devil with a dashclout, for you are laughed at by them that lead you into these orderly paths."

"Laughed at?" said Nigel, who, like others of his age, was more sensible to ridicule than to reason—"Who dares laugh at me?"

"My lord, as sure as I live by bread—nay, more, as I am a true man—and, I think, your lordship never forgave Richie's tongue bearing aught but the truth—and as for your lordship's credit, my country's profit, and for some small occasion of my ain, make necessary to promulgate the haill verities.—I say then, as I am a true man, when I saw that purser of a common ordinary, at that ordinary, whilk is at the (Heaven forgive me for swearing!) of God's own, with his teeth set, and his hands clenched, and his apron drawn over his brows like a desperate man, God said to me, 'There goes a dunghill'."

chicken, that your master has plucked clean enough; it will be long ere his lordship ruffle a feather with a cock of the game.' And so, my lord, to speak it out, the lackeys, and the gallants, and more especially your sworn brother, Lord Dalgarno, call you the sparrow-hawk.—I had some thought to have cracked Lutin's pate for the speech, but, after a', the controversy was not worth it."

"Do they use such terms of me?" said Lord Nigel.
"Death and the devil!"

"And the devil's dam, my lord," answered Richie; "they are all three busy in London.—And, besides, Lutin and his master laughed at you, my lord, for letting it be thought that—I shame to speak it—that ye were over well with the wife of the decent honest man whose house you but now left, as not sufficient for your new bravery, whereas they said, the licentious scoffers, that you pretended to such favour when you had not courage enough for so fair a quarrel, and that the sparrow-hawk was too craven-crested to fly at the wife of a cheesemonger."—He stopped a moment, and looked fixedly in his master's face, which was inflamed with shame and anger, and then proceeded. "My lord, I did you justice in my thought, and myself too; for, thought I, he would have been as deep in that sort of profligacy as in others, if it hadna been Richie's four quarters."

"What new nonsense have you got to plague me with?" said Lord Nigel. "But go on, since it is the last time I am to be tormented with your impertinence, go on, and make the most of your time."

"In troth," said Richie, "and so will I even do. And as Heaven has bestowed on me a tongue to speak and to advise"—

"Which talent you can by no means be accused of suffering to remain idle," said Lord Glenvarloch, interrupting him.

"True, my lord," said Richie, again waving his hand, as if to bespeak his master's silence and attention; "so, I trust, you will think some time hereafter. And, as I am about to leave your service, it is proper that ye sould know the truth, that ye may consider the snares to which your youth and innocence may be exposed, when sulder and doucer heads are withdrawn from beside you.—There has been a lusty, good-looking kimmer, of some forty, or bygone, making mony speerings about you, my lord."

"Well, sir, what did she want with me?" said Lord Nigel.

"At first, my Lord," replied his sapient follower, "as she seemed to be a well-fashioned woman, and to take pleasure in sensible company, I was no way reluctant to admit her to my conversation."

"I dare say not," said Lord Nigel; "nor unwilling to tell her about my private affairs."

"Not I, truly, my lord," said the attendant;—"for, though she asked me mony questions about your name, your fortune, your business here, and such like, I did not think it proper to tell her altogether the truth thereanent."

"I see no call on you whatever," said Lord Nigel, "to tell the woman either truth or lies upon what she had nothing to do with."

"I thought so, too, my lord," replied Richie, "and so I told her neither."

"And what did you tell her, then, you eternal babbler?" said his master, impatient of his prate, yet curious to know what it was all to end in.

"I told her," said Richie, "about your worldly fortune, and sae forth, something whilk is not truth just at this time; but which hath been truth formerly, sould be truth now, and will be truth again,—and that was, that you were in possession of your fair lands, whilk ye are but in right of as yet. Pleasant communing we had on that and other topics, until she showed the cloven root, beginning to confer with me about some wench that she said had a good-will to your lordship, and fain she would have spoken with you in particular anent it; but when I heard of such inklings, I began to suspect she was little better than—whew!"—Here he concluded his narrative with a low, but very expressive whistle.

"And what did your wisdom do in these circumstances?" said Lord Nigel, who, notwithstanding his former resentment, could now scarcely forbear laughing.

"I put on a look, my lord," replied Richie, bending his solemn brows, "that sould give her a heart-scald of walking on such errands. I laid her enormities clearly before her, and I threatened her, in sae mony words, that I would have her to the ducking-stool; and she, on the contrair part, miscawed me for a froward northern tyke—and so we parted never to meet again, as I hope and trust. And so I stood between your lordship and that temptation, which might have been worse than the ordinary, or the playhouse either; since you wot well what Solomon, King of the Jews, sayeth of the strange woman—for, said I to mysell, we have taken to dicing already, and if we take to drabbing next, the Lord kens what we may land in!"

"Your impertinence deserves correction, but it is the last which, for a time at least, I shall have to forgive—and I forgive it," said Lord Glenvarloch; "and, since we are to part, Richie, I will say no more respecting your precautions on my account, than that I think you might have left me to act according to my own judgment."

"Mickle better not," answered Richie—"mickle better not; we are a' frail creatures, and can judge better for ilk ither than in our ain cases. And for me, even myself, saving that case of the Suffocation, which might have happened to any one, I have always observed myself to be much more prudential in what I have done in your lordship's behalf, than even in what I have been able to transact for my own interest—whilk last, I have, indeed, always postponed, as in duty I ought."

"I do believe thou hast," said Lord Nigel, "having ever found thee true and faithful. And since London pleases you so little, I will bid you a short farewell; and you may go down to Edinburgh until I come thither myself, when I trust you will re-enter into my service."

"Now, heaven bless you, my lord," said Richie, with uplifted eyes; "for that word sounds more like grace than ony has come out of your mouth this fortnight.—I give you godd'en, my lord."

So saying, he thrust forth his immense bony hand, seized on that of Lord Glenvarloch, raised it to his lips, then turned short on his heel, and left the room hastily, as if afraid of showing more emotion than was consistent with his ideas of decorum. Lord Nigel, rather surprised at his sudden exit, called after him to know whether he was sufficiently provided with money; but Richie, shaking his head, without making any other answer, ran hastily down stairs, shut the street-door heavily behind him, and was presently seen striding along the Strand.

His master almost involuntarily watched and distinguished the tall raw-boned figure of his late follower, from the window, for some time, until he was lost among the crowd of passengers. Nigel's reflections were not altogether those of self-approval. It was no good sign of his course of life, (he could not help acknowledging this much to himself,) that so faithful an adherent no longer seemed to feel the same pride in his service, or attachment to his person, which he had formerly manifested. Neither could he avoid experiencing some twinges of conscience, while he felt in some degree the charges which Richie had preferred against him, and experienced a sense of shame and mortification, arising from the colour given by others to that, which he himself would have called his caution and moderation in play. He had only the apology, that it had never occurred to himself in this light.

Then his pride and self-love suggested, that, on the other hand, Richie, with all his good intentions, was little better than a conceited, pragmatical domestic, who seemed disposed rather to play the tutor than the lackey; and who, out of sheer love, as he alleged, to his master's person, assumed the privilege of interfering with, and controlling, his actions, besides rendering him ridiculous in the gay world, from the antiquated formality, and intrusive presumption, of his manners.

Nigel's eyes were scarce turned from the window, when his new landlord entering, presented to him a slip of paper, carefully bound round with a string of fox-milk and sealed—it had been given in, he said, by a woman, who did not stop an instant. The contents harped upon the same string which Rich^d. Monplais had already jarred. The epistle was in the following words:

"For the Right Honourable hands of Lord Glenvarloch—

"These, from a friend unknown—

"MY LORD. You are trusting to an dishonest friend, and diminishing an honest reputation. An unknown but real friend of your lordship will speak in one word what you would not learn from flatterers in so many days, as should suffice for you either man. He whom you think most true—I say, your friend Lord Dalzaino—is utterly false to you, and doth but seek, under pretence of friendship, to mar your fortune, and diminish the good name by which you might mend it. The kind countenance which he shows to you, is more dangerous than the Prince's frown; even as to gain at Beauchamp's ordinary, is more discreditable than to lose. Beware of both.—And this is all from your true but nameless friend, IGNOTO."

Lord Glenvarloch paused for an instant, and crushed the paper together—then again unfolded and read it with attention—bent his brows—mused for a moment, and then tearing it to fragments, exclaimed,— "Begone for a vile calumny! But I will watch—I will observe!"

Thought after thought rushed on him; but, upon the whole, Lord Glenvarloch was so little satisfied with the result of his own reflections, that he resolved to dissipate them by a walk in the Park, and, taking his cloak and beaver, went thither accordingly.

CHAPTER XV.

"Twas when fleet Snowball's head was waxen gray
A luckless fox met him on his way
Who knows not Snowball—he whose name renown'd
Is still victorious on each coursing ground
Swiftness, Newmarket, and the Roman Camp,
Have seen them victors o'er each meander stamp.
In vain the youngling sought, with doubling wife
The hedge, the hill, the thicket, or the stile
Experience save the lack of speed supplied,
And in the rapid sought, the victim died.
So was I once, in this fair street, Saint James,
Through winking cavaliers, and ear home comes,
Deserted, pursued, turn'd o'er again, and o'er,
Coursed, cold-mouth'd by an unerring bore
&c. &c. &c.

The Park of Saint James's, though enlarged, planted with verdant alleys, and otherwise decorated by Charles II., existed in the days of his grandfather, as a public and pleasant promenade; and, for the sake of exercise or pastime, was much frequented by the better classes.

Lord Glenvarloch repaired thither to dispel the unpleasant reflections which had been suggested by his parting with his trusty squire, Rich^d. Monplais, in a manner which was agreeable neither to his pride nor his feeling; and by the corroboration which the hints of his late attendant had received from the anonymous letter mentioned in the end of the last chapter.

There was a considerable number of company in the Park when he entered it, but, his present state of mind inducing him to avoid society, he kept aloof from the more frequented walks towards Westminster and Whitehall, and drew to the north, or, as we should now say, the Piccadilly verge of the enclosure, believing he might there enjoy, or rather combat, his own thoughts unmolested.

In this, however, Lord Glenvarloch was mistaken; for, as he strolled slowly along with his arms folded in his cloak, and his hat drawn over his eyes, he was suddenly pointed upon by Sir Mungo Malagrowth, who, either chumming or shunned, had retreated, or had been obliged to retreat, to the same less frequented corner of the Park.

Nigel started when he heard the high, sharp, and querulous tones of the knight's cracked voice, and was no less alarmed when he beheld his tall thin figure hobbling towards him, wrapped in a threadbare cloak, on whose surface ten thousand varied stains eclipsed the original scarlet, and having his head surmounted with a well-worn beaver, bearing a black velvet cap, a chain, and a capon's feather for an ornament.

Lord Glenvarloch would fain have made his escape, as he did in the instance of a leveret had as his chance to the west of an experienced greyhound. Sir Mungo, however, catching the simile, had long upbraided him with it, and made sure of mortifying his guest. So Nigel found himself compelled to stand and answer the hackneyed question—"What news to-day?"

"Nothing extraordinary, I believe," answered the young nobleman, attempting to pass on.

"O, ye are gadding to the French ordinary being, replied the knight; "but it is early day yet—we will take a turn in the Park in the meanwhile—it is sharpening the appetite."

So saying, he boldly slipped his arm under Lord Glenvarloch's, in spite of all the decent reluctances which his guest could exhibit, by keeping his elbow close to his side; and having fairly grappled a prize, he proceeded to take it in tow.

Nigel was silent and sullen, in hopes to shake his unpleasant companion; but Sir Mungo was determined that if he did not speak, he should at least hear.

"Ye are bound for the ordinary, my lord," said the cynic; "and ye canna do better—there is na company there, and peculiarly selected, as I expect, being, of course, such as it is desirable that your nobleman should be worthal—and your noble friend would have been blithe to see you keeping such a shapful society."

"I believe," said Lord Glenvarloch, thinking himself obliged to say something, "that the society is as good as generally can be found in such places where the door can scarcely be shut against those who come to spend their money."

"Right, my lord—vera right," said his tormentor, bursting out into a chuckling, but most discouraging laugh. "These citizen chauffs and clowns will prey amongst us, when there is but an inch of a coat open. And what remedy?—Just e'en this, that their cash gives them confidence, we should seize them of it. Flay them, my lord—singe them as a kitchen wench does the rats, and then they will long to come back again.—Ay, ay—pluck the plume from them; and then the larded capons will be for flying so high a wing, my lord, among the great hawks and sparrow-hawks, and the like."

And, there withal, Sir Mungo fixed on Nigel's quick, sharp, gray eye, watching the effect of a sarcasm as keenly as the surgeon, in a delicate operation, remarks the progress of his anatomical scalpel.

Nigel, however willing to conceal his sensations, could not avoid gratifying his tormentor by wincing under the operation. He coloured with vexation and anger; but a quarrel with Sir Mungo Malagrowth would, he felt, be unutterably ridiculous; and he only muttered to himself the words, "Impertinent coxcomb!" which, on this occasion, Sir Mungo's imperfection of organ did not prevent him from hearing and replying to.

"Ay, ay—vera true," exclaimed the caustic old courtier. "Impertinent coxcombs they are, that do intrude themselves on the society of their betters; but your lordship kens how to gar them as gude—we have the trick on't.—They had a braw sport in the presence last Friday, how ye suld have routed a young shopkeeper, horse and foot, ta'en his opima, and at the spee he had about him, down the very silver buttons of his cloak, and sent him to graze with Nebuchadnezzar, King of Babylon. Muckle honour redounded to your lordship thereby.—We were tauld the loon threw himself into the Thames in a fit of desperation. There's snow of them behind—there was mair tint on Flossden-edge."

"You have been told a budget of lies, so far as I am concerned, Sir Mungo," said Nigel, speaking loud and sternly.

"Vera likely—vera likely," said the unabashed and undismayed Sir Mungo; "naething but lies are current in the circle.—So the chield is not drowned then?—the mair's the pity.—But I never believed the

"My father was right," said Lord Glenvarloch, i, the bitterness of his spirit; "and his curse justly fad lowed me when I first entered that place. There y contamination in the air, and he whose fortune aynd ruin, shall be blighted in his honour and reputation."

Sir Mungo, who watched his victim with the de- lighted yet wary eye of an experienced angler, became now aware, that if he strained the line on him too tightly, there was every risk of his breaking hold. In order to give him room, therefore, to play, he protest- ed that Lord Glenvarloch "should not take his free speech in malam partem. If you were a trifle ower sicker in your amusement, my lord, it canna be de- nied that it is the safest course to prevent farther en- dangerment of your somewhat dilapidated fortunes; and if ye play with your inferiors, ye are relieved of the pain of pouching the siller of your friends and equals; forbye, that the plebeian knaves have had the advantage, tecum certasse, as Ajax Telamon sayeth, apud Metamorphoseos; and for the like of them to have played with ane Scottish nobleman, is an ho- nest and honourable consideration to compensate the loss of their stake, whilk, I dare say, moreover, maist of the churls can weel afford."

"Be that as it may, Sir Mungo," said Nigel, "I would fain know"—

"Ay, ay," interrupted Sir Mungo; "and as you say, who cares whether the fat bulls of Bashan can spare it or no? gentlemen are not to limit their sport for the like of them."

"I wish to know, Sir Mungo," said Lord Glenvar- loch, "in what company you have learned these of- fensive particulars respecting me?"

"Dootless—dootless, my lord," said Sir Mungo; "I have ever heard, and have ever reported, that your lordship kept the best of company in a private way. —There is the fine Countess of Blackchester, but I think she stirs not much abroad since her affair with his Grace of Buckingham; and there is the gude auld- fashioned Scottish nobleman, Lord Huntinglen, an undeniable man of quality—it is pity but he could keep caup and can frae his head, whilk now and then doth 'minish his reputation. And there is the gay, young Lord Dalgarno, that carries the craft of gray hairs under his curled love-locks—a fair race they are, father, daughter, and son, all of the same honourable family. I think we needna speak of George Heriot, honest man, when we have nobility in question. So that is the company I have heard of your keeping, my lord, out-taken those of the ordinary."

"My company has not, indeed, been much more extended than amongst those you mention," said Lord Glenvarloch; "but in short"— "To Court?" said Sir Mungo, "that was just what I was going to say—Lord Dalgarno says he cannot prevail on ye to come to Court, and that does ye pre- judice, my lord—the King hears of you by others, when he should see you in person—I speak in serious friendship, my lord. His Majesty, when you were named in the circle short while since, was heard to say, 'Jacta est alea!—Glenvarlochides is turned dicer and drinker.'—My Lord Dalgarno took your part, and he was e'en borne down by the popular voice of the courtiers, who spoke of you as one who had be- taken yourself to living a town life, and risking your baron's coronet amongst the flatcaps of the city."

"And this was publicly spoken of me," said Nigel, "and in the King's presence?"

"Spoken openly?" repeated Sir Mungo Mala- growther; "ay, by my troth was it—that is to say, it was whispered privately—whilk is as open promulga- tion as the thing permitted; for ye may think the Court is not like a place where men are as sib as Simmie and his brother, and roar out their minds as if they were at an ordinary."

"A curse on the Court and the ordinary both!" cried Nigel, impatiently.

"With all my heart," said the knight; "I have got little by a knight's service in the Court; and the last time I was at the ordinary, I lost four angels."

"May I pray of you, Sir Mungo, to let me know," said Nigel, "the names of those who thus make free with the character of one who can be but little known to them, and who never injured any of them?"

"Have I not told you already," answered Sir Mungo, "that the King said something to that effect—so did the Prince too;—and such being the case, he may take it on your corporal oath, that every man in the circle who was not silent, sung the same song as they did."

"You said but now," replied Glenvarloch, "that Lord Dalgarno interfered in my behalf."

"In good troth did he," answered Sir Mungo, with a sneer; "but the young nobleman was soon borne down—by token, he had something of a catarrh, and spoke as hoarse as a rook or raven. Poor gentleman, if he had had his full extent of voice, he would have been as well listened to, doubtless, as in a cause of his ain, whilk no man kens better how to plead to purpose.—And let me ask you, by the way," continued Sir Mungo, "whether Lord Dalgarno has ever introduced your lordship to the Prince, or the Duke of Buckingham, either of whom might soon carry through your suit?"

"I have no claim on the favour of either the Prince or the Duke of Buckingham," said Lord Glenvarloch.—"As you seem to have made my affairs your study, Sir Mungo, although perhaps something unnecessary, you may have heard that I have petitioned my Sovereign for payment of a debt due to my family. I cannot doubt the King's desire to do justice, nor can I in decency employ the solicitation of his Highness the Prince, or his Grace the Duke of Buckingham, to obtain from his Majesty what either should be granted me as a right, or refused altogether."

Sir Mungo twisted his whimsical features into one of his most grotesque sneers, as he replied—

"It is a vera clear and perspicuous position of the case, my lord; and in relying thereupon, you show an absolute and unimprovable acquaintance with the King, Court, and mankind in general.—But whom have we got here?—Stand up, my lord, and make way—by my word of honour, they are the very men we spoke of—talk of the devil, and—humph!"

It must be here premised, that during the conversation, Lord Glenvarloch, perhaps in the hope of shaking himself free of Sir Mungo, had directed their walk towards the more frequented part of the Park; while the good knight had stuck to him, being totally indifferent which way they went, provided he could keep his talons clutched upon his companion. They were still, however, at some distance from the livelier part of the scene, when Sir Mungo's experienced eye noticed the appearances which occasioned the latter part of his speech to Lord Glenvarloch.

A low respectful murmur arose among the numerous groups of persons which occupied the lower part of the Park. They first clustered together, with their faces turned towards Whitehall, then fell back on either hand to give place to a splendid party of gallants, who, advancing from the Palace, came onward through the Park; all the other company drawing off the pathway, and standing uncovered as they passed.

Most of these courtly gallants were dressed in the garb which the pencil of Vandyke has made familiar even at the distance of nearly two centuries; and which was just at this period beginning to supersede the more fluttering and frivolous dress which had been adopted from the French court of Henri Quatre.

The whole train were uncovered excepting the Prince of Wales, afterwards the most unfortunate of British monarchs, who came onward, having his long curled auburn tresses, and his countenance, which, even in early youth, bore a shade of anticipated melancholy, shaded by the Spanish hat and the single ostrich feather which drooped from it. On his right hand was Buckingham, whose commanding, and at the same time graceful, deportment, threw almost into shade the personal demeanour and majesty of the Prince on whom he attended. The eye, movements, and gestures, of the great courtier, were so composed, so regularly observant of all etiquette belonging to his situation, as to form a marked and strong contrast with the forward gayety and frivolity by which he recommended himself to the favour of his "dear dad and gossip," King James. A singular fate attended this accomplished courtier, at once the reigning favourite of a father and very opposite in manners, that, to ingratiate with the youthful Prince, he was obliged to be within the strictest limits of respectful obedience, and to forego the frolicsome and free humour which captivated his aged father.

It is true, Buckingham well knew the dispositions both of James and Charles, and difficulty in so conducting himself as to maintain the highest post in the favour of both. It has been supposed, as we before hinted, that when he had completely possessed himself of the affections of Charles, retained his hold in the father only by the tyranny of custom; James, could he have brought himself to a vigorous resolution, was, in the latter years especially, not unlikely to have discarded him from his counsels and favour. But if King indeed meditated such a change, he found, and too much accustomed to the which the Duke had long exercised over him, that he could not summon up resolution enough for effecting his purpose: and at all events it is certain, that when he survived the master by whom he was raised, had the rare chance to experience the wane of the most splendid court-favour during the reigns, until it was at once eclipsed in his by the dagger of his assassin Felton.

To return from this digression: The Prince and his train, advanced, and were near the place where Lord Glenvarloch and Sir Mungo had stood according to form, in order to give the Prince his salute, and to pay the usual marks of respect. At any rate, both the Prince's and Duke of Buckingham's attention seemed to be directed by a circumstance towards Nigel, for they turned their heads in that direction and looked at him attentively. The Prince with a countenance, the grave, and expression of which was blended with severity, and Buckingham's looks evinced some degree of triumph. Lord Dalgarno did not seem to be a friend, perhaps because the sunbeams fell full side of the walk on which Nigel stood, obliging him to hold up his hat to screen his eyes.

As the Prince passed, Lord Glenvarloch bowed, as respect required; and the Duke, returning their obeisance with that grave air which paid to every rank its due, but not at all beyond it, signed to Sir Mungo to come forward, beginning an apology for his lowness as he brought him up to the Prince, Sir Mungo less tentative, and, as it seemed, an intelligent caution, asked in a tone so low, that the knight certainly have been deaf to them had they been addressed by any one under the rank of Prince of Wales. After about a minute's conversation, the Prince bestowed on Nigel the embarrassing notice of a fixed look, touched his hat slightly to Sir Mungo, and walked on.

"It is even as I suspected, my lord," said Sir Mungo, with an air which he designed to be cheerful and sympathetic, but which, in fact, was the grin of an ape when he has mouthed a chestnut—"Ye have back-friends, my lord, unfriends—or, to be plain, enemies—about the person of the Prince."

"I am sorry to hear it," said Nigel; "but I knew what they accuse me of."

"Ye shall hear, my lord," said Sir Mungo, "the Prince's vera words—'Sir Mungo,' said he, 'I am glad to see you, and am glad your rheumatic troubles permit you to come hither for exercise.'—I be in duty bound—ye might remark, my lord, that so, whilk formed the first branch of our conversation—His Highness then demanded of me, 'if whom I stood, was the young Lord Glenvarloch?'—I answered, 'that you were such, for his Highness service;' whilk was the second branch.—The Highness, resuming the argument, said, that den,' (meaning that he had been told you wanted,) 'but that he could not believe of that noble and decayed house could a idle, scandalous, and profligate life, in oaths and taverns of London, while the sea were heaving, and colours flying in the cause of the Palatine, his son-in-law, your lordship is aware, do nothing to oblige me; and a gracious 'Give ye it Mungo Malagowthor,' licensed me to your lordship. And now, my lord, if sea or pleasure calls you to the ordinary, in the direction of the city—why, have ye, thankless, ye will think ye have turned in the Park, as they will likely turn at the walk, and return this way—and you I hint, I think, not to cross the Prince's a hurry."

"I stay or go as you please, Sir Mungo," with an expression of calm, but deep rebuff, for my own part, my resolution is all quit this public walk for pleasure of no use will I quit it like one unworthy to be seen of public resort. I trust that the us returns will return this way as you or will abide, Sir Mungo, and heard them."

which he bestowed on his appearance, Nigel remained with his arms folded, and reclining against a solitary tree which overhung the path, making up his mind to encounter a moment which he expected to be critical of his fate. But he was mistaken in supposing that the Prince of Wales would either address him, or admit him to expostulation, in such a public place as the Park. He did not remain unnoticed, however, for, when he made a respectful but haughty obeisance, intimating in look and manner that he was possessed of, and undaunted by the unfavourable opinion which the Prince had so lately expressed, Charles returned his reverence with such a frown, as is only given by those whose frown is authority and decision. The train passed on, the Duke of Buckingham not even appearing to see Lord Glenvarloch, while Lord Dalgarino, though no longer incommenced by the appearance, kept his eyes, which had perhaps been dazzled by their former splendour bent upon the ground.

Lord Glenvarloch had difficulty to restrain an indignation, to which, in the circumstances, it would have been madness to have given vent. He started from his reclining posture, and followed the Prince's train to see to keep them distinctly in sight, which was very easy, as they walked slowly. Nigel observed them keep their road towards the Palace, where the Prince turned at the gate and bowed to the noblemen in attendance, in token of dismissing them, and entered the Palace, accompanied only by the Duke of Buckingham, and one or two of his equerries. The rest of the train, having returned in all dutiful humility the farewell of the Prince, began to disperse themselves through the Park.

All this was carefully noticed by Lord Glenvarloch, who, as he adjusted his cloak, and drew his sword-belt round so as to bring the hilt closer to his hand, muttered—"Dalgarino shall explain all this to me, for it is evident that he is in the secret!"

CHAPTER XVI.

They stop—give way—I must and will have justice.
And tell me out of perilous and place
Where I am injured there I'll see redress.
Look to it every man who has my name;
I give a heart to fight the injury,
I stand to fight myself and, by my honour,
That hand shall grasp what that hand Law denies me.
The Chamberlain.

It was not long ere Nigel discovered Lord Dalgarino advancing towards him in the company of another young man of quality of the Prince's train, and as they directed their course towards the south-eastern corner of the Park, he concluded they were about to go to Lord Huntingdon's. They stopped, however, and turned up another path leading to the north; and Lord Glenvarloch conceived that this change of direction was owing to their having seen him, and their desire to avoid him.

Nigel followed them without hesitation by a path which, winding around a thicket of shrubs and trees, once more conducted him to the less frequented part of the Park. He observed which side of the thicket was taken by Lord Dalgarino and his companion, and he himself walking boldly round the other verge, was thus enabled to meet them face to face.

"Good morning, my Lord Dalgarino," said Lord Glenvarloch, solemnly.

"He! my friend Nigel" answered Lord Dalgarino, in his usual careless and indifferent tone, "my friend Nigel, with business on his brow?—but you must wait till we meet at Beaupre's at noon—Sir Fergus Haldimand and I are at present engaged in the Prince's service."

"If you were engaged in the King's, my lord," said Lord Glenvarloch, "you must stand and answer me."

"Hey-day!" said Lord Dalgarino, with an air of great astonishment, "what passion is this? Why, Nigel, this is King Cambyses' vein!—You have frequented the theatre too much lately—Away with this folly man, go, dine upon soup and salad, drink sugary water to cool your blood, go to bed at sun-down, and defy those foul fiends, Wrath and Misconstruction."

"I have had misconstruction enough among you," said Glenvarloch, in the same tone of determined displeasure, "and from you, my Lord Dalgarno, in particular, and all under the mask of friendship."

"Here is a proper business!"—said Dalgarno, turning as if to appeal to Sir Ewes Haldimund; "do you see this angry ruffler, Sir Ewes? A month since, he dared not have looked one of yonder sheep in the face, and now he is a prince of roisterers, a plucker of pigeons, a controller of players and poets—and in gratitude for my having shown him the way to the eminent character which he holds upon town, he comes hither to quarrel with his best friend, if not his only one of decent station."

"I renounce such hollow friendship, my lord," said Lord Glenvarloch; "I disclaim the character which, even to my very face, you labour to fix upon me, and ere we part I will call you to a reckoning for it."

"My lords both," interrupted Sir Ewes Haldimund, "let me remind you that the Royal Park is no place to quarrel in."

"I will make my quarrel good," said Nigel, who did not know, or in his passion might not have recollected, the privileges of the place, "wherever I find my enemy."

"You shall find quarrelling enough," replied Lord Dalgarno, calmly. "so soon as you assign a sufficient cause for it. Sir Ewes Haldimund, who knows the Court, will warrant you that I am not backward on such occasions.—But of what is it that you now complain, after having experienced nothing save kindness from me and my family?"

"Of your family I complain not," replied Lord Glenvarloch; "they have done for me all they could, more, far more, than I could have expected; but you, my lord, have suffered me, while you called me your friend, to be traduced, where a word of your mouth would have placed my character in its true colours—and hence the injurious message which I just now received from the Prince of Wales. To permit the misrepresentation of a friend, my lord, is to share in the slander."

"You have been misinformed, my Lord Glenvarloch," said Sir Ewes Haldimund; "I have myself often heard Lord Dalgarno defend your character, and regret that your exclusive attachment to the pleasures of a London life prevented your paying your duty regularly to the King and Prince."

"While he himself," said Lord Glenvarloch, "dissuaded me from presenting myself at Court."

"I will cut this matter short," said Lord Dalgarno, with haughty coldness. "You seem to have conceived, my lord, that you and I were Pylades and Orestes—a second edition of Damon and Pythias—Theseus and Pirithous at the least. You are mistaken, and have given the name of friendship to what, on my part, was mere good-nature and compassion for a raw and ignorant countryman, joined to the cumbersome charge which my father gave me respecting you. Your character, my lord, is of no one's drawing, but of your own making. I introduced you where, as in all such places, there was good and indifferent company to be met with—your habits, or taste, made you prefer the worse. Your holy horror at the sight of dice and cards degenerated into the cautious resolution to play only at those times, and with such persons, as might ensure your rising a winner—no man can long do so, and continue to be held a gentleman. Such is the reputation you have made for yourself, and you have no right to be angry that I do not contradict in society what yourself know to be true. Let us pass on, my lord; and if you want farther explanation, seek some other time and fitter place."

"No time can be better than the present," said Lord Glenvarloch, whose resentment was now excited to the uttermost by the cold-blooded and insulting manner in which Dalgarno vindicated himself,—

"no place fitter than the place where we now stand. Those of my house have ever avenged insult, at the moment, and on the spot, where it was offered, were it at the foot of the throne.—Lord Dalgarno, you are a villain! draw and defend yourself." At the same time he unsheathed his rapier.

"Are you mad?" said Lord Dalgarno, stepping back; "we are in the precincts of the Court."

"The better preserved Lord Glenvarloch will be more than a match for a calumniator and a He to be seen in Lord Dalgarno, and a with the first of the sword."

The first of the sword attracted attention, and went round. "Keep the peace—keep the swords drawn in the Park!—What, ho! keepers! you men rangers!" and a number came rushing to the spot from all sides.

Lord Dalgarno, who had half drawn his receiving the blow, turned it to his scabbard he observed the sword drawn, and, taking Haldimund by the arm, waited hastily a saying to Lord Glenvarloch as they left him shall dearly avenge this insult—we will meet.

A decent-looking elderly man, who observed Lord Glenvarloch standing on the spot, in passion on his youthful appearance, said to you aware this is a Star-Chamber business gentleman, and that it may cost you your right—Shift for yourself before the keepers or come up—Get into Whitefriars or some sanctuary and concealment, till you can make or quit the city."

The advice was not to be neglected. Lord Glenvarloch made hastily towards the issue Park by Saint James's Palace, then Saint Hospital. The hubbub increased behind several peace-officers of the Royal Household up to apprehend the delinquent. Fortunate Nigel, a popular edition of the cause of the gone abroad. It was said that one of the Buckingham's companions had insulted a gentleman from the country, and that he had cudgelled him soundly. A favourite, or companion of a favourite, is always odious to, who has, besides, a partiality to those who proceed, as lawyers term it, par roy and both prejudices were in Nigel's favour officers, therefore, who came to apprehend him learn from the spectators no particulars of chance, or information concerning the route taken; so that, for the moment, he escaped arrested.

What Lord Glenvarloch heard among as he passed along, was sufficient to satisfy in his impatient passion he had placed him predicament of considerable danger. He stranger to the severe and arbitrary procedure of the Court of Star-Chamber, especially in breach of privilege, which made it the terrible men; and it was no farther back than the time that the punishment of mutilation actually awarded and executed, for some the same kind which he had just committed had also the comfortable reflection, that, by quarrel with Lord Dalgarno, he must now friendship and good offices of that nobleman and sister, almost the only persons of consequence in whom he could claim any interest; while evil reports which had been put in circulation concerning his character, were certain to weigh against him, in a case where much must depend on the reputation of the accused. The full imagination, the idea of such a punishment seems more ghastly than death; every word which he overheard among those which he met, mingled with, or overtook as announced this as the penalty of his offence, dreaded to increase his pace for fear of suspicion, and more than once saw the officers so near him, that his wrist tingled under the blade of the dismembering knife. he got out of the Park, and had a little time to consider what he was next to do.

Whitefriars, adjacent to the Temple, known by the cant name of Alsatia, had at and for nearly a century afterwards, the place a sanctuary, unless against the writ of the Justice, or of the Lords of the Privy-Council as the place abounded with desperadoes of description,—bankrupt citizens, ruined game claimable prodigals, desperate duellists, br micides, and debauched profligates of every tion, all leagued together to maintain the immunities of their asylum,—it was both difficult and unsafe for the officers of the law to execute warrants emanating even from the highest authority, amongst men whose safety was inconsistent with warrants or authority of any kind. This Lord Glenvarloch well knew; and odious as the place of refuge was, it seemed the only one, where, for a space at least, he might be concealed, and secure from the immediate grasp of the law, until he should have leisure to provide better for his safety, or to get this unpleasant matter in some shape accommodated.

Meanwhile, as Nigel walked hastily forward towards the place of sanctuary, he bitterly blamed himself for suffering Lord Dalgarno to lead him into the haunts of dissipation; and no less accused his intemperate heat of passion, which now had driven him for refuge into the purlieus of profane and avowed vice and debauchery.

"Dalgarno spoke but too truly in that," were his bitter reflections; "I have made myself an evil reputation by acting on his insidious counsels, and neglecting the wholesome admonitions which ought to have claimed implicit obedience from me, and which recommended abstinence even from the slightest approach to evil. But if I escape from the perilous labyrinth in which folly and inexperience, as well as violent passions, have involved me, I will find some noble way of redeeming the lustre of a name which was never sullied until I bore it."

As Lord Glenvarloch formed these prudent resolutions, he entered the Temple Walks, whence a gate at that time opened into Whitefriars, by which, as by the more private passage, he proposed to betake himself to the sanctuary. As he approached the entrance to that den of infamy, from which his mind recoiled even while in the act of taking shelter there, his pace slackened, while the steep and broken stairs reminded him of the facilis descensus Arceni, and rendered him doubtful whether it were not better to brave the worst which could befall him in the public haunts of honourable men, than to evade punishment by secluding himself in those of avowed vice and profligacy.

As Nigel hesitated, a young gentleman of the Temple advanced towards him, whom he had often seen, and sometimes conversed with, at the ordinary, where he was a frequent and welcome guest, being a wild young gallant, indifferently well provided with money, who spent at the theatres, and other gay places of public resort, the time which his father supposed he was employing in the study of the law. But Reginald Lowestoffe, such was the young Templar's name, was of opinion that little law was necessary to enable him to spend the revenues of the paternal acres which were to devolve upon him at his father's demise, and therefore gave himself no trouble to acquire more of that science than might be imbibed along with the learned air of the region in which he had his chambers. In other respects, he was one of the wits of the place, read Ovid and Martial, aimed at quick repartee and pun, (often very far fetched,) danced, fenced, played at tennis, and performed sundry tunes on the fiddle and French horn, to the great annoyance of old Counsellor Barratter, who lived in the chambers immediately below him. Such was Reginald Lowestoffe, shrewd, alert, and well acquainted with the town through all its recesses, but in a sort of disrespectful way. This gallant, now approaching the Lord Glenvarloch, saluted him by name and title, and asked if his lordship designed for the Chevalier's this day, observing that it was near noon, and the woodcock would be on the board ere they could reach the ordinary.

"I do not go there to-day," answered Lord Glenvarloch.

"Which way, then, my lord?" said the young Templar, who was perhaps not undesirous to parade a part at least of the street in company with a lord, though but a Scottish one.

"I—I"—said Nigel, desiring to avail himself of this young man's local knowledge, yet unwilling and ashamed to acknowledge his intention to take refuge in so disreputable a quarter, to describe the situation in which he stood—"I have some curiosity to see Whitefriars."

"What! your lordship is for a frolic into Alsatia?" said Lowestoffe—"Have with you, my lord—you cannot have a better guide to the infernal regions than myself. I promise you there are bona-robas to be found there—good wine too, ay, and good fellows to drink it with, though somewhat suffering under the frowns of Fortune. But your lordship will pardon me—you are the last of our acquaintance to whom I would have proposed such a voyage of discovery."

"I am obliged to you, Master Lowestoffe, for the good opinion you have expressed in the observation," said Lord Glenvarloch; "but my present circumstances may render even a residence of a day or two in the sanctuary a matter of necessity."

"Indeed!" said Lowestoffe, in a tone of great surprise; "I thought your lordship had always taken care not to risk any considerable stake—I beg pardon, but if the bones have proved perfidious, I know just so much law as that a peer's person is sacred from arrest; and for mere impecuniosity, my lord, better shift can be made elsewhere than in Whitefriars, where all are devouring each other for very poverty."

"My misfortune has no connexion with want of money," said Nigel.

"Why, then, I suppose," said Lowestoffe, "you have been tilting, my lord, and have pinked your man; in which case, and with a purse reasonably furnished, you may lie perdu in Whitefriars for a twelvemonth—Marry, but you must be entered and received as a member of their worshipful society, my lord, and a frank burgher of Alsatia—so far you must condescend; there will be neither peace nor safety for you else."

"My fault is not in a degree so deadly, Master Lowestoffe," answered Lord Glenvarloch, "as you seem to conjecture—I have stricken a gentleman in the Park, that is all."

"By my hand, my lord, and you had better have struck your sword through him at Barns Elms," said the Templar. "Strike within the verge of the Court! You will find that a weighty dependence upon your hands, especially if your party be of rank and have favour."

"I will be plain with you, Master Lowestoffe," said Nigel, "since I have gone thus far. The person I struck was Lord Dalgarno, whom you have seen at Beaujeu's."

"A follower and favourite of the Duke of Buckingham!—It is a most unhappy chance, my lord; but my heart was formed in England, and cannot bear to see a young nobleman borne down, as you are like to be. We converse here greatly too open for your circumstances. The Templars would suffer no bailiff to execute a writ, and no gentleman to be arrested for a duel, within their precincts; but in such a matter between Lord Dalgarno and your lordship, there might be a party on either side. You must away with me instantly to my poor chambers here, hard by, and undergo some little change of dress ere you take sanctuary; for else you will have the whole rascal rout of the Friars about you, like crows upon a falcon that strays into their rookery. We must have you arrayed something more like the natives of Alsatia, or there will be no life there for you."

While Lowestoffe spoke, he pulled Lord Glenvarloch along with him into his chambers, where he had a handsome library, filled with all the poems and playbooks which were then in fashion. The Templar then despatched a boy, who waited upon him, to procure a dish or two from the next cook's shop; "and this," he said, "must be your lordship's dinner, with a glass of old sack, of which my grandmother (the heavens requite her!) sent me a dozen bottles, with charge to use the liquor only with clarified whey, when I felt my breast ache with over study. Marry, we will drink the good lady's health in it, if it is your lordship's pleasure, and you shall see how we poor students eke out our mutton-commons in the hall."

The outward door of the chambers was barred so soon as the boy had re-entered with the food; the boy was ordered to keep close watch, and admit no one; and Lowestoffe, by example and precept, pressed his noble guest to partake of his hospitality. His frank and forward manners, though much differing from the courtly ease of Lord Dalgarno, were calculated to make a favourable impression; and Lord Glenvarloch, though his experience of Dalgarno's perfidy had taught him to be cautious of reposing faith in friendly professions, could not avoid testifying his gratitude to the young Templar, who seemed so anxious for his safety and accommodation.

"You may spare your gratitude any great sense of obligation, my lord," said the Templar. "No doubt I am willing to be of use to any gentleman that has cause to serve Fluctuat, my foe, and particularly proud to serve your lordship's turn; but I have also an old grudge, to speak Heaven's truth, at your expense, Lord Dalgarno."

"May I ask upon what account Master Lowestoffe?" said Lord Glenvarloch.

"O, my lord," replied the Templar, "it was for a hap that chanced after you left the ordinary, one evening about three weeks since—at least I think you were not by, as your lordship always left us before deep play began—I mean no offence, but such was your lordship's custom—when there were words between Lord Dalgarno and me concerning a certain game at glock, and a certain mournival of aces held by his lordship, which went for eight—tib, which went for fifteen—twenty-three in all. Now I held king and queen, being three—a natural tower, making fifteen—and tiddy, nineteen. We vied the ruff, and revied, as your lordship may suppose, till the stake was equal to half my yearly exhibition, fifty as fair yellow canary birds as ever chirped in the bottom of a green silk purse. Well, my lord, I gained the cards, and to you! it pleases his lordship to say that we played without tiddy; and as the rest stood by and backed him, and especially the sharking Frenchman, why, I was obliged to lose more than I shall gain all the season. So judge if I have not a crow to pluck with his lordship. Was it ever heard there was a game at glock at the ordinary before, without counting tiddy?—marry quop upon his lordship!—Every man who comes there with his purse in his hand, is as free to make new laws as he, I hope, since touch pot touch penny makes every man equal."

As Master Lowestoffe ran over this jargon of the gaming-table, Lord Glenvarloch was both ashamed and mortified, and felt a severe pang of aristocratic pride, when he concluded in the sweeping clause that the dice, like the grave, levelled those distinguishing points of society, to which Nigel's early prejudices clung perhaps but too fondly. It was impossible, however, to object any thing to the learned reasoning of the young Templar, and therefore Nigel was contented to turn the conversation, by making some inquiries respecting the present state of Whitefriars. There also his host was at home.

"You know, my lord," said Master Lowestoffe, "that we Templars are a power and a dominion within ourselves, and I am proud to say that I hold some rank in our republic—was treasurer to the Lord of Misrule last year, and am at this present moment in nomination for that dignity myself. In such circumstances, we are under the necessity of maintaining an amicable intercourse with our neighbours of Alsatia, even as the Christian States find themselves often, in mere policy, obliged to make alliance with the Grand Turk, or the Barbary States."

"I should have imagined you gentlemen of the Temple more independent of your neighbours," said Lord Glenvarloch.

"You do us something too much honour, my lord," said the Templar; "the Alsatians and we have some common enemies, and we have, under the rose, some common friends. We are in the use of blocking all bailiffs out of our bounds, and we are powerfully aided by our neighbours, who tolerate not a rag belonging to them within theirs.—Moreover, the Alsatians have—I beg you to understand me—the power of protecting or distressing our friends, male or female, who may be obliged to seek sanctuary within their bounds. In short, the two communities serve each other, though the league is between states of unequal quality, and I may myself say that I have treated of sundry weighty affairs, and have been a negotiator well approved on both sides. —But hark—hark—what's that?"

The sound by which Master Lowestoffe was interrupted, was that of a distant horn, winded loud and keenly, and followed by a faint and remote huzza.

"There's something doing," said Lowestoffe, "and the Whitefriars at this moment. That is the signal when their privileges are invaded by a post or bailiff; and at the least of the horn they all swarm out of the house, as bees when their hive is disturbed—Junq, Junq," he said, calling out to the attendants, "and see what they are doing in Alsatia.—That's the start of a bee," he continued, as the lad, accustomed to the precipitate haste of his master, tumbled rather than ran out of the apartment, and so down stairs the worth gold in the quarter—he serves six masters—four of them in distinct Numbers, and you well think him to suit like a fairy at the mere wish him that for the time most needs his attendance. As scout in Oxford, no gap in Cambridge, ever treated him in speed and intelligence. He knows the step a dun from that of a client, when it reaches the bottom of the staircase; can tell the trip of a pre-wench from the step of a benchler, when at the very end of the court; and is, take him all in all—But see your lordship is anxious.—May I press another cup of my kind grandmother's cordial, or will you allow me to show you my wardrobe, and act as your valet or groom of the chamber?"

Lord Glenvarloch hesitated not to acknowledge that he was painfully sensible of his present situation, and anxious to do what must needs be done for his extrication.

The good-natured and thoughtless young Templar readily acquiesced, and led the way into his little bedroom, where, from bandboxes, portmanteaus, trunks, not forgetting an old walnut-tree wardrobe, he began to select the articles which he thought best suited effectually to disguise his guest in venturing into the lawless and turbulent society of Alsatia.

CHAPTER XVII.

Come hither, young one—Mark me—Thou art now
Most honest man—the sword that live by reputation
More than by coat of arms—Single suited
They are, I trust you, yet each single suit
Mantains on the roughness, a thousand followers—
And they be men, who, hazzarding their all,
Need not a penny necessary income,
And learn to love, and immortal soul,
Do in the very need but hazard nothing—
So strictly is that art bound in reversion;
Clothes to the broker, income to the usurer,
And body to disease, and soul to the foul fiend.
Who lurches to see Soldadoes and Fooladoes, Play better than himself his game on earth—The Merchant

"Your lordship," said Reginald Lowestoffe, "must be content to exchange your decent and courtly seeming rapiers, which I will retain in safe keeping for the broad sword with an hundred weight of iron about the hilt, and to wear these huge-pared shoes, instead of your civil and moderate hose. We allow no clock, for your ruffian always walks over; and the tarnished doublet of bald velvet with its discoloured embroidery, and—I grieve to speak it—a few stains from the blood of the grape will best suit the carb of a roaring boy. I will leave you to change your suit for an instant, till I can bet to truss you."

Lowestoffe reached, while slowly, and with hesitation, Nigel obeyed his instructions. He felt displeasure and disgust at the scoundrelly disguise which he was under the necessity of assuming; but when he considered the bloody consequences which his attached to his rash act of violence, the easy and indifferent temper of James, the prejudices of his son, the overbearing influence of the Duke of Buckingham, which was sure to be thrown into the scale against him; and, above all, when he reflected that he must now look upon the active, assiduous, and insinuating Lord Dalgarno, as a bitter enemy, he told him he was in a situation of peril which auth-ried all honest means, even the most unseemly in outward appearance, to extricate himself from so dangerous a predicament.

While he was changing his dress, and musing on these particulars, his friendly host re-entered the sleeping apartment. "Zounds!" he said, "my lord, it was well you went not straight into that same Alsatia of ours at the time you proposed, for the hawks have stooped upon it. Here is Jem come back with tidings, that he saw a pursuivant there with a privy-council warrant, and half a score of yeoman assistants armed to the teeth, and the horn which we heard was sounded to call out the posse of the Friars. Indeed, when old Duke Hildebrod saw that the quest was after some one of whom he knew nothing, he permitted, out of courtesy, the man-catcher to search through his dominions, quite certain that they would take little by their motions; for Duke Hildebrod is a most judicious potentate.—Go back, you bastard, and bring us word when all is quiet."

"And who may Duke Hildebrod be?" said Lord Glenvarloch.

"Nouns! my lord," said the Templar, "have you lived so long on the town, and never heard of the valiant, and as wise and politic as valiant, Duke Hildebrod, grand protector of the liberties of Alsatia? I thought the man had never whirled a die but was familiar with his fame."

"Yet I have never heard of him, Master Lowestoffe," said Lord Glenvarloch; "or, what is the same thing, I have paid no attention to aught that may have passed in conversation respecting him."

"Why, then," said Lowestoffe—"but, first, let me have the honour of trussing you. Now, observe, I have left several of the points untied, of set purpose; and if it please you to let a small portion of your shirt be seen betwixt your doublet and the band of your upper stock, it will have so much the more rakish effect, and will attract you respect in Alsatia, where linen is something scarce. Now, I tie some of the points carefully askant, for your ruffianly gallant never appears too accurately trussed—so."

"Arrange it as you will, sir," said Nigel; "but let me hear at least something of the conditions of the unhappy district into which, with other wretches, I am compelled to retreat."

"Why, my lord," replied the Templar, "our neighbouring state of Alsatia, which the law calls the Sanctuary of Whitefriars, has had its mutations and revolutions like greater kingdoms; and, being in some sort a lawless, arbitrary government, it follows, of course, that these have been more frequent than our own better regulated commonwealth of the Templars, that of Gray's Inn, and other similar associations, have had the fortune to witness. Our traditions and records speak of twenty revolutions within the last twelve years, in which the aforesaid state has repeatedly changed from absolute despotism to republicanism, not forgetting the intermediate stages of oligarchy, limited monarchy, and even gynocracy; for I myself remember Alsatia governed for nearly nine months by an old fishwoman. Then it fell under the dominion of a broken attorney, who was dethroned by a reformado captain, who, proving tyrannical, was deposed by a hedge-parson, who was succeeded, upon resignation of his power, by Duke Jacob Hildebrod, of that name the first, whom Heaven long preserve."

"And is this potentate's government," said Lord Glenvarloch, forcing himself to take some interest in the conversation, "of a despotic character?"

"Pardon me, my lord," said the Templar; "this said sovereign is too wise to incur, like many of his predecessors, the odium of wielding so important an authority by his own sole will. He has established a council of state, who regularly meet for their morning's draught at seven o'clock; convene a second time at eleven for their ante-meridiem, or whet; and, assembling in solemn conclave at the hour of two afternoon, for the purpose of consulting for the good of the commonwealth, are so prodigal of their labour in the service of the state, that they seldom separate before midnight. Into this worthy senate, composed partly of Duke Hildebrod's predecessors in his high office, whom he has associated with him to prevent the envy attending sovereign and sole authority, I must presently introduce your lordship, that they may admit you to the immunities of the Friars, and assign you a place of residence."

"Does their authority extend to such regulation?" said Lord Glenvarloch.

"The council account it a main point of their privileges, my lord," answered Lowestoffe; "and in fact, it is one of the most powerful means by which they support their authority. For when Duke Hildebrod and his senate find a topping householder in the Friars becomes discontented and factious, it is but assigning him, for a lodger, some fat bankrupt, or new resident, whose circumstances require refuge, and whose purse can pay for it, and the malecontent becomes as tractable as a lamb. As for the poorer refugees, they let them shift as they can; but the registration of their names in the Duke's entry-book, and the payment of garnish conforming to their circumstances, is never dispensed with; and the Friars would be a very unsafe residence for the stranger who should dispute these points of jurisdiction."

"Well, master Lowestoffe," said Lord Glenvarloch, "I must be controlled by the circumstances which dictate to me this state of concealment—of course, I am desirous not to betray my name and rank."

"It will be highly advisable, my lord," said Lowestoffe; "and is a case thus provided for in the statutes of the republic, or monarchy, or whatsoever you call it.—He who desires that no questions shall be asked him concerning his name, cause of refuge, and the like, may escape the usual interrogations upon payment of double the garnish otherwise belonging to his condition. Complying with this essential stipulation, your lordship may register yourself as King of Bantam if you will, for not a question will be asked of you.—But here comes our scout, with news of peace and tranquillity. Now, I will go with your lordship myself, and present you to the council of Alsatia, with all the influence which I have over them as an office-bearer in the Temple, which is not slight; for they have come halting off upon all occasions when we have taken part against them, and that they well know. The time is propitious, for as the council is now met in Alsatia, so the Temple walks are quiet. Now, my lord, throw your cloak about you, to hide your present exterior. You shall give it to the boy at the foot of the stairs that go down to the Sanctuary; and as the ballad says that Queen Eleanor sunk at Charing-Cross and rose at Queenhithe, so you shall sink a nobleman in the Temple Gardens, and rise an Alsatian at Whitefriars."

They went out accordingly, attended by the little scout, traversed the gardens, descended the stairs, and at the bottom the young Templar exclaimed,—“And now let us sing, with Ovid,

Off, off, ye lendings!" he continued, in the same vein. "Via, the curtain that shadowed Borgia!—But how now, my lord?" he continued, when he observed Lord Glenvarloch was really distressed at the degrading change in his situation. "I trust you are not offended at my rattling folly? I would but reconcile you to your present circumstances, and give you the tone of this strange place. Come, cheer up; I trust it will only be your residence for a very few days."

Nigel was only able to press his hand, and reply in a whisper, "I am sensible of your kindness. I know I must drink the cup which my own folly has filled for me. Pardon me, that, at the first taste I feel its bitterness."

Reginald Lowestoffe was bustlingly officious and good-natured; but, used to live a scrambling, rakish course of life himself, he had not the least idea of the extent of Lord Glenvarloch's mental sufferings, and thought of his temporary concealment as if it were merely the trick of a wanton boy, who plays at hide-and-seek with his tutor. With the appearance of the place, too, he was familiar—but on his companion it produced a deep sensation.

The ancient Sanctuary at Whitefriars lay considerably lower than the elevated terraces and gardens of the Temple, and was therefore generally involved in the damps and fogs arising from the Thames. The brick buildings by which it was occupied crowded closely on each other, for, in a place so rarely privileged, every foot of ground was valuable, but erected in many cases by persons whose funds were inadequate to their speculations, the houses were generally insufficient, and exhibited the lamentable signs of having become ruinous while they were yet new. The wailing of children, the wailing of their mothers, the miserable exhibition of ragged limbs hung from the windows to dry, spoke the wants and distress of the wretched inhabitants, while the words of complaint were heaved and overwhelmed in the noisy shouts, oaths, profane songs, and boisterous laughter, that issued from the windows and taverns, which, as the signs indicated, were equal in number to all the other houses, and that the full character of the place might be evident, several faded, cracked, and painted signboards looked boldly at the stranger from their open lattices, or more modestly secured board with the cracked flower pots filled with mugwort and rosemary, which were disposed in front of the windows to the great risk of the passers-by.

"Sem. redemptio Irena," said the Templar pointing to one of these signs, who seemed afraid of observation, and partly concealed herself behind the casement, as she chirped to a miserable blackbird, the tenant of a wicker prison, which hung outside on the black brick wall. "I know the face of your want, coarser," continued the guide, "and I could wager a farthing, from the posture she stands in, that she has clean head gear, and a naked night-gail. But here come two of the male inhabitants, smoking like moving volcanoes." These are roasting blades, whom Nicolas and Trinidad serve. I dare swear, in lieu of beef and pudding, for he it known to you, my lord, that the King's counter blast against the Indian weed will no more pass current in Albion, than will his writ of repleas.

As he spoke, the two smokers approached, slugs, uncumbered ruffians, whose enormous mustaches were turned back over their ears, and mingled with the wild elf locks of their hair, much of which was seen under the old leathers which they wore slung upon their heads, while some straggling portion escaped through the rents of the hair-dressers. Their enormous plush jerkins, lower slops, or trunk hose, had their broad grassy shoulder belts, and discoloured scarfs, and above all, the ostentatious manner in which the one wore a broadsword, and the other an extravagantly long rapier and poniard, marked the true Albionian bulls, then, and for a hundred years afterwards, a well known character.

"Tut out," said the one ruffian to the other, "tut the bun most twine at the sentry box!" "I smell a spy," replied the other, looking at Nigel. "Chalk him across the peepers with your cherry." "Bug avast, long avast!" replied his companion, "you other is rattling Reynolds Lowestuff of the Temple— I know him; he is a good boy, and free of the province."

So saying, and enveloping themselves in another thick cloud of smoke, they went on without farther greeting.

"Croas in arre," said the Templar. "You hear what a character the impudent knaves give me; but, so it serves your lordship's turn, I care not— And, now, let me ask your lordship what name you will assume, for we are near the ducal palace of Duke Hildebrand."

"I will be called Graham," said Nigel, "it was my mother's name."

"Grime," repeated the Templar, "will suit Albion well enough— both a grim and grimy place of refuge."

"I said Graham, not Grime," said Nigel, something shortly, and laying an emphasis on the vowel— for few Scotsmen understand rallery upon the subject of their names.

"I beg pardon, my lord," answered the undisciplined punster, "but Grime will suit the circumstance too— a splendid translation in the High Dutch, and your lordship must be considered as a man who troubles."

Nigel laughed at the pertinacity of the Templar, who, proceeding to point out a sign representing a boy, was about to represent a dog attacking a bull, and ending at his head in the true scientific style of our—

There said he, clothed in the Duke Hildebrand's bath-laws, as well as in and strong waters, was faith I thought. He had a determined chambered Paris garden he had shown a sign corresponding to his date, and he had in giving drink to the boy that he himself had drunk without paying, and were pay for what is drunken by others— Let us enter a very open gate of this scene, Aye, he."

As they spoke, they entered the dilapidated town, which was nevertheless more simple in dimensions and less remote, than many houses in the very middle of London. Two or three haggard, ragged men, ran to and fro, whose looks, like those of our soldiers only, adapted for midnight, when others were asleep, and who by day seemed bleated, ragged, and only half awake. Guided by one of these leading citizens, they entered a room, where the rays of the sun were almost wholly eclipsed, volumes of tobacco smoke rolled from the chimney, coming any while out of the cloudy sanctuary of the old chimney.

And so says the King,
And so the King says the King,
With his Majesty's power,
And his Majesty's power,
And his Majesty's power,
And his Majesty's power.

Duke Hildebrand, who himself condescended to chant this duty to his loving subjects, was an extremely fat old man, with only one eye, and a which bore evidence to the frequency, strength, and depth of his potations. He wore a rusty-colored plush jerkin, stained with the overflowings of a tankard, and much the worse for wear, and attached at bottom for the use of his enormous port. Behind him lay a savage bull-dog, whose red head and snarl black glancing eye, as well as a creature's great corpulence, gave it a burlesque resemblance to its master.

The well beloved counsellors who surrounded the ducal throne, occupied it with tobacco, pipes, and occupy in thick, clammy air, and echoed and choral songs, were satirists worthy of such a host. The bull-jerk had belt, and long sword, and showed him to be a low country soldier, whose of becoming importance, and drunken import were designed to sustain the Duke's name. Roving Blade. It seemed to Nigel that he had at this fellow somewhere of a war. A hedge-priest huckle began as that order of priesthood was universally turned out on the Duke's left, and easily distinguished by his red band, flapped up at the remnants of a rusty cap. He had the part out a most wretched and coarse looking man, with a threadbare band of coarse kersey on his head, and buttoned about his neck, while his features, like those of old Daniel, were illuminated by

Through the last look of danger still running and up. On his left was placed a broken attorney, who, some and practices, had been struck from the roll of practitioners, and who had nothing left of his profession, excepting its rigors. One of two persons less figure amongst whom there was one face, which like that of the soldier, seemed not unknown to Nigel, though he could not recollect where he had seen it, completed the council board of Jacob Duke Hildebrand.

The strangers had full time to observe all this; it was grace the Duke, whether ultimately carried on to the full tale of harmony or whether to impress strangers with a proper idea of his consequence, that to sing his duty to an end before addressing them, though, during the whole time, he closely scrutinized them with his single optic.

When Duke Hildebrand had ended his song, he formed his Peers that a worthy officer of the Temple attended them, and commanded the captain and to abandon their easy-chairs in behalf of the two giants, whom he placed on his right and left hand.

Worthy representatives of the army and the sh of Alsatia went to place themselves on a crash at the bottom of the table, which, ill calculated to sustain men of such weight, gave way under them, and the men of the sword and men of the law were rolled over each other on the floor, amidst shouting shouts of the company. They arose in haste, contending which should vent his displeasure in loudest and deepest oaths, a strife in which the men's superior acquaintance with theology enabled greatly to excel the captain, and were at length difficultly tranquillized by the arrival of the alarm-bells with more stable chairs, and by a long flight of the cooling tankard. When this commotion appeased, and the strangers courteously accommodated with flagons after the fashion of the present, the Duke drank promptly to the men in the most gracious manner, together with a of welcome to Master Ragnokt Lowestoffe, this courtesy having been thankfully accepted, every honoured prayed permission to call for a glass of Rhenish, over which he proposed to open business.

On mention of a liquor so superior to their usual wine had an instant and most favourable effect on the little senate; and its immediate appearance led to secure a favourable reception of Master Lowestoffe's proposition, which, after a round or two had circulated, he explained to be the admission of friend Master Nigel Grahame to the benefit of sanctuary and other immunities of Alsatia, in the matter of a grand compounder; for so were those men who paid a double fee at their matriculation, in order to avoid lying before the senate the peculiar instances which compelled them to take refuge in the worthy Duke heard the proposition with glees lightened in his single eye; and no wonder as it was a rare occurrence, and of pecuniary advantage to the private revenue. Accordingly, he commanded his register to be brought him, a huge book or with brass clasps like a merchant's ledger, and a leaves, stained with wine, and a adhered with co juice, bore the names probably of as many men as are to be found in the Calendar of Newgate; and was then directed to lay down two nobles in ransom, and to claim privilege by reciting the ring daggered verse, which were dictated to him by the Duke:—

"Your suppliant, by name
Nigel Grahame,
In fear of mischief
From a shuffling tap;
And desiring a rise
From the towers of law
That are sharper than knives
His freedom to sue,
And rescue by you—
Through weapon and wit,
From warrant and writ,
From bailiff's hand,
From tithing's wand,
In come hither to Whittlesham."

Duke Hildebrod with a tremulous hand began like the entry, and had already, with superfluous unity, spelled Nigel with two g's instead of one, when interrupted by the parson. This reverend man had been whispering for a minute or two, with the captain, but with that other individual, albeit imperfectly, as we have already mentioned Nigel's memory, and being, perhaps still somewhat malecontent on account of the late accident, was requested to be heard before the registration place.

He person," he said, "who hath now had the chance to propose himself as a candidate for the arms and immunities of this honourable senate is a dubious register is still so dubious being in connection with an ancient antiquary Dr Dryden, who had offered him permission to have the autograph of Duke Hildebrod as an illustration of this passage. I suppose being so an old man himself is adhering to the very letter of his late worthy Doctor charged his manuscript with the name that we should adopt the Duke's orthography, and so the work "The Fortunes of Nigel," with which signature did not think it necessary to comply in, in plain terms, a beggarly Scot, and we have enough of these locusts in London already—if we admit such palmer-worms and caterpillars to the Sanctuary, we shall soon have the whole nation."

"We are not entitled to inquire," said Duke Hildebrod, "whether he be Scot, or French, or English; seeing he has honourably laid down his arms, he is entitled to our protection."

"Word of denial, most Sovereign Duke," replied the parson, "I ask him no questions—his speech bewrayeth him—he is a Galician—and his parson is forfeited for his assurance in coming within this our realm, and I call on you, Sir Duke, to put the laws in force against him!"

The Templar here rose, and was about to interrupt the deliberations of the court, when the Duke gravely assured him that he should be heard in behalf of his friend, so soon as the council had finished their deliberations.

The attorney next rose, and, intimating that he was to speak to the point of law, said—"It was easy to be seen that this gentleman did not come here in any civil case, and that he believed it to be the story they had already heard of, concerning a blow given within the verge of the Park—that the Sanctuary would not bear out the offender in such a case—and that the querist old Chief would send down a broom which would sweep the streets of Alsatia from the Strand to the Stairs; and it was even policy to think what evil might come to their republic, by sheltering an alien in such circumstances."

The captain, who had sat impatiently while these opinions were expressed, now sprung on his feet with the vehemence of a cork bouncing from a bottle of brisk beer, and turning up his moustaches with a martial air, cast a glance of contempt on the lawyer and churchman, while he thus expressed his opinion.

"Most noble Duke Hildebrod! When I hear such base, shuffling, cowardly propositions come from the councillors of your grace, and when I remember the Halls, the Muns, and the Tivvets by whom your grace's ancestors and predecessors were advised on such occasions, I begin to think the spirit of action is as dead in Alsatia as in my old grandmother; and yet who thinks so thinks a lie, since I will find as many roaring boys in the Friars as shall keep the liberties against all the scavengers of Westminster. And, if we should be overborne for a turn, death and darkness! have we not time to send the gentleman off by water, either to Paris Garden or to the bankside? and, if he is a gallant of true breed, will he not make us full amends for all the trouble we have? Let other societies exist by the law, I say that we drink boys of the Fleet live in spite of it, and thrive best when we are in right opposition to sign and seal, writ and warrant, sergeant and upstail, catchpoll and hum-bailey."

This speech was followed by a murmur of approbation, and Lowestoffe, striking in before the favourable sound had subsided, reminded the Duke and his council how much the security of their state depended upon the amity of the Templars, who, by closing their gates, could at pleasure shut against the Alsatians the communication betwixt the Friars and the Temple, and that as they conducted themselves on this occasion, so would they secure or lose the benefit of his interest with his own body, which they knew not to be inconsiderable. "And, in respect of my friend being a Scotsman and alien, as has been observed by the reverend divine and learned lawyer, you are to consider," said Lowestoffe, "for what he is pursued hither—why, for giving the baseness, not to an Englishman, but to one of his own countrymen. And for my own simple part," he continued, touching Lord Glenvarloch at the same time, to make him understand he spoke but in jest, "if all the Scots in London were to fight a Welsh main, and kill each other to a man, the survivor would, in my humble opinion, be entitled to our gratitude, as having done a most acceptable service to poor Old England."

A bout of laughter and applause followed this ingenious apology for the duke's state of absence; and the Templar followed up his plan with the following

pithy proposition :—"I know well," said he, "it is the custom of the fathers of this old and honourable republic, ripely and well to consider all their proceedings over a proper allowance of liquor; and far be from me to propose the breach of so laudable a custom, or to pretend that such an affair as the present can be well and constitutionally considered during the discussion of a pitiful gallon of Rhemsin. But it is the same thing to this honourable council whether they drink first and determine afterward or whether they determine first and drink afterward. I propose your grace, with the advice of your wise and potent senators, shall pass your edict, directing to mine honourable friend the innkeeper of this place, and assigning him a lodging, according to your wise forms, to which he will presently repair being somewhat spent with this day's action; and upon I will presently order you a ruelle of Rhemsin with a corresponding quantity of meat, bread, and pickled herrings, to make you all as merry as George-a-Green."

This overture was received with a general shout of applause, which altogether drowned the voice of the dissidents, if any there were amongst the Alsation senate who could have resisted a proposal so popular. The words of, kind heart! noble gentleman! generous gallant! flew from mouth to mouth; and the inscription of the petitioner's name in the great book was hastily completed, and the oath administered to him by the worthy Doge. Like the Laws of the Twelve Tables, of the ancient Cambro-Britons, or other primitive nations, it was couched in poetical language as follows :—

" By spigot and barrel,
By bilboe and buff;
Thou art sworn to the quarrel
Of the blades of the huff.
For Whitefrinns and its claims
To be champion or martyr,
And to fight for its dames
Like a Knight of the Garter."

Nigel felt, and indeed exhibited, some disgust at the mummerly; but the Templar reminding him that he was too far advanced to draw back, he repeated the words, or rather assented as they were repeated; and Duke Hildebrod, who concluded the ceremony by allowing him the privilege of sanctuary, in the following form of prescriptive doggerel :—

" From the touch of the tip,
From the blight of the warrant
From the watchmen who skip
On the Harman Beck's errand;
From the bailiff's cramp speech
That makes man a thrall,
I charm thee from each,
And I charm thee from all Thy freedom's complete
As a Blade of the Huff,
To be cheated and cheat,
To be cuff'd and to cuff;
To stride, swear, and swagger
To drink till you stagger,
To stare and to stab,
And to brandish your dagger
In the cause of your drab;
To walk wool ward in winter,
Drink brandy, and smoke,
And go frexo in summer
For want of a cloak;
To eke out your living
By the wag of your elbow,
By fulliam and gourd,
And by baring of bilboe;
To live by your shifts,
And to swear by your honour,
Are the freedom and gifts
Of which I am the donor." *

This homily being performed, a dispute arose concerning the special residence to be assigned the new brother of the Sanctuary; for, as the Alsations held it a maxim in their commonwealth, that ass's milk fattens, there was usually a competition amongst the inhabitants which should have the managing, as was termed, of a new member of the society.

With which the boy, as mortal urchins wont,

Beef and Pudding.—An old English Comedy.

It is necessary that we should leave our hero Nigel for a time, although in a situation neither safe, comfortable, nor creditable, in order to detail some particulars which have immediate connexion with his troubles.

It was but the third day after he had been forced to take refuge in the house of old Trapbois, the noted ruler of Whitefriars, commonly called Golden rapbois, when the pretty daughter of old Ramsay, a watchmaker, after having piously seen her father finish his breakfast, (from the fear that he might, in an abstruse fit of thought, swallow the salt-cellar instead of a crust of the brown loaf,) set forth from the house as soon as he was again plunged into the depth of calculation, and, accompanied only by that faithful old drudge, Janet, the Scots laundress, to whom her whims were laws, made her way to Lombard Street, and disturbed at the unusual hour of eight in the morning, Aunt Judith, the sister of her worthy godfather.

The venerable maiden received her young visiter with no great complacency; for, naturally enough, she had neither the same admiration of her very pretty countenance, nor allowance for her foolish and rash impatience of temper, which Master George Heriot entertained. Still Mistress Margaret was a favorite of her brother's, whose will was to Aunt Judith a supreme law; and she contented herself with asking her untimely visiter, "what she made so early with her pale, chitty face, in the streets of London?"

"I would speak with the Lady Hermione," answered the almost breathless girl, while the blood ran so fast to her face as totally to remove the objection of paleness which Aunt Judith had made to her complexion.

"With the Lady Hermione?" said Aunt Judith—"with the Lady Hermoine? and at this time in the morning, when she will scarce see any of the family, even at seasonable hours? You are crazy, you silly ench, or you abuse the indulgence which my brother and the lady have shown to you."

"Indeed, indeed I have not," repeated Margaret, struggling to retain the unbidden tear which seemed ready to burst out on the slightest occasion. "Do not say to the lady that your brother's god-daughter sires earnestly to speak to her, and I know she will not refuse to see me."

Aunt Judith bent an earnest, suspicious, and inquisitive glance on her young visiter. "You might make me your secretary, my lassie," she said, "as well as the Lady Hermione. I am older, and better qualified to advise. I live more in the world than one who shuts herself up within four rooms, and I have a better means to assist you."

"O! no—no—no," said Margaret, eagerly, and with more earnest sincerity than complaisance;
"there are some things to which you cannot advise me, Aunt Judith. It is a case—pardon me, my dear aunt—a case beyond your counsel."

"I am glad on't, maiden," said Aunt Judith, somewhat angrily; "for I think the follies of the young people of this generation would drive mad an old man like mine. Here you come on the viretot, rough the whole streets of London, to talk some nonsense to a lady, who scarce sees God's sun, but when he shines on a brick wall. But I will tell her you are here."

She went away, and shortly returned with a dry —"Mistress Marget, the lady will be glad to see you; and that's more, my young inadam, than you had a right to count upon."

Mistress Margaret hung her head in silence, too much perplexed by the train of her own embarrassed thoughts, for attempting either to conciliate Aunt Judith's kindness, or, which on other occasions would have been as congenial to her own humour, to retaliate on her cross-tempered remarks and manner. She followed Aunt Judith, therefore, in silence and dejection, to the strong oaken door which divided the Lady Hermione's apartments from the rest of George Heriot's spacious house.

At the door of this sanctuary it is necessary to pause, in order to correct the reports with which Richie Monplies had filled his master's ear, respecting the singular appearance of that lady's attendance at prayers, whom we now own to be by name the Lady Hermione. Some part of these exaggerations had been communicated to the worthy Scotsman by Jenkin Vincent, who was well experienced in the species of wit which has been long a favourite in the city, under the names of cross-biting, giving the dor, bamboozling, cramming, hoaxing, humbugging, and quizzing; for which sport Richie Monplies, with his solemn gravity, totally unapprehensive of a joke, and his natural propensity to the marvellous, formed an admirable subject. Farther ornaments the tale had received from Richie himself, whose tongue, especially when oiled with good liquor, had a considerable tendency to amplification, and who failed not, while he retailed to his master all the wonderful circumstances narrated by Vincent, to add to them many conjectures of his own, which his imagination had over-hastily converted into facts.

Yet the life which the Lady Hermione had led for two years, during which she had been the inmate of George Heriot's house, was so singular, as almost to sanction many of the wild reports which went abroad. The house which the worthy goldsmith inhabited, had in former times belonged to a powerful and wealthy baronial family, which, during the reign of Henry VIII., terminated in a dowager lady, very wealthy, very devout, and most unalienably attached to the Catholic faith. The chosen friend of the Honourable Lady Foljambe was the Abbess of Saint Roque's Nunnery, like herself a conscientious, rigid, and devoted Papist. When the house of Saint Roque was despotically dissolved by the fiat of the impetu-ous monarch, the Lady Foljambe received her friend into her spacious mansion, together with two vestal sisters, who, like their Abbess, were determined to follow the tenor of their vows, instead of embracing the profane liberty which the Monarch's will had thrown in their choice. For their residence, the Lady Foljambe contrived, with all secrecy—for Henry might not have relished her interference—to set apart a suite of four rooms, with a little closet fitted up as an oratory, or chapel; the whole apartments fenced by a strong oaken door to exclude strangers, and accommodated with a turning wheel to receive necessities, according to the practice of all nunneries. In this retreat, the Abbess of Saint Roque and her attendants passed many years, communicating only with the Lady Foljambe, who, in virtue of their prayers, and of the support she afforded them, accounted herself little less than a saint on earth. The Abbess, fortunately for herself, died before her munificent patroness, who lived deep in Queen Elizabeth's time, ere she was summoned by fate.

The Lady Foljambe was succeeded in this mansion by a sour fanatic knight, a distant and collateral relation, who claimed the same merit for expelling the priestess of Baal, which his predecessor had founded on maintaining the votaries of Heaven. Of the two unhappy nuns, driven from their ancient refuge, one went beyond sea; the other, unable from old age to undertake such a journey, died under the roof of a faithful Catholic widow of low degree. Sir Paul Crambagge, having got rid of the nuns, spoiled the chapel of its ornaments, and had thoughts of altogether destroying the apartments, until checked by the reflection that the operation would be an unnecessary expense, since he only inhabited three rooms of the large mansion, and had not therefore the slightest occasion for any addition to its accommodations. His son proved a waster and a prodigal, and from him the house was bought by our friend George Heriot, who, finding, like Sir Paul, the house more than sufficiently ample for his accommodation, left the Foljambe apartments, or Saint Roque's rooms, as they were called, in the state in which he found them.

About two years and a half before our history opened, when Heriot was absent upon an expedition to the Continent, he sent special orders to his sister and his cash-keeper, directing that the Foljambe apartments should be fitted up handsomely, though plainly, for the reception of a lady, who would make them her residence for some time; and who would live more or less with his own family according to her pleasure. He also directed, that the necessary repairs should be made with secrecy, and that as little should be said as possible upon the subject of his letter.

When the time of his return came nigh, Aunt Judith and the household were on the tenter-hooks of impatience. Master George came, as he had intimated, accompanied by a lady, so eminently beautiful, that, had it not been for her extreme and uniform paleness, she might have been reckoned one of the loveliest creatures on earth. She had with her an attendant, or humble companion, whose business seemed only to wait upon her. This person, a reserved woman, and by her dialect a foreigner, aged about fifty, was called by the lady Monna Paula, and by Master Heriot, and others, Mademoiselle Pauline. She slept in the same room with her patroness at night, ate in her apartment, and was scarcely ever separated from her during the day.

These females took possession of the nunnery of the devout Abbess, and, without observing the same rigorous seclusion, according to the letter, seemed well-nigh to restore the apartments to the use to which they had been originally designed. The new inmates lived and took their meals apart from the rest of the family. With the domestics Lady Hermione, for so she was termed, held no communication, and Mademoiselle Pauline only such as was indispensable, which she despatched as briefly as possible. Frequent and liberal largesses reconciled the servants to this conduct; and they were in the habit of observing to each other, that to do a service for Mademoiselle Pauline, was like finding a fairy treasure.

To Aunt Judith the Lady Hermione was kind and civil, but their intercourse was rare; on which account the elder lady felt some pangs both of curiosity and injured dignity. But she knew her brother so well, and loved him so dearly, that his will, once expressed, might be truly said to become her own. The worthy citizen was not without a spice of the dogmatism which grows on the best disposition, when a word is a law to all around. Master George did not enquire to be questioned by his family, and, when he had generally expressed his will, that the Lady Hermione should live in the way most agreeable to her, and that no inquiries should be made concerning her history, or her motives for observing such strict seclusion, his sister well knew that he would have been seriously displeased with any attempt to pry into the secret.

But though Heriot's servants were bribed, and his sister awed into silent acquiescence in these arrangements, they were not of a nature to escape the critical observation of the neighbourhood. Some opined that the wealthy goldsmith was about to turn papist, and re-establish Lady Foljambe's nunnery—others that he was going mad—others that he was either going to marry, or to do worse. Master George's constant appearance at church, and the knowledge that the supposed votress always attended when the prayers of the English ritual were read in the family, liberated him from the first of these suspicions; those who had to transact business with him upon 'Change, could not doubt the soundness of Master Heriot's mind; and, to confute the other rumours, it was credibly reported by such as made the matter their particular interest, that Master George Heriot never visited his guest Pauline, who sat in the same room in which he ascertained that it was an hour in length once a-week, an interrupted, to render bond of their union.

CHAPTER XIX.

By the good light, a woman of much less matter?
This was a longer time to have a matter
To find his woman, and then his bloody brow,
And say a wonder as the lady I to say him,
Though the rough woman a stream was found as high,
They were I to find the woman - Old Play

When Mistress Margaret entered the Foljambe apartment, she found the inmates employed in their usual manner, the lady in reading, and her attendant in embroidering a large piece of tapestry, which had occupied her ever since Margaret had been first admitted within these secluded chambers.

Hermione nodded kindly to her visitor, but did not speak, and Margaret, accustomed to this reception, and in the present case not sorry for it, as it gave her an interval to collect her thoughts, stooped over Monna Paula's frame, and observed, in a half whisper, "You were just so far as that rose, Monna, when I first saw you—see, there is the mark where I had the bad luck to spoil the flower in trying to catch the stitch—I was little above fifteen then. Those flowers make me an old woman, Monna Paula."

"I wish they could make you a wise one, my child," answered Monna Paula, in whose respect pretty Mistress Margaret did not stand quite so high as in that of her patroness, partly owing to her natural austerity, which was something intolerant of youth and gaiety, and partly to the jealousy with which a favourite domestic regards any one whom she considers as a sort of rival in the affections of her mistress.

"What is it you say to Monna, little one?" asked the lady.

"Nothing, madam," replied Mistress Margaret, but that I have seen the real flowers blossom; three times over since I first saw Monna Paula working in her canvas garden, and her violets have not budged yet."

"True, lady bird," replied Hermione; "but the buds that are longest in blossoming will last the longest in flower. You have seen them in the garden bloom thrice, but you have seen them fade thrice also—now, Monna Paula's will remain in blow for ever—they will fear neither frost nor tempest."

"True, madam," answered Mistress Margaret; "but neither have they life or odour."

"That, little one," replied the recluse, "is to compare a life agitated by hope and fear, and checkered with success and disappointment, and fevered by the effects of love and hatred, a life of passion and of feeling, saddened and shortened by its exhausting alternations, to a calm and tranquil existence, animated but by a sense of duty, and only employed, during its smooth and quiet course, in the unwearied discharge of them. Is that the moral of your answer?"

"I do not know, madam," answered Mistress Margaret; "but of all birds in the air, I would rather be the lark, that sings while he is drifting down the summer breeze, than the weathercock that sticks fast yonder upon his won perch, and just moves as much as to discharge his duty, and tell us which way the wind blows."

"Metaphors are no arguments, my pretty madam," said the Lady Hermione, smiling.

"I am sorry for that madam," answered Marg-aret, "for they are such a pretty indirect way of telling one's mind when it differs from one's better judgment, on this subject there is no end of them, and they are so civil and becoming when!"

"Indeed?" replied the lady, "let me hear some of them. I pray you."

"It would be, for example, very bold in me," said Margaret, "in say to your ladyship, that, rather than live a quiet life, I would like a little variety of hope and fear, and liking and disliking—and—and—and the other sort of feelings which your ladyship is pleased to speak of, but I may say freely, and without blame, that I like a butterfly better than a beetle, or a trembling aspen better than a grim Scots fir, that never wags a leaf—or that of all the wood- brans, and woe that ever my father's fingers put together, I do hate and detest a certain huge old clock of the German fashion, that rings hours and half hours, and quarters and half quarters, as if it were of such consequence that the world should know it was wound up and going. Now, dearest lady, I wish you would only compare that clumsy, clanging, Dutch-looking piece of lumber, with the beautiful timepiece that Master Heriot caused my father to make for your ladyship, which uses to play a hundred merry tunes, and turns out, when it strikes the hour, a whole band of morrice-dancers, to trip the hays to the measure."

"And which of these timepieces goes the truest, Margaret?" said the lady.

"I must confess the old Dutchman has the advantage in that"—said Margaret. "I fancy you are right, madam, and that comparisons are no arguments; at least mine has not brought me through."

"Upon my word, maiden Margaret," said the lady, smiling, "you have been of late thinking very much of these matters."

"Perhaps too much, madam," said Margaret, so low as only to be heard by the lady, behind the back of whose chair she had now placed herself. The words were spoken very gravely, and accompanied by a half sigh, which did not escape the attention of her to whom they were addressed. The Lady Hermione turned immediately round, and looked earnestly at Margaret, then paused for a moment, and, finally, commanded Monna Paula to carry her frame and embroidery into the ante-chamber. When they were left alone, she desired her young friend to come from behind the chair, on the back of which she still rested, and sit down beside her upon a stool.

"I will remain thus, madam, under your favour," answered Margaret, without changing her posture; "I would rather you heard me without seeing me."

"In God's name, maiden," returned her patroness, "what is it you can have to say, that may not be uttered face to face, to so true a friend as I am?"

"Without making any direct answer, Margaret only replied, "You were right, dearest lady, when you said, I had suffered my feelings too much to engross me of late. I have done very wrong, and you will be angry with me—so will my godfather, but I cannot help it—he must be rescued."

"He?" repeated the lady, with emphasis; "that brief little word does, indeed, so far explain your mystery;—but come from behind the chair, you silly popinjay! I will wager you have suffered yonder gay young apprentice to sit too near your heart. I have not heard you mention young Vincent for many a day—perhaps he has not been out of mouth and out of mind both. Have you been so foolish as to let him speak to you seriously?—I am told he is a bold youth."

"Not bold enough to say any thing that could displease me, madam," said Margaret.

"Perhaps, then, you were not displeased," said the lady; "or perhaps he has not spoken, which would be wiser and better. Be open-hearted, my love—your godfather will soon return, and we will take him into our consultations. If the young man is industrious, and come of honest parentage, his poverty may be no such insurmountable obstacle. But you are both of you very young, Margaret—I know your godfather will expect, that the youth shall first serve out his apprenticeship."

Margaret had hitherto suffered the lady to proceed, under the mistaken impression which she had adopted, simply because she could not tell how to interrupt her; but pure despite at hearing her last words gave her boldness at length to say, "I crave your pardon, madam; but neither the youth you mention, nor any apprentice or master within the city of London"—

"Margaret," said the lady, in reply, "the contemptuous tone with which you mention those of your own class, (many hundreds if not thousands of whom are in all respects better than yourself, and would greatly honour you by thinking of you,) is, methinks, no warrant for the wisdom of your choice—for a choice, it seems, there is. Who is it, maiden, to whom you have thus rashly attached yourself?—rashly, I fear it must be."

"It is the young Scottish Lord Glenvarloch," answered Margaret, in a low and not but sufficiently firm, considering the subject.

"The young Lord of Glenvarloch?" said the lady, in great surprise. "Maiden, you are in your wits."

"I knew you would say so, madam," Margaret. "It is what another person told me—it is, perhaps, what all the world me—it is what I am sometimes disposed self. But look at me, madam, for I will before you, and tell me if there is madness in my look and word, when I repeat to that I have fixed my affections on this young man."

"If there is not madness in your love, maiden, there is infinite folly in what you answered the Lady Hermione, sharply. You ever hear that misplaced love brought but wretchedness? Seek a match of equals, Margaret, and escape the countless risk and misery that must attend an affection your degree. —Why do you smile, maiden, ought to cause scorn in what I say?"

"Surely no, madam," answered Margaret. "I only smiled to think how it should be while rank made such a wide difference between creatures formed from the same clay, the vulgar should, nevertheless, jump so close to the same length with that of the accomplished. It is but the variation of the passions that divides them. Dame Ursley told me the thing which your ladyship has but now uttered to me, madam, talk of countless misery, Ursley spoke of the gallows, and Mistress who was hanged upon it."

"Indeed?" answered the Lady Hermione, who may Dame Ursley be, that your wise association with me in the difficult task of folly?"

"The barber's wife at next door," answered Margaret, with feigned simplicity from being sorry at heart, that she had found a direct mode of mortifying her mistress, the wisest woman that I know, next to herself."

"A proper confidant," said the lady, "with the same delicate sense of what is due to self and others!—But what ails you, maiden, are you going?"

"Only to ask Dame Ursley's advice," answered Margaret, as if about to depart; "for I see your too angry to give me any, and the emergency."

"What emergency, thou simple one?" said the lady, in a kinder tone. "Sit down, maiden, and tell me your tale. It is true you are a fool, and a fool to boot; but then you are a child—a child, with all your self-willed folly, and I will help you, if we can. Sit down, I say, as I bided, and you will find me a safer and wiser seller than the barber-woman. And tell me, you come to suppose, that you have fixed your affections unalterably upon a man whom you have not even thought of, but once."

"I have seen him oftener," said the lady, "but I have only spoken to him, and he should have been able to get that once out of me, though the impression was so deep, that I now repeat every trifling word he said; things have since riveted it in my bosom."

"Maiden," replied the lady, "for ever is the word which comes most lightly on the lips in such circumstances, but which, not the less, is almost that we should use. The fashion of this passion, its joys, and its sorrows, pass away like a winged breeze—there is nought for ever, which belongs to the world beyond the grave."

"You have corrected me justly, madam," said Margaret, calmly; "I ought only to have considered my present state of mind, as what will be my lifetime, which unquestionably may be but a short one."

"And what is there in this Scottish lord that rivets what concerns him so closely in you?"

ly. "I admit him a personable man, for him; and I will suppose him courteous. But what are his accomplishments? These surely are not uncommon attriunfortunate, madam—most unfortunate—ruined by snares of different kinds, ingenuously contrived to ruin his character, destroy his life, perhaps, to reach even his life. These have been devised by avarice originally, but now followed close by vindictive ambition, I think, by the absolute and concentrated malice; for the Lord Dalgarno!"

"Monna Paula—Monna Paula!" exclaimed Lady Hermione, interrupting her young friend's speech. "She hears me not," she answered, rising out, "I must seek her—I will return. She returned accordingly very soon after. I mentioned a name which I thought was familiar," she said; "but Monna Paula has put me now nothing of your lord—how was it you?"

"Dalgarno," said Margaret;—"the wicked lives. Under pretence of friendship, he turned the Lord Glenvarloch to a gambling-house, the purpose of engaging him in deep play; and whom the perfidious traitor had to deal with, who was moderate, and cautious, to be caught so open. What did they next, but turn his position against him, and persuade others to join with them for a share of their booty! And, as the Lord Dalgarno was thus undermining the countryman, he took every means to surround him by creatures of his own, to prevent him from attending Court, and mixing with his proper rank. Since the Gunpowder there never was a conspiracy more deeply and more deliberately pursued."

"I smiled sadly at Margaret's vehemence, and the next moment, while she told her young friend little she knew the world she was about to see she testified so much surprise at finding villany."

"What means," she added, "could you, being so possessed of the secret views of a villain as Lord Dalgarno—as villains in ge-me to be silent on that subject," said the lady. "I could not tell you without betraying it suffice that my tidings are as certain as by which I acquired them are secret and I must not tell them even to you."

"Too bold, Margaret," said the lady, "to touch matters at your early age. It is not proper, but even unbecoming and unmaidenly."

"You would say that also," said Margaret, "meekness and patience than she usually receives reproof; but, God knows, my heart is full of every other feeling save that of assisting this most innocent and betrayed friend. I tried to send him warning of his friend's—alas! my care has only hastened his ruin unless speedy aid be found. He charged his friend with treachery, and drew on him in and is now liable to the fatal penalty due of privilege of the King's palace."

"Indeed an extraordinary tale," said Lady Hermione. "Lord Glenvarloch then in prison?"

"Madam, thank God, but in the Sanctuary at present—it is matter of doubt whether it will prove such a case—they speak of a warrant from the Lord Chief Justice—A gentleman of the name has been arrested, and is in trouble, for having been in his flight.—Even his taking temple in that base place, though from extreme necessity will be used to the farther defaming him. Now, and yet I cannot rescue him—cannot save him by your means."

"What means, maiden?" said the lady—"you yourself!—What means can I possess in the present situation, of assisting this unfortunate?"

"You have means," said Margaret, eagerly; "you have those means, unless I mistake greatly, which can do any thing—can do every thing, in this city, in this world—you have wealth, and the command of a small portion of it will enable me to extricate him from his present danger. He will be enabled and directed how to make his escape—and I!"—she paused.

"Will you accompany him, doubtless, and reap the fruits of your sage exertions in his behalf?" said the Lady Hermione, ironically.

"May Heaven forgive you the unjust thought, lady," answered Margaret. "I will never see him more—but I shall have saved him, and the thought will make me happy."

"A cold conclusion to so bold and warm a flame," said the lady, with a smile which seemed to intinate incredulity.

"It is, however, the only one which I expect, madam—I could almost say the only one which I wish—I am sure I will use no efforts to bring about any other; if I am bold in his cause, I am timorous enough in my own. During our only interview I was unable to speak a word to him. He knows not the sound of my voice—and all that I have risked, and must yet risk, I am doing for one, who, were he asked the question, would say he has long since forgotten that he ever saw, spoke to, or sat beside, a creature of so little signification as I am."

"This is a strange and unreasonable indulgence of a passion equally fanciful and dangerous," said the Lady Hermione.

"You will not assist me, then?" said Margaret; "I have good-day then, madam—my secret, I trust, is safe in such honourable keeping."

"Tarry yet a little," said the lady, "and tell me what resource you have to assist this youth, if you were supplied with money to put it in motion."

"It is superfluous to ask me the question, madam," answered Margaret, "unless you purpose to assist me; and, if you do so purpose, it is still superfluous. You could not understand the means I must use, and time is too brief to explain."

"But have you in reality such means?" said the lady.

"I have, with the command of a moderate sum," answered Margaret Ramsay, "the power of baffling all his enemies—of eluding the passion of the irritated King—the colder but more determined displeasure of the Prince—the vindictive spirit of Buckingham, so hastily directed against whomsoever crosses the path of his ambition—the cold concentrated malice of Lord Dalgarno—all, I can baffle them all!"

"But is this to be done without your own personal risk, Margaret?" replied the lady; "for, be your purpose what it will, you are not to peril your own reputation or person, in the romantic attempt of serving another; and I, maiden, am answerable to your godfather,—to your benefactor, and my own,—not to aid you in any dangerous or unworthy enterprise."

"Depend upon my word,—my oath,—dearest lady," replied the suppliant, "that I will act by the agency of others, and do not myself design to mingle in any enterprise in which my appearance might be either perilous or unwomanly."

"I know not what to do," said the Lady Hermione; "it is perhaps incautious and inconsiderate in me to aid so wild a project; yet the end seems honourable, if the means be sure—what is the penalty if he fall into their power?"

"Alas, alas! the loss of his right hand!" replied Margaret, her voice almost stifled with sobs.

"Are the laws of England so cruel? Then there is mercy in Heaven alone," said the lady, "since, even in this free land, men are wolves to each other.—Compose yourself, Margaret, and tell me what money is necessary to secure Lord Glenvarloch's escape."

"Two hundred pieces," replied Margaret; "I would speak to you of restoring them—and I must one day have the power—only that I know—that is, I think—your ladyship is indifferent on that score."

"Not a word more of it," said the lady; "call Monna Paula hither."

CHAPTER XX.

Credit me, friend, it hath been ever thus,
 Since the ark rested on Mount Ararat.
 False man hath sworn, and woman hath believed—Repented and reproach'd, and then believed once more.
The New World.

By the time that Margaret returned with Monna Paula, the Lady Hermione was rising from the table at which she had been engaged in writing something on a small slip of paper, which she gave to her attendant.

"Monna Paula," she said, "carry this paper to Roberts the cash-keeper; let him give you the money mentioned in the note, and bring it hither presently."

"I do not know," she said, "Margaret, if I have done, and am doing well, in this affair. My life has been one of strange seclusion, and I am totally unacquainted with the practical ways of this world—an ignorance which I know cannot be remedied by mere reading.—I fear I am doing wrong to you, and perhaps to the laws of the country which affords me refuge, by thus indulging you; and yet there is something in my heart which cannot resist your entreaties."

"O, listen to it—listen to it, dear, generous lady!" said Margaret, throwing herself on her knees and grasping those of her benefactress, and looking in that attitude like a beautiful mortal in the act of supplicating her tutelary angel; "the laws of men are but the injunctions of mortality, but what the heart prompts is the echo of the voice from Heaven within us."

"Rise, rise, maiden," said Hermione; "you affect me more than I thought I could have been moved by aught that should approach me. Rise and tell me whence it comes, that, in so short a time, your thoughts, your looks, your speech, and even your slightest actions, are changed from those of a capricious and fanciful girl, to all this energy and impassioned eloquence of word and action?"

"I am sure I know not, dearest lady," said Margaret, looking down; "but I suppose that, when I was a trifter, I was only thinking of trifles. What I now reflect is deep and serious, and I am thankful if my speech and manner bear reasonable proportion to my thoughts."

"It must be so," said the lady; "yet the change seems a rapid and strange one. It seems to be as if a childish girl had at once shot up into deep-thinking and impassioned woman, ready to make exertions alike, and sacrifices, with all that vain devotion to a favourite object of affection, which is often so basely rewarded."

The Lady Hermione sighed bitterly, and Monna Paula entered ere the conversation proceeded farther. She spoke to her mistress in the foreign language in which they frequently conversed, but which was unknown to Margaret.

"We must have patience for a time," said the lady to her visitor; "the cash-keeper is abroad on some business, but he is expected home in the course of half an hour."

Margaret wrung her hands in vexation and impatience.

"Minutes are precious," continued the lady; "that I am well aware of; and we will at least suffer none of them to escape us. Monna Paula shall remain below and transact our business, the very instant that Roberts returns home."

She spoke to her attendant accordingly, who again left the room.

"You are very kind, madam—very good," said the poor little Margaret, while the anxious trembling of her lip and of her hand showed all that sickening agitation of the heart which arises from hope deferred.

"Be patient, Margaret, and collect yourself," said the lady; "you may, you must, have much to do to carry through this your bold purpose—reserve your spirits, which you may need so much—be patient—it is the only remedy against the evils of life."

"Yes, madam," said Margaret, wiping her eyes, and endeavouring in vain to suppress the natural impatience of her temper,—"I have heard it often indeed; and I dare say I have myself, forgive me, said so to people in perplexity of fiction; but it was before I had suffered pain and vexation myself, and I am sure I will never have patience to any human being again, now that I know how much the medicine goes against the sufferer."

"You will think better of it, maiden," said Lady Hermione; "I also, when I first felt that they did me wrong who spoke to me of patience; but my sorrows have been repeated and continued till I have been taught to cling to my best, and—religious duties excepted of which patience forms a part—the only elevation of life can afford them."

Margaret, who neither wanted sense nor wiped her tears hastily, and asked her patron for forgiveness for her petulance.

"I might have thought"—she said, "I have reflected, that even from the manner of life, madam, it is plain you must have suffered and yet, God knows, the patience which I have seen you display, well entitles you to rec your own example to others."

The lady was silent for a moment, and replied—

"Margaret, I am about to repose a high confidence in you. You are no longer a child, but a young and a feeling woman. You have told me as your secret as you dared—I will let you know much of mine as I may venture to tell. I ask me, perhaps, why, at a moment when my mind is agitated, I should force upon you consideration of my sorrows? and I answer, that I cannot withstand the impulse which now induces me to do so. Perhaps from having witnessed, for some time these three years, the natural effects of a passion, my own sorrows have been awake are for the moment too big for my own bosom. I may hope that you, who seem driven on the very rock on which I was wrecked, will take warning by the tale I have told. Enough, if you are willing to listen, I am willing to tell you who the melancholy inhabitant of the jambe apartments really is, and why she remains there. It will serve, at least, to while away the time. Monna Paula shall bring us the reply from her."

At any other moment of her life, Margaret would have heard with undivided interest a communication so flattering in itself, and referring to a subject upon which the general curiosity had been so strongly excited. And even at this agitating time, although she ceased not to listen with an ear and throbbing heart for the sound of Paula's returning footsteps, she nevertheless, by a mixture of gratitude and policy, as well as a portion of self-interest, dictated, composed herself, in appearance, to the strictest attention to the Lady Hermione, thanked her with humility for the high confidence she was pleased to repose in her. The Lady Hermione, with the same calmness which always regulated her speech and actions, thus recounted to her young friend:

"My father," she said, "was a merchant of a city whose merchants are princes; the daughter of a noble house in Genoa, who stood as high in honour and in antiquity, as was recorded in the Golden Register of that famous city."

"My mother was a noble Scottish woman, descended—do not start—and not remote, of the house of Glenvarloch—no wonder I was easily led to take concern in the misfortune of this young lord. He is my near relation, and therefore, who was more than sufficiently proud of descent, early taught me to take an interest in it. My maternal grandfather, a cadet of that house of Glenvarloch, had followed the fortunes of an unfortunate fugitive, Francis Earl of Bothwell, who, after his miseries in many a foreign court, at length found refuge in Spain upon a miserable pension, which he obtained by conforming to the Catholic faith. Ralph, my grandfather, separated from him in dissipation, settled at Barcelona, where, by the friendship

ernor, his heresy, as it was termed, was connived

My father, in the course of his commerce, resided more at Barcelona than in his native country, though sometimes he visited Genoa.

It was at Barcelona that he became acquainted with my mother, loved her, and married her; they differed in faith, but they agreed in affection. I was his only child. In public I conformed to the doctrines and ceremonial of the church of Rome; but my mother, by whom these were regarded with horror, privately trained me up in those of the reformed religion; and my father, either indifferent in the matter, unwilling to distress the woman whom he loved, or looked on or connived at my secretly joining in her notions.

But when, unhappily, my father was attacked, while yet in the prime of life, by a slow wasting disease, which he felt to be incurable, he foresaw the hard to which his widow and orphan might be exposed, after he was no more, in a country so bigoted to Catholicism as Spain. He made it his business, during the two last years of his life, to realize and to remit to England a large part of his fortune, which, the faith and honour of his correspondent, the excellent man under whose roof I now reside, was employed to great advantage. Had my father lived to complete his purpose, by withdrawing his whole fortune from commerce, he himself would have accompanied us to England, and would have beheld us settled in peace and honour before his death. But Heaven ordained it otherwise. He died, leaving several claims engaged in the hands of his Spanish debtors; and, in particular, he had made a large and extensive assignment to a certain wealthy society of merchants at Madrid, who showed no willingness after his death to account for the proceeds. Would to God he had left these covetous and wicked men in possession of their booty, for such they seemed to hold the property of their deceased correspondent and friend!

He had enough for comfort, and even splendour, already secured in England; but friends exclaimed upon the folly of permitting these unprincipled men to plunder us of our rightful property. The sum itself was large, and the claim having been made, my mother thought that my father's memory was interested in being enforced, especially as the defences set up for the mercantile society went, in some degree, to impeach the fairness of his transactions.

We went therefore to Madrid. I was then, my mother said, about your age, young and thoughtless, as I have hitherto been—We went, I say, to Madrid, to solicit the protection of the Court and of the King, without which we were told it would be in vain to seek justice against an opulent and powerful association.

Our residence at the Spanish metropolis drew on from weeks to months. For my part, my natural sorrow for a kind, though not a fond father, having abated, I cared not if the lawsuit had detained us at Madrid for ever. My mother permitted herself and me more liberty than we had been accustomed to. We found relations among the Scottish and Irish officers, many of whom held a high rank in the Spanish armies; their wives and daughters became our friends and companions, and I had perpetual occasion to exercise my mother's native language, which I had learned from my infancy. By degrees, as my mother's fortunes were low, and her health indifferent, she was induced, by her partial fondness for me, to suffer me to mingle occasionally in society which she herself did not frequent, under the guardianship of such ladies as she imagined she could trust, and particularly under the care of the lady of a general officer, whose weakness or falsehood was the original cause of my misadventures. I was as gay, Margaret, and thoughtless—I can repeat it—as you were but lately, and my attention, like yours, became suddenly riveted to one object, and to one set of feelings.

The person by whom they were excited was young, handsome, accomplished, a soldier, and a Briton. So far our cases are nearly parallel; but, may Heaven forbid that the parallel should become complete! This man, so noble, so fairly formed, so gifted, and so brave—this villain, for that, Margaret, was his fittest name, spoke of love to me, and I listened—Could I suspect his sincerity? If he was wealthy, noble, and long-descended, I also was a noble and an opulent heiress. It is true, that he neither knew the extent of my father's wealth, nor did I communicate to him (I do not even remember if I myself knew it at the time) the important circumstance, that the greater part of that wealth was beyond the grasp of arbitrary power, and not subject to the precarious award of arbitrary judges. My lover might think, perhaps, as my mother was desirous the world at large should believe, that almost our whole fortune depended on the precarious suit which we had come to Madrid to prosecute—a belief which she had countenanced out of policy, being well aware that a knowledge of my father's having remitted such a large part of his fortune to England, would in no shape aid the recovery of farther sums in the Spanish courts. Yet, with no more extensive views of my fortune than were possessed by the public, I believe that he, of whom I am speaking, was at first sincere in his pretensions. He had himself interest sufficient to have obtained a decision in our favour in the courts, and my fortune, reckoning only what was in Spain, would then have been no inconsiderable sum. To be brief, whatever might be his motives or temptation for so far committing himself, he applied to my mother for my hand, with my consent and approval. My mother's judgment had become weaker, but her passions had become more irritable, during her increasing illness.

"You have heard of the bitterness of the ancient Scottish feuds, of which it may be said, in the language of Scripture, that the fathers eat sour grapes, and the teeth of the children are set on edge. Unhappily,—I should say happily, considering what this man has now shown himself to be,—some such strain of bitterness had divided his house from my mother's, and she had succeeded to the inheritance of hatred. When he asked her for my hand, she was no longer able to command her passions—she raked up every injury which the rival families had inflicted upon each other during a bloody feud of two centuries—heaped him with epithets of scorn, and rejected his proposal of alliance, as if it had come from the basest of mankind.

"My lover retired in passion; and I remained to weep and murmur against fortune, and—I will confess my fault—against my affectionate parent. I had been educated with different feelings, and the traditions of the feuds and quarrels of my mother's family in Scotland, which were to her monuments and chronicles, seemed to me as insignificant and unmeaning as the actions and fantasies of Don Quixote; and I blamed my mother bitterly for sacrificing my happiness to an empty dream of family dignity.

"While I was in this humour, my lover sought a renewal of our intercourse. We met repeatedly in the house of the lady whom I have mentioned, and who, in levity, or in the spirit of intrigue, countenanced our secret correspondence. At length we were secretly married—so far did my blinded passion hurry me. My lover had secured the assistance of a clergyman of the English church. Monna Paula, who had been my attendant from infancy, was one witness of our union. Let me do the faithful creature justice—She conjured me to suspend my purpose till my mother's death should permit us to celebrate our marriage openly; but the entreaties of my lover, and my own wayward passion, prevailed over her remonstrances. The lady I have spoken of was another witness, but whether she was in full possession of my bridegroom's secret, I had never the means to learn. But the shelter of her name and roof afforded us the means of frequently meeting, and the love of my husband seemed as sincere and as unbounded as my own.

"He was eager, he said, to gratify his pride, by introducing me to one or two of his noble English friends. This could not be done at Lady D—'s; but by his command, which I was now entitled to consider as my law, I contrived twice to visit him at his own hotel, accompanied only by Monna Paula. There was a very small party, of two ladies and two gentlemen. There was music, mirth, and dancing.

I had heard of the frankness of the English nation, but I could not help thinking it bordered on license during these entertainments, and in the course of the collation which followed; but I imputed my scruples to my inexperience, and would not doubt the propriety of what was approved by my husband.

"I was soon summoned to other scenes: My poor mother's disease drew to a conclusion—Happy I am that it took place before she discovered what would have cut her to the soul.

"In Spain you may have heard how the Catholic priests, and particularly the monks, besiege the beds of the dying, to obtain bequests for the good of the church. I have said that my mother's temper was irritated by disease, and her judgment impaired in proportion. She gathered spirits and force from the resentment which the priests around her had excited by their importunity, and the boldness of the stern sect of reformers, to which she had secretly adhered, seemed to animate her dying tongue. She avowed the religion she had so long concealed; renounced all hope and aid which did not come by and through its dictates; rejected with contempt the ceremonial of the Romish church; loaded the astonished priests with reproaches for their greediness and hypocrisy, and commanded them to leave her house. They went in bitterness and rage, but it was to return with the inquisitorial power, its warrants, and its officers; and they found only the cold corpse left of her, on whom they had hoped to work their vengeance. As I was soon discovered to have shared my mother's heresy, I was dragged from her dead body, imprisoned in a solitary cloister and treated with severity, which the Abbess assured me was due to the looseness of my life, as well as my spiritual errors. I avowed my marriage, to justify the situation in which I found myself—I implored the assistance of the Superior to communicate my situation to my husband. She smiled coldly at the proposal, and told me the church had provided a better spouse for me; advised me to secure myself of divine grace hereafter, and deserve milder treatment here, by presently taking the veil. In order to convince me that I had no other resource, she showed me a royal decree, by which all my estate was hypothecated to the convent of Saint Magdalen, and became their complete property upon my death, or my taking the vows. As I was, both from religious principle, and affectionate attachment to my husband, absolutely immoveable in my rejection of the veil, I believe—may Heaven forgive me if I wrong her!—that the Abbess was desirous to make sure of my spoils, by hastening the former event.

"It was a small and a poor convent, and situated among the mountains of Guadarrama. Some of the sisters were the daughters of neighbouring Hidalgos, as poor as they were proud and ignorant; others were women immured there on account of their vicious conduct. The Superior herself was of a high family, to which she owed her situation; but she was said to have disgraced her connexions by her conduct during youth, and now, in advanced age, covetousness and the love of power, a spirit too of severity and cruelty, had succeeded to the thirst after licentious pleasure. I suffered much under this woman—and still her dark glassy eye, her tall, shrouded form, and her rigid features, haunt my slumbers.

"I was not destined to be a mother. I was very ill, and my recovery was long doubtful. The most violent remedies were applied, if remedies they indeed were. My health was restored at length, against my own expectation and that of all around me. But, when I first again beheld the reflection of my own face, I thought it was the visage of a ghost. I was wont to be flattered by all, but particularly by my husband, for the fineness of my complexion—it was now totally gone, and, what is more extraordinary, it has never returned. I have observed that the few who now see me, look upon me as a bloodless phantom—Such has been the abiding effect of the treatment to which I was subjected. May God forgive those who were the agents of it!—I thank Heaven I can say so with as sincere a wish, as that with which I pray for forgiveness of my own sins. They now relented somewhat towards me—moved perhaps to compassion by my singular appearance, which was witness to my sufferings; or afraid that the same might attract attention during a visitation of the shop, which was approaching. One day, as I was walking in the convent-garden, to which I had been lately admitted, a miserable old Moorish slave, who was kept to cultivate the little spot, muttered and passed him, but still keeping his wrinkled face and crept form in the same angle with the earth—'This is Heart's Ease near the postern.'

"I knew something of the symbolical language of flowers, once carried to such perfection among the Moriscos of Spain; but if I had been ignorant, the captive would soon have caught at any hint that seemed to promise liberty. With all the assistance with the utmost circumspection—for I was observed by the Abbess or some of the sisters in the window—I hastened to the postern. It was closely barred as usual, but when I coughed signally, I was answered from the other side—and, O Heaven! it was my husband's voice which said, 'Lower the minute here at present, but be on this spot when the vesper bell has tolled.'

"I retired in an ecstasy of joy. I was not even permitted to assist at vespers, but was accustomed to be confined to my cell while the nuns were in the choir. Since my recovery, they had discontinued looking the door; though the utmost severity was pronounced against me if I left these precincts. But the penalty be what it would, I hastened to dare it. Sooner had the last toll of the vesper bell ceased to sound, than I stole from my chamber, reached the garden unobserved, hurried to the postern, beheld it with rapture, and in the next moment was in my husband's arms. He had with him another cavalier of noble mien—both were masked and armed. Two horses, with one saddled for my use, stood in a stable hard by, with two other masked horsemen who seemed to be servants. In less than two minutes we were mounted, and rode off as fast as we could through rough and devious roads, in which our domestics appeared to act as guide.

"The hurried pace at which we rode, and the secrecy of the moment, kept me silent, and prevented my expressing my surprise or my joy save in a few broken words. It also served as an apology for my husband's silence. At length we stopped at a solitary hut—the cavaliers dismounted, and I was lowered from my saddle, not by M—— M—— my husband! would say, who seemed busied about his horse and by the stranger.

"'Go into the hut,' said my husband, 'change your dress with the speed of lightning—you will find me to assist you—we must forward instantly what we have shifted your apparel.'

"I entered the hut, and was received in the arms of the faithful Monna Paula, who had waited my rival for many hours, half-distracted with fear and anxiety. With her assistance I speedily tore off my detested garments of the convent, and exchanged them for a travelling suit, made after the French fashion. I observed that Monna Paula was in a similar dress. I had but just huddled on my changed attire, when we were hastily summoned to mount. A horse, I found, was provided for Monna Paula, as we resumed our route. On the way, my conveyance, which had been wrapped hastily together around a stone, was thrown into a lake, along the verge of which we were then passing. The two cavaliers rode together in front, my attendant and I followed, and the servants brought up the rear. Monna Paula, as we rode on, repeatedly entreated me to be silent upon the road, as our lives depended on it. I was easily reconciled to be passive, for the first fever of spirits which attended the sense of liberation and of gratified affection having passed away, I felt as it were dizzy with the rapid motion; and the utmost exertion was necessary to keep my place in the saddle, until we suddenly (it was now very dark) saw a strong light before us.

"My husband reined up his horse, and gave a signal by a low whistle twice repeated, which was answered from a distance. The whole party then halted under the boughs of a large cork-tree, and my husband, drawing himself close to my side, said, in a voice which I then thought was only embarrassed by fear for my safety.—“We must now part. Those to whom I commit you are contrabandists, who only know you as Englishwomen, but who, for a high bribe, have undertaken to escort you through the passes of the Pyrenees as far as Saint Jean de Luz.”

“And do you not go with us?” I exclaimed with emphasis, though in a whisper.

“It is impossible,” he said, “and would ruin all—See that you speak in English in these people’s hearing, and give not the least sign of understanding what they say in Spanish—your life depends on it; or, though they live in opposition to, and evasion of, the laws of Spain, they would tremble at the idea of violating those of the church—I see them coming—farewell—farewell.”

The last words were hastily uttered—I endeavoured to detain him yet a moment by my feeble grasp on his cloak.

“You will meet me, then, I trust, at Saint Jean de Luz?”

“Yes, yes,” he answered hastily, “at Saint Jean de Luz you will meet your protector.”

He then extricated his cloak from my grasp, and was lost in the darkness. His companion approached—kissed my hand, which in the agony of the moment I was scarce sensible of, and followed my husband, attended by one of the domestics.

The tears of Hermione here flowed so fast as to threaten the interruption of her narrative. When he resumed it, it was with a kind of apology to Margaret.

“Every circumstance,” she said, “occurring in those moments, when I still enjoyed a delusive idea of happiness, are deeply imprinted in my remembrance, which, respecting all that has since happened, waste and unvaried as an Arabian desert. But I have no right to inflict on you, Margaret, agitated as you are with your own anxieties, the unavailing details of my useless recollections.”

Margaret’s eyes were full of tears—it was impossible it could be otherwise, considering that the tale was told by her suffering benefactress, and resembled, in some respects, her own situation; and yet she must not be severely blamed, if, while eagerly pressing her mistress to continue her narrative, her eye involuntarily sought the door, as if to chide the delay of Monna Paula.

The Lady Hermione saw and forgave these conflicting emotions; and she, too, must be pardoned, if, on her turn, the minute detail of her narrative showed, that, in the discharge of feelings so long locked in her own bosom, she rather forgot those which were personal to her auditor, and by which it must be supposed Margaret’s mind was principally occupied, if not entirely engrossed.

“I told you, I think, that one domestic followed the gentlemen,” thus the lady continued her story, “the other remained with us for the purpose, as it seemed, of introducing us to two persons whom I—I say, whom my husband’s signal had brought to the spot. A word or two of explanation passed between them and the servant, in a sort of patois, which I did not understand; and one of the strangers taking hold of my bridle, the other of Monna Paula’s, they led us towards the light, which I have already said was the signal of our halting. I touched Monna Paula, and was sensible that she trembled very much, which surprised me, because I knew her character to be so strong and bold as to border upon the masculine.

“When we reached the fire, the gipsy figures of those who surrounded it, with their swarthy features, large Sombrero hats, girdles stuck full of pistols and poniards, and all the other apparatus of a roving and perilous life, would have terrified me at another moment. But then I only felt the agony of having parted from my husband almost in the very moment of my rescue. The females of the gang—for there were four or five women amongst these contraband traders—received us with a sort of rude courtesy. They were, in dress and manners, not extremely different from the men with whom they associated—were almost as hardy and adventurous, carried arms like them, and were, as we learned from passing circumstances, scarce less experienced in the use of them.

“It was impossible not to fear these wild people; yet they gave us no reason to complain of them, but used us on all occasions with a kind of clumsy courtesy, accommodating themselves to our wants and our weakness during the journey, even while we heard them grumbling to each other against our effeminacy;—like some rude carrier, who in charge of a package of valuable and fragile ware, takes every precaution for its preservation, while he curses the unwonted trouble which it occasions him. Once or twice, when they were disappointed in their contraband traffic, lost some goods in a rencontre with the Spanish officers of the revenue, and were finally pursued by a military force, their murmurs assumed a more alarming tone, in the terrified ears of my attendant and myself, when, without daring to seem to understand them, we heard them curse the insular heretics, on whose account God, Saint James, and Our Lady of the Pillar, had blighted their hopes of profit. These are dreadful recollections, Margaret.”

“It is only,” said the Lady Hermione, “because I linger like a criminal on the scaffold, and would fain protract the time that must inevitably bring on the final catastrophe. Yes, dearest Margaret, I rest and dwell on the events of that journey, marked as it was by fatigue and danger, though the road lay through the wildest and most desolate deserts and mountains, and though our companions, both men and women, were fierce and lawless themselves, and exposed to the most merciless retaliation from those with whom they were constantly engaged—yet would I rather dwell on these hazardous events, than tell that which awaited me at Saint Jean de Luz.”

“But you arrived there in safety?” said Margaret.

“Yes, maiden,” replied the Lady Hermione; “and were guided by the chief of our outlawed band to the house which had been assigned for our reception, with the same punctilious accuracy with which he would have delivered a bale of uncustomed goods to a correspondent. I was told a gentleman had expected me for two days—I rushed into the apartment, and, when I expected to embrace my husband—I found myself in the arms of his friend!”

“Yes,” replied Hermione, calmly, though her voice somewhat faltered, “it is the name that best—that well befits him. He, Margaret, for whom I had sacrificed all—whose love and whose memory were dearer to me than my freedom, when I was in the convent—than my life, when I was on my perilous journey—had taken his measures to shake me off, and transfer me, as a privileged wanton, to the protection of his libertine friend. At first the stranger laughed at my tears and my agony, as the hysterical passion of a deluded and overreached wanton, or the wily affection of a courtesan. My claim of marriage he laughed at, assuring me he knew it was a mere farce required by me, and submitted to by his friend, to save some reserve of delicacy; and expressed his surprise that I should consider in any other light a ceremony which could be valid neither in Spain nor England, and insultingly offered to remove my scruples, by renewing such a union with me himself. My exclamations brought Monna Paula to my aid—she was not, indeed, far distant, for she had expected some such scene.”

“No,” answered Hermione, “do her not that injustice. It was her persevering inquiries that discovered the place of my confinement—it was she who gave the information to my husband, and who remarked even then that the news was so much more interesting to his friend than to him, that she suspected, from an early period, it was the purpose of the villain to shake me off. On the journey, her suspicions were confirmed. She had heard him remark to his companion, with a cold sarcastic sneer, the total change which my prison and my illness had made on my complexion; and she had heard the other reply, that the defect might be cured by a touch of Spanish red. This, and other circumstances, having prepared her for such treachery, Monna Paula now entered, completely possessed of herself, and prepared to support me. Her calm representations went farther with the stranger than the expressions of my despair. If he did not entirely believe our tale, he at least acted the part of a man of honour, who would not intrude himself on defenceless females, whatever was their character; desisted from persecuting us with his presence; and not only directed Monna Paula how we should journey to Paris, but furnished her with money for the purpose of our journey. From the capital I wrote to Master Heriot, my father's most trusted correspondent; he came instantly to Paris on receiving the letter; and—— But here comes Monna Paula, with more than the sum you desired. Take it, my dearest maiden—serve this youth if you will. But, O Margaret, look for no gratitude in return!"

The Lady Hermione took the bag of gold from her attendant, and gave it to her young friend, who threw herself into her arms, kissed her on both the pale cheeks, over which the sorrows so newly awakened by her narrative had drawn many tears, then sprung up, wiped her own overflowing eyes, and left the Foljambe apartments with a hasty and resolved step.

CHAPTER XXI.

Rove not from pole to pole—the man lives here
Whose razor's only equal'd by his beer.
And where, in either sense, the cockney put May, if he please, get confounded.

On the sign of an Aitcher left by a Barber.

We are under the necessity of transporting our readers to the habitation of Benjamin Suddlechop, the husband of the active and efficient Dame Ursula, and who also, in his own person, discharged more offices than one. For, besides trimming locks and beards, and turning whiskers upward into the martial and swaggering curl, or downward into the drooping form which became mustaches of civil policy; besides also occasionally letting blood, either by cupping or by the lancet, extracting a stump, and performing other actions of petty pharmacy, very nearly as well as his neighbour Raredrench, the apothecary; he could, on occasion, draw a cup of beer as well as a tooth, tap a hog'shead as well as a vein, and wash, with a draught of good ale, the mustaches which his art had just trimmed. But he carried on these trades apart from each other.

His barber's shop projected its long and mysterious pole into Fleet street, painted party-coloured-wise, to represent the ribbons with which, in older times, that ensign was garnished. In the window were seen rows of teeth displayed upon strings like rosaries—cups with a red rag at the bottom, to resemble blood, an intimation that patients might be bled, cupped, or blistered, with the assistance of "sufficient advice;" while the more profitable, but less honourable operations upon the hair of the head and beard, were briefly and gravely announced. Within was the well-worn leathern chair for customers, the guitar, then called a ghittern or cittern, with which a customer might amuse himself till his predecessor was dismissed from under Benjamin's hands, and which, therefore, often flayed the ears of the patient metaphorically, while his chin sustained from the razor literal scarification. All, therefore, in this department, spoke the chirurgion-barber, or the barber-chirurgion.

But there was a little back-room, used as a private tap-room, which had a separate entrance by a dark and crooked alley, which communicated with Fleet street, after a circuitous passage through several by-lanes and courts. This retired temple of Bacchus had also a connexion with Benjamin's more public shop by a long and narrow entrance, conducting to the secret premises in which a few old toppers used to take their morning draught, and a few gill-sippers their modicum of strong waters, in a bashful way, after having entered the barber's shop under pretence of being shaved. Besides, this obscure tap-room had a separate admission to the apartments of Dame Ursula, which she was believed to make use of in the course of her multifarious practice, both to let herself secretly out, and to admit clients and employers who could not be seen to visit her in public. Accordingly, after the hour of noon, by which time the modest and whetters, who were Benjamin's best customers, had each had his draught, or his thimbleful, the business of the tap was in a manner ended, and the duty of attending the back-door passed from one of the barber's apprentices to the little mulatto girl, the Iris of Dame Suddlechop. Then came mysterious up on mystery; muffled gallants, and masked females in disguises of different fashions, were seen to go through the intricate mazes of the alley; and every low tap on the door, which frequently demanded the attention of the little Creole, had in it something that expressed secrecy and fear of discovery.

It was the evening of the same day when Margaret had held the long conference with the Lady Hermione, that Dame Suddlechop had directed her little person to "keep the door fast as a miser's purse-string, as she valued her saffron skin, to let in none but the name she added in a whisper, and accompanied with a nod. The little domestic blinked intelligently, went to her post, and in brief time thereafter returned and ushered into the presence of the dame, that city-gallant whose clothes sat awkwardly upon him, and who had behaved so doughtily in the fray that befell at Nigel's first visit to Beaujeu's ordinary. The mulatto introduced him—"Missis, fine young man, all over gold and velvet"—then muttered to herself as she shut the door, "fine young gentleman—apprentice to him who makes the tick-tick."

It was indeed—we are sorry to say it, and trust readers will sympathize with the interest we feel in the matter—it was indeed honest Jin Vin, who had been so far left to his own devices, and abandoned to his better angel, as occasionally to travesty himself in this fashion, and to visit, in the dress of a rake of the day, those places of pleasure and dissipation which it would have been everlasting discredit to have been seen in his real character and condition; that is, had it been possible for him in his present state to have gained admission. There was now a gloom on his brow, his rich habit was hastily put on and buttoned awry; his belt buckled in a most disorderly fashion, so that his sword stuck outwards from his side, instead of hanging by it with graceful elegance; while his poniard, though fairly hatched and gilded, stuck in his girdle like a butcher's steelyard, and told of his blue apron. Persons of fashion had by this way, the advantage formerly of being better distinguished from the vulgar than at present; for, as the ancient farthingale and more modern hoop were to court ladies, the sword was to the gentleman, an article of dress, which only renounced those who assumed it for the nonce, without being a habit of wearing it. Vincent's rapier got between his legs, and, as he stumbled over it, he exclaimed—"Zounds! 'tis the second time it has served me this day. I believe the damned trinket knows I am no true gentleman, and does it of set purpose."

"Come, come, mine honest Jin Vin—come, my good boy," said the dame, in a soothing tone, "and mind these trankums—a frank and hearty London apprentice is worth all the gallants of the inn of court."

"I was a frank and hearty London apprentice before I knew you, Dame Suddlechop," said Vincent; "and your advice has made me, you may find a name for me since, fore George! I am ashamed to think about myself."

"A-well-a-day," quoth the dame, "and is it even with thee?—nay, then, I know but one cure; and with that, going to a little corner cupboard of carved wainscoat, she opened it by the assistance of a key which, with half-a-dozen besides, hung in a silver chain at her girdle, and produced a long flask of the glass cased with wicker, bringing forth at the same time two Flemish runner glasses, with long stalks and capacious wombs. She filled the one brimful for her guest, and the other more modestly to about two s of its capacity, for her own use, repeating, as if her cordial trickled forth in a smooth oily stream—right Rosa Solis, as ever washed mulligrubs out of every body's brain!"

But, though Jin Vin tossed off his glass without pause, while the lady sipped hers more moderately, it did not appear to produce the expected amendment in his humour. On the contrary, as he threw himself into the great leathern chair, in which Dame Ursley was wont to solace herself of an evening, he declared himself "the most miserable dog within the door of Bow-bell."

"And why should you be so idle as to think yourself a silly boy?" said Dame Suddlechop; "but 'tis you thus—fools and children never know when they are well. Why, there is not one that walks in Paul's, whether in flat cap, or hat and feather, has so many kind glances from the wenches as when ye swagger along Fleet street with your arm under your arm, and your cap set aside upon your head."

"Thou knowest well, that, from Mrs. Deputy's down to the waistcoaters in the alley, all of them wiring and peeping betwixt their fingers when thou pass; and yet you call yourself a miserable dog! I must tell you all this over and over again, as if I were whistling the chimes of London to a pettish fellow, in order to bring the pretty baby into good-humour!"

The flattery of Dame Ursula seemed to have the effect of her cordial—it was swallowed, indeed, by the man to whom she presented it, and that with some degree of relish, but it did not operate as a sedative on the disturbed state of the youth's mind. He laughed a moment, half in scorn, and half in gratified vanity, but cast a sullen look on Dame Ursley as he repeated her last words.

"You do treat me like a child indeed, when you sing and over to me a cuckoo song that I care not a jot for filing for."

"Ha!" said Dame Ursley; "that is to say, you care for nothing you please all, unless you please one—You are a lover, I warrant, and care not for all the city, here to Whitechapel, so you could write yourself in your pretty Peg-a-Ramsay's good-will. Well, take patience, man, and be guided by me, for I believe the hoop will bind you together at last."

"It is time you were so," said Jenkin, "for hitherto I have rather been the wedge to separate us."

Dame Suddlechop had by this time finished her glass—it was not the first she had taken that day; though a woman of strong brain, and cautious abstemious, if not abstemious, in her potations, it may be supposed that her patience was not tried by the regimen which she observed.

"Why, thou ungracious and ingrate knave," said Dame Ursley, "have not I done every thing to put thee in thy mistress's good graces? She loves gentry, and old Scottish minx, as a Welshman loves cheese, as her father's descent from that Duke of Dalrymple, or whatsoever she calls him, as close in her purse as gold in a miser's chest, though she as seldom uses it—and none she will think of, or have, but a gentleman—and a gentleman I have made of thee, in, the devil cannot deny that."

"You have made a fool of me," said poor Jenkin, scratching at the sleeve of his jacket.

"Ever the worse gentleman for that," said Dame Ursley, laughing.

"And what is worse," said he, turning his back to her suddenly, and writhing in his chair, "you have made a rogue of me."

"Ever the worse gentleman for that neither," said Dame Ursley in the same tone; "let a man bear his folly and his knavery stoutly, and let me see if my honesty will look him in the face now-a-days."

"Tut, man, it was only in the time of King Arthur and King Lud, that a gentleman was held to bleed his scutcheon by a leap over the line of reason and honesty—It is the bold look, the ready hand, the ready oaths, the brisk oath, and the wild brain, that is the gallant now-a-days."

"I know what you have made me," said Jin Vin; "I have given up skittles and trap-ball for ten-d bowls, good English ale for thin Bourdeaux and sour Rhenish, roast-beef and pudding for wood-cocks and kickshaws—my bat for a sword, my cap for a beaver, my forsooth for a modish oath, my Christmas-box for a dice-box, my religion for the devil's matins, and mine honest name for—Woman, I could brain thee, when I think whose advice has guided me in all this!"

"Whose advice, then? whose advice, then? Speak out, thou poor, petty cloak-brusher, and say who advised thee?" retorted Dame Ursley, flushed and indignant—"Marry come up, my paltry companion—say by whose advice you have made a gamester of yourself, and a thief besides, as your words would bear—The Lord deliver us from evil!" And here Dame Ursley devoutly crossed herself.

"Hark ye, Dame Ursley Suddlechop," said Jenkin, starting up, his dark eyes flashing with anger; "remember I am none of your husband—and, if I were, you would do well not to forget whose threshold was swept when they last rode the Skimmington* upon such another scolding jade as yourself."

"I hope to see you ride up Holborn next," said Dame Ursley, provoked out of all her holyday and sugar-plum expressions, "with a nosegay at your breast, and a parson at your elbow!"

"That may well be," answered Jin Vin, bitterly, "if I walk by your counsels as I have begun by them; but, before that day comes, you shall know that Jin Vin has the brisk boys of Fleet street still at his wink.—Yes, you jade, you shall be carted for bawd and conjurer, double-dyed in grain, and bing off to Bridewell, with every brass basin betwixt the Bar and Paul's beating before you, as if the devil were banging them with his beef-hook."

Dame Ursley coloured like scarlet, seized upon the half-emptied flask of cordial, and seemed, by her first gesture, about to hurl it at the head of her adversary; but suddenly, and as if by a strong internal effort, she checked her outrageous resentment, and, putting the bottle to its more legitimate use, filled, with wonderful composure, the two glasses, and, taking up one of them, said, with a smile, which better became her comely and jovial countenance than the fury by which it was animated the moment before—

"Here is to thee, Jin Vin, my lad, in all loving kindness, whatever spite thou bearest to me, that have always been a mother to thee."

Jenkin's English good-nature could not resist this forcible appeal; he took up the other glass, and lovingly pledged the dame in her cup of reconciliation, and proceeded to make a kind of grumbling apology for his own violence—

"For you know," he said, "it was you persuaded me to get these fine things, and go to that godless ordinary, and ruffle it with the best, and bring you home all the news; and you said, I, that was the cock of the ward, would soon be the cock of the ordinary, and would win ten times as much at gleek and primero, as I used to do at put and beggar-my-neighbour—and turn up doublets with the dice, as busily as I was wont to trowl down the ninepins in the skittle-ground—and then you said I should bring you such news out of the ordinary as should make us all, when used as you knew how to use it—and now you see what is to come of it all!"

"'Tis all true thou sayest, lad," said the dame; "but thou must have patience. Rome was not built in a day—you cannot become used to your court-suit in a month's time, any more than when you changed your long coat for a doublet and hose; and in gaming you must expect to lose as well as gain—'tis the sitting gamester that sweeps the board."

"The board has swept me, I know," replied Jin

* A species of triumphal procession in honour of female supremacy, when it rose to such a height as to attract the attention of the neighbourhood. It is described at full length in Hudibras, (Part II. Canto II.) As the procession passed on, those who attended it in an official capacity were wont to sweep the threshold of the houses in which Fame affirmed the mistresses to exercise paramount authority, which was given and received as a hint that their inmates might, in their turn, be made the subject of a similar ovation. The Skimmington, which in some degree resembled the proceedings of Mumbo Jumbo in an African village, has been long discontinued in England, apparently because female rule has become either milder or less frequent than among our ancestors.

Vin, "and that pretty clean out.—I would that were the worst; but I owe for all this finery, and settling-day is coming on, and my master will find my account worse than it should be by a score of pieces.—My old father will be called in to make them good; and I—may save the hangman a labour and do the job myself, or go the Virginia voyage."

"Do not speak so loud, my dear boy," said Dame Ursley; "but tell me why you borrow not from a friend to make up your arrears. You could lend him as much when his settling-day came round."

"No, no—I have had enough of that work," said Vincent. "Tunstall would lend me the money, poor fellow, as he had it; but his gentle, beggarly kindred, plunder him of all, and keep him as bare as a birch at Christmas. No—my fortune may be spelt in four letters, and these read, work."

"Now hush, you simple craven," said the dame; "did you never hear, that when the need is highest the help is nighest? We may find aid for you yet, and sooner than you are aware of. I am sure I would never have advised you to such a course, but only you had set heart and eye on pretty Mistress Marget, and less would not serve you—and what could I do but advise you to cast your city-sloUGH, and try your luck where folks find fortune?"

"Ay, ay I remember your counsel well," said Jenkin; "I was to be introduced to her by you when I was perfect in my gallantries, and as rich as the King; and then she was to be surprised to find I was poor Jim Vin, that used to watch, from morn to curfew, for one glance of her eye; and now, instead of that, she has set her soul on this Scottish sparrow-hawk of a lord that won my last tester, and be cursed to him, and so I am bankrupt in love, fortune, and character, before I am out of my time, and all along of you, Mother Midnight."

"Do not call me out of my own name, my dear boy, Jim Vin," answered Ursula, in a tone betwixt rage and coaxing. "do not; because I am no saint, but a poor sinful woman, with no more patience than she needs, to carry her through a thousand crosses. And if I have done you wrong by evil counsel, I must mend it, and put you right by good advice. And for the score of pieces that must be made up at settling-day, why, here is, in a good green purse, as much as will make that matter good; and we will get old Crosspatch, the tailor, to take a long day for your clothes; and"—

"Mother, are you serious?" said Jim Vin, unable to trust either his eyes or his ears.

"In truth am I," said the dame; "and will you call me Mother Midnight now, Jim Vin?"

"Mother Midnight!" exclaimed Jenkin, hugging the dame in his transport, and bestowing on her still comely cheek a hearty and not unacceptable smack, that sounded like the report of a pistol.—"Mother Midday, rather, that has need to light me out of my troubles—a mother more dear than she who bore me; for she, poor soul, only brought me into a world of sin and sorrow, and your timely aid has helped me out of the one and the other." And the good-natured fellow threw himself back in his chair, and fairly drew his hand across his eyes.

"You would not have me be made to ride the Skimmington then," said the dame, "or parade me in a cart, with all the brass basins of the ward beating the march to Bridewell before me?"

"I would sooner be carted to Tyburn myself," replied the penitent.

"Why, then, sit up like a man, and wipe thine eyes; and, if thou art pleased with what I have done, I will show thee how thou mayest requite me in the highest degree."

"How?" said Jenkin Vincent, sitting straight up in his chair—"You would have me, then, do you some service for this friendship of yours?"

"Ay, marry would I," said Dame Ursley; "for you are to know, that though I am right glad to stead you with it, this gold is not mine, but was placed in my hands in order to find a trusty agent for a certain purpose, and so—But what's the matter with you?—are you fool enough to be angry because you cannot get a purse of gold for nothing? amongst them, I must needs risk the last five pieces with that shark among the minnows!"

"Granted," said Dame Ursula. "All this I know; and I own, that as Lord Glenvarloch was the last you played with, you have a right to charge your ruin on his head. Moreover, I admit, as already said, that Margaret has made him your rival. Yet surely, now he is in danger to lose his hand, it is not a time to remember all this?"

"By my faith, but it is, though," said the young citizen. "Lose his hand, indeed? They may take his head, for what I care. Head and hand have made me a miserable wretch!"

"Now, were it not better, my prince of flat-caps," said Dame Ursula, "that matters were squared between you; and that, through means of the same Scottish lord, who has, as you say, deprived you of your money and your mistress, you should in a short time recover both?"

"And how can your wisdom come to that conclusion, dame?" said the apprentice. "My money, indeed, I can conceive—that is, if I comply with your proposal; but—my pretty Margaret!—how serving this lord, whom she has set her nonsensical head upon, can do me good with her, is far beyond my conception."

"That is because, in simple phrase," said Dame Ursula, "thou knowest no more of a woman's heart than doth a Norfolk gosling. Look you, man. Were I to report to Mistress Marget that the young lord has miscarried through thy lack of courtesy in refusing to help him, why, then, thou wert odious to her for ever. She will loathe thee as she will loathe the very cook who is to strike off Glenvarloch's hand with his cleaver—and then she will be yet more fixed in her affections towards this lord. London will hear of nothing but him—speak of nothing but him—think of nothing but him, for three weeks at least, and all that outcry will serve to keep him uppermost in her mind; for nothing pleases a girl so much as to bear relation to any one who is the talk of the whole world around her. Then, if he suffer this sentence of the law, it is a chance if she ever forgets him. I saw that handsome, proper young gentleman, Babington, suffer in the Queen's time myself, and though I was then but a girl, he was in my head for a year after he was hanged. But, above all, pardoned or punished, Glenvarloch will probably remain in London, and his presence will keep up the silly girl's nonsensical fancy about him. Whereas, if he escapes"—

"Ay, show me how that is to avail me?" said Jenkin.

"If he escapes," said the dame, resuming her argument, "he must resign the Court for years, if not for life; and you know the old saying, 'out of sight, and out of mind.'"

"True—most true," said Jenkin; "spoken like an oracle, most wise Ursula."

"Ay, ay, I knew you would hear reason at last," said the wily dame; "and then, when this same lord is off and away for once and for ever, who, I pray you, is to be pretty pet's confidential person, and who is to fill up the void in her affections?—why, who but thou, thou pearl of 'prentices! And then you will have overcome your own inclinations to comply with hers, and every woman is sensible of that—and you will have run some risk, too, in carrying her desires into effect—and what is it that woman likes better than bravery, and devotion to her will? Then you have her secret, and she must treat you with favour and observance, and repose confidence in you, and hold private intercourse with you, till she weeps with one eye for the absent lover whom she is never to see again, and blinks with the other blithely upon him who is in presence; and then if you know not how to improve the relation in which you stand with her, you are not the brisk lively lad that all the world takes you for—Said I well?"

"You have spoken like an empress, most mighty Ursula," said Jenkin Vincent; "and your will shall be obeyed."

"You know Alsatia well?" continued his tutoress.

"Well enough, well enough," replied he, with a nod; "I have heard the dice rattle there in my day, before I must set up for gentleman, and go among the gallants at the Shavaleer Bojo's, as they call him,—the worse rookery of the two, though the feathers are the gayest."

"And they will have a respect for thee yonder, I warrant?"

"Ay, ay," replied Vin, "when I am got into my fustian doublet again, with my bit of a trunion under my arm, I can walk Alsatia at midnight as I could do that there Fleet street in midday—they will not one of them swagger with the prince of 'prentices, and the king of clubs—they know I could bring every tall boy in the ward down upon them."

"And you know all the watermen, and so forth?"

"Can converse with every sculler in his own language, from Richmond to Gravesend, and know all the water-cocks, from John Taylor the Poet to little Grigg the Grinner, who never pulls but he shows all his teeth from ear to ear, as if he were grimacing through a horse-collar."

"And you can take any dress or character upon you well, such as a waterman's, a butcher's, a foot-soldier's," continued Ursula, "or the like?"

"Not such a mummer as I am within the walls, and thou knowest that well enough, dame," replied the apprentice. "I can touch the players themselves, at the Ball and at the Fortune, for presenting any thing except a gentleman. Take but this d—d skin of frippery off me, which I think the devil stuck me into, and you shall put me into nothing else that I will not become as if I were born to it."

"Well, we will talk of your transmutation by and by," said the dame, "and find you clothes withal, and money besides; for it will take a good deal to carry the thing handsomely through."

"But where is that money to come from, dame?" said Jenkin; "there is a question I would fain have answered before I touch it."

"Why, what a fool art thou to ask such a question! Suppose I am content to advance it to please young madam, what is the harm then?"

"I will suppose no such thing," said Jenkin hastily; "I know that you, dame, have no gold to spare, and maybe would not spare it if you had—so that cock will not crow. It must be from Margaret herself."

"Well, thou suspicious animal, and what if it were?" said Ursula.

"Only this," replied Jenkin, "that I will presently to her, and learn if she has come fairly by so much ready money; for sooner than connive at her getting it by any indirection, I would hang myself at once. It is enough what I have done myself, no need to engage poor Margaret in such villany—I'll to her, and tell her of the danger—I will, by Heaven!"

"You are mad to think of it," said Dame Suddlechop, considerably alarmed—"hear me but a moment. I know not precisely from whom she got the money; but sure I am that she obtained it at her godfather's."

"Why, Master George Heriot is not returned from France," said Jenkin.

"No," replied Ursula, "but dame Judith is at home—and the strange lady, whom they call Master Heriot's ghost—she never goes abroad."

"It is very true, Dame Suddlechop," said Jenkin; "and I believe you have guessed right—they say that lady has coin at will; and if Margaret can get a handful of fairy-gold, why, she is free to throw it away at will."

"Ah, Jin Vin," said the dame, reducing her voice almost to a whisper, "we should not want gold at will neither, could we but read the riddle of that lady!"

"They may read it that list," said Jenkin, "I'll never pry into what concerns me not—Master George Heriot is a worthy and brave citizen, and an honour to London, and has a right to manage his own household as he likes best.—There was once a talk of rabbling him the fifth of November before the last, because they said he kept a nunnery in his house, like old Lady Foljambe; but Master George is well loved among the 'prentices, and we got so many brisk boys of us together, as should have rabbled the rabble, had they had but the heart to rise."

"Well, let that pass," said Ursula; "and now, tell me how you will manage to be absent from shop a day or two, for you must think that this matter will not be ended sooner."

"Why, as to that, I can say nothing," said Jenkin, "I have always served duly and truly; I have no heart to play truant, and cheat my master of his time as well as his money."

"Nay, but the point is to get back his money for him," said Ursula, "which he is not likely to see on other conditions. Could you not ask leave to go down to your uncle in Essex for two or three days? He may be ill, you know."

"Why, if I must, I must," said Jenkin, with a heavy sigh; "but I will not be lightly caught treading these dark and crooked paths again."

"Hush thee, then," said the dame, "and get leave for this very evening; and come back hither, and I will introduce you to another implemēt, who must be employed in the matter.—Stay, stay!—the lad is amazed—you would not go into your master's shop in that guise, surely? Your trunk is in the matted chamber with your 'prentice things—go and put them on as fast as you can."

"I think I am bewitched," said Jenkin, giving a glance towards his dress, "or that these fool's trappings have made as great an ass of me as of many I have seen wear them; but let me once be rid of the harness, and if you catch me putting it on again, I will give you leave to sell me to a gipsy, to carry pots, pans, and beggar's bantlings, all the rest of my life."

So saying, he retired to change his apparel.

CHAPTER XXII.

Chance will not do the work—Chance sends the breeze;
But if the pilot slumber at the helm,
The very wind that wafts us towards the port May dash us on the shelves.—The steersman's part is vigilance,
Blow it or rough or smooth.—Old Play.

We left Nigel, whose fortunes we are bound to trace by the engagement contracted in our title-page, sad and solitary in the mansion of Trapbois the usurer, having just received a letter instead of a visit from his friend the Templar, stating reasons why he could not at that time come to see him in Alsatia. So that it appeared his intercourse with the better and more respectable class of society, was, for the present, entirely cut off. This was a melancholy, and, to a proud mind like that of Nigel, a degrading reflection.

He went to the window of his apartment, and found the street enveloped in one of those thick, dingy, yellow-coloured fogs, which often invest the lower part of London and Westminster. Amid the darkness, dense and palpable, were seen to wander like phantoms a reveller or two, whom the morning had surprised where the evening left them; and who now, with tottering steps, and by an instinct which intoxication could not wholly overcome, were groping the way to their own homes, to convert day into night, for the purpose of sleeping off the debauch which had turned night into day. Although it was broad day in the other parts of the city, it was scarce dawn yet in Alsatia; and none of the sounds of industry or occupation were there heard, which had long before aroused the slumberers in every other quarter. The prospect was too tiresome and disagreeable to detain Lord Glenvarloch at his station, so, turning from the window, he examined with more interest the furniture and appearance of the apartment which he tenanted.

Much of it had been in its time rich and curious—there was a huge four-post bed, with as much carved oak about it as would have made the head of a man-of-war, and tapestry hangings ample enough to have been her sails. There was a huge mirror with a massy frame of gilt brass-work, which was of Venetian manufacture, and must have been worth a considerable sum before it received the tremendous crack, which, traversing it from one corner to the other, bore the same proportion to the surface that the Nile bears to the map of Egypt. The chairs were of different forms and shapes, some had been carved, some gilded, some covered with damasked leather, some with embroidered work, but all were damaged and worm-eaten.

There was a picture of Susanna and the Elders, the chimney-piece, which might have been a choice piece, had not the rats made free with the chaste fair one's nose, and with the beard of her reverend admirers.

In a word, all that Lord Glenvarloch saw to have been articles carried off by appraisers, or bought as pennyworths at some broker's, and huddled together in the apartmēt in a sale-room, without regard to taste or cost.

The place appeared to Nigel to resemble the interior of a warehouse near the sea-coast, which are too often furnished with the spoils of wrecked vessels, as this was fitted up with the relics of ruined profligates, and the own skill is among the breakers," thought Lord Glenvarloch, "though my wreck will add little to the profits of the spoiler."

He was chiefly interested in the state of the huge assemblage of rusted iron bars which supported the chimney, unequally supported by three feet, moulded into the form of lion's claws, the fourth, which had been bent by an accident, proudly uplifted as if to paw the ground; and a whole article had nourished the ambitious gipsy, pacing forth into the middle of the apartmēt, had one foot ready raised for the journey. This passed over Nigel's face as this fantastic idea came into his fancy.—"I must stop it somehow," he thought; "for this morning is chill enough to demand some fire."

He called accordingly from the top of a staircase, with a heavy oaken balustrade, which gave access to his own and other apartments, for it was old and of considerable size; but, in answer to his repeated summons, he was told to go in search of some one who might accommodate him with what he wanted.

Nigel had, according to the fashion of the time in Scotland, received an education which, in most particulars, he termed simple, hardy, and unpretentious; but he had, nevertheless, been accustomed to much personal deference, and to the attendance and ministry of one or more domestics. This was the universal custom in Scotland, where wages were next to nothing, and where, a man of title or influence might have as many servants as he pleased, for the mere expense of clothes, and countenance. Nigel was therefore surprised and displeased when he found himself without notice or attendance; and the more dissatisfied, because he was at the same time angry with himself for suffering such a trifle to trouble him at all, in matters of more deep concernment. "There must be some servants in so large a house," said he, as he wandered over the place, through the gallery. As he went on, he tried the doors to several apartments, some of which he found locked and others unfurnished, all apparently empty; so that at length he returned to the main hall, and resolved to make his way down to the kitchen of the house, where he supposed he must at last find the old gentleman, and his ill-favoured daughter. With this purpose he first made his entrance into a little low, dark parlour, containing a well-worn easy chair, before which stood a pair of tables. On the left side rested a crutch-handled desk clamped with iron, and a massive pedestal. Around the apartment were shelves, and other places convenient for depositing pistols, sword, musketoon, and a pair of pistols, in the chimney, in ostentatious display, as if to show that the proprietor would be prompt in the defence of his premises.

"This must be the usurer's den," thought Nigel, and he was about to call aloud, when the door, awakened even by the slightest noise, for as yet he slept sound, soon was heard from the room, speaking in a voice of irritability, rendered tremulous by his morning cough.

"Ugh, ugh, ugh—who is there? I say—who is there? Why, Martha!—ugh, ugh—Trapbois—here be thieves in the house, and not speak to me—say, Martha!—thieves, thieves—ugh, ugh, ugh!”

Nigel endeavoured to explain, but the idea of thieves had taken possession of the old man's general mind, and he kept coughing and screaming, and screaming and coughing, until the gracious Martha entered the apartment, and, having first outwitted her father in order to convince him that there was no danger and to assure him that the intruder was their new lodger, and having as often heard her sister exclaim—“Hold him fast—ugh, ugh—hold him fast till I come,” she at length succeeded in silencing his fears and his clamours, and then coldly and dryly asked Lord Glenvarloch what he wanted in her father's apartment.

Her lodger had, in the meantime, leisure to contemplate her appearance, which did not by any means improve the idea he had formed of it by candlelight on the preceding evening. She was dressed in what was called a Queen Mary's ruff and farthingale, not the failing ruff in which the unfortunate Mary of Scotland is usually painted, but that which, with more than Spanish stiffness, surrounded the throat, and set off the mother head, of her fierce ancestors, of Southland memory. This antiquated dress accorded well with the faded complexion, grey eyes, thin lips, and austere range of the antipathetic features, which was moreover enhanced by a black hood, worn as her head-gear, carefully disposed so as to prevent any of her hair from escaping to view, probably because the simplicity of the period knew no art of disguising the colour with which time had begun to grizzle her tresses. Her figure was tall, thin, and flat, with shabby arms and hands, and feet of the larger size, clad in huge high-heeled shoes, which added height to a stature already ungainly. Apparently money art had been used by the tailor, to conceal a slight defect of shape occasioned by the accidental elevation of one shoulder above the other, but the praiseworthy efforts of the ingenious mechanic had only succeeded in calling the attention of the observer to his benevolent purpose without demonstrating that he had been able to achieve it.

Such was Mrs. Martha Traquair, whose dry “What were you seeking here, sir?” (all again, and with reiterated sharpness, on the ear of Nigel, as he gazed upon her presence and compared it mentally to one of the faded and grey figures in the old tapestry which adorned his balcony. It was, however, necessary to reply, and he answered, that he came in search of the servants, as he desired to have a fire kindled in his apartment on account of the rawness of the morning.

“The woman who does our char work,” answered Mistress Martha, “comes at eight o'clock—if you want fire sooner, there are fagots and a bucket of sea-coal in the stone-chest at the head of the stair—and here is a flint and steel on the upper shelf—you can light fire for yourself if you will.”

“No—no—no, Martha,” ejaculated her father, who, having donned his rusty tunic with his hands all on fire, and his feet shod, hastily came out of the inner apartment, with his mind probably full of robbery, for he had a naked rapier in his hand, which still looked formidable though rust had somewhat marred its shine.—What he had heard at entrance about lighting a fire, had changed, however, the current of his ideas. No—no—no, he cried, and each negation was more emphatic than its predecessor—

“The gentleman shall not have the trouble to put on a fire—ugh—ugh. I'll put it on myself, for a consideration.”

This last word was a favourite expression with the old gentleman, which he pronounced in a peculiar manner, gasping it out syllable by syllable, and laying a strong emphasis upon the last. It was indeed a sort of protecting clause, by which he guarded himself against all inconveniences attendant on the rash habit of offering services or civility of any kind, the which, when hastily snatched at by those to whom they are offered, give the profferer sometimes reason to repent his promptitude.

“For shame, father,” said Martha, “that must not be. Master Graham will handle his own fire, or wait all the char-woman comes to do it for him, just as likes him best.”

“No, child—no, child. Child Martha, no,” returned the old man, “no, that woman shall ever touch a grate in my house, they put ugh ugh—the fagot spout, that is the real kitchen fuel, and the flames put up the chimney, and wind and heat are both thrown away. No! I will do it properly for the gentleman, for a consideration, so that it shall last—ugh, ugh—last the winter.” Here his vehemence increased his voice, and he said that Nigel could say from a real man's heart, that he comprehended that it was a reasonable thing, his daughter to reprove the father and things that the stranger's fire, with an assurance, that, when necessary, his landlord would be in attendance to adjust it himself, for a consideration.”

Martha paid as little attention to the old man's injunctions as a predominant dame gives to those of a peevish husband. She only repeated, in a deeper and more emphatic tone of censure, “For shame, father, for shame!” then turning to her guest, said, with her usual ungraciousness of manner, “Master Graham—it is best to be plain with you at first. My father is an old, a very old man, and his wife, as you may see, are somewhat weakened, though I would not advise you to make a bargain with him, else you may find them too sharp for your own. For myself, I am a lone woman, and, to say truth, care little to be or converse with any one. If you can be satisfied with home-room, shelter, and safety, it will be your own fault if you have them not, and they are not always to be found in this unhappy quarter. But if you seek deferential observance and attendance, I tell you at once you will not find them here.”

“I am not wont either to thrust myself upon acquaintance, madam, or to give trouble,” said the guest; “nevertheless, I shall need the assistance of a domestic to assist me to dress—Perhaps you can recommend me to such?”

“Yes, to twenty,” answered Mistress Martha, “who will pick your purse while they tie your points, and cut your throat while they smooth your pillow.”

“I will be his servant myself,” said the old man, whose intellect, for a moment distanced, had again, in some measure got up with the conversation. “I will brush his cravat, ugh, ugh, and tie his points—ugh, ugh, and clean his shoes—ugh—and run on his errands with speed and safety—ugh, ugh, ugh, ugh—for a consideration.”

“Good-morrow to you, sir,” said Martha, to Nigel, in a tone of desert and positive dismissal. “It cannot be agreeable to a daughter that a stranger should hear her father speak thus. If you be really a gentleman, you will return to your own apartment.”

“I will not delay a moment,” said Nigel, respectfully, for he was sensible that circumstances palliated the woman's rudeness. “I would but ask you, if seriously there can be danger in procuring the assistance of a serving man in this place?”

“Young gentleman,” said Martha, “you must know little of Wanderside to ask the question. We live alone in this house, and seldom has a stranger entered it; nor should you, to be plain, had my will been consulted. Look at the door—see if that of a castle can be better secured, the windows of the first floor are grated on the outside, and within, look to those shutters.”

She pulled one of them aside, and showed a ponderous apparatus of bolts and chains for securing the window-shutters, while her father, pressing to her side, seized her gown with a trembling hand, and said, in a low whisper, “Show not the trick of locking and undoing them. Show him not the work on t, Martha—ugh, ugh—on no consideration.” Martha went on, without paying him any attention.

“And yet, young gentleman, we have been more than once like to find all those defences too weak to protect our lives, such an odd effect on the wild generation around us hath been made by the unhappy report of my poor father's wealth.”

“Say nothing of that household,” said the man, his irritability increased by the very supposition of his being wealthy—“Say nothing of that, or I will beat lad, even before hearing of a reason which promptly demanded that he should surrender adopted the resolution to do so, as the man most proper course which his ill fortune and he had left in his own power. He therefore Mr. Lowestoffe to have no delicacy upon this, since his surrender was what he had deemed as a sacrifice due to his own character, could have the frankness to mention in what it could be best arranged, so as to extricate Lowestoffe, from the restraint to which the writer—not but fear his friend had been subjected, out of the generous interest which he had taken in concerns. The letter concluded, that the old suffer twenty-four hours to elapse in expectation of hearing from him, and, at the end of which, was determined to put his purpose in execution. He delivered the billet to the messenger, and, with his request with a piece of money, urged without a moment's delay, to convey it to the Master Lowestoffe.

"I will carry it to him myself," said the old man, for half the consideration."

The man who heard this attempt to take his duty as it sits over his head, lost no time in pocketing the money, and departed on his errand as fast as his legs would carry him.

"Trapbois," said Nigel, addressing the old man somewhat impatiently, "had you any particular business for me?"

"I came to see if you rested well," answered the old man; "and—if I could do any thing to serve your consideration."

"Thank you," said Lord Glenvarloch—"I am well," and, ere he could say more, a heavy door was heard on the stair.

"God!" exclaimed the old man, starting up—"Dorothy—char-woman—why, daughter—why, I say, housewives—the door hath been left open."

The door of the chamber opened wide, and in strutting bulk of the military hero whom Nigel had seen the preceding evening in vain endeavoured to we had a carouse to your honour—we heard but ring hollow ere we parted; we were as loving as inkle-weavers—we fought, too, to finish off the gawdy. I bear some marks of the parson about me, you see—a note of the sermon or so, which should have been addressed to my ear, but missed its mark, and reached my left eye. The man of God bears my sign-manual too, but the Duke made us friends again, and it cost me more sack than I could carry, and all the Rhinish to boot, to pledge the seer in the way of love and reconciliation—But, Caracco! 'tis a vile old canting slave for all that, whom I will one day beat out of his devil's livery into all the colours of the rainbow. Basta!—Said I well, old Trapbois? Where is thy daughter, man?—what says she to my suit?—'tis an honest one—wilt have a soldier for thy son-in-law, old Pillory, to mingle the soul of martial honour with thy thieving, nitching, petty-larceny blood, as men put bold brandy into muddy ale?"

"My daughter receives not company so early, noble captain," said the usurer, and concluded his speech with a dry, emphatical "ugh, ugh."

"What, upon no con-si-de-ra-ti-on?" said the captain; "and wherefore not, old Truepenny? she has not much time to lose in driving her bargain, methinks."

"Captain," said Trapbois, "I was upon some little business with our noble friend here, Master Nigel Green—ugh, ugh, ugh"—

"And you would have me gone, I warrant you?" answered the bully; "but patience, old Pillory, thine hour is not yet come, man—You see," he said, pointing to the casket, "that noble Master Grahame, whom you call Green, has got the decuses and the smelts."

"Which you would willingly rid him of, ha! ha!—ugh, ugh," answered the usurer, "If you knew how—but, lack-a-day! thou art one of those that come out for wool, and art sure to go home shorn. Why now, but that I am sworn against laying of wagers, I would risk some consideration that this honest guest of mine sends thee home pennyless, if thou darrest venture with him—ugh, ugh—at any game which gentlemen play at."

"Marry, thou hast me on the hip there, thou old miserly cony-catcher!" answered the captain, taking a bale of dice from the sleeve of his coat; "I must always keep company with these damnable doctors, and they have made me every baby's cully, and purged my purse into an atrophy; but never mind, it passes the time as well as aught else—How say you, Master Grahame?"

The fellow paused; but even the extremity of his impudence could hardly withstand the cold look of utter contempt with which Nigel received his proposal, returning it with a simple, "I only play where I know my company, and never in the morning."

"Cards may be more agreeable," said Captain Colepepper; "and, for knowing your company, here is honest old Pillory will tell you Jack Colepepper plays as truly on the square as e'er a man that trowled a die—Men talk of high and low dice, Fulhams and bristles, topping, knapping, slurring, stabbing, and a hundred ways of rooking besides; but broil me like a rasher of bacon, if I could ever learn the trick on 'em!"

"You have got the vocabulary perfect, sir, at the least," said Nigel, in the same cold tone.

"Yes, by mine honour have I," returned the Hector; "they are phrases that a gentleman learns about town.—But perhaps you would like a set at tennis, or a game at Balloon—we have an indifferent good court hard by here, and a set of as gentlemanlike blades as ever banged leather against brick and mortar."

"I beg to be excused at present," said Lord Glenvarloch; "and to be plain, among the valuable privileges your society has conferred on me, I hope I may reckon that of being private in my own apartment when I have a mind."

"Your humble servant, sir," said the captain; "and I thank you for your civility—Jack Colepepper can have enough of company, and thrusts himself on no one.—But perhaps you will like to make a match at skittles?"

"I am by no means that way disposed," replied the young nobleman.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Buckler. Bilboa's the word—

It hath been spoke too often,
It hath lost its charm—I tell thee, friend,
Anest cur that trots the street, will turn,
And against your proffer'd bastinado.

Buckler. 'Tis art shall do it, then—I will dose
The mongrels—

In plain terms, I'll use the private knife

able Captain Colepepper or Peppercull, for known by both these names, and some others, had a martial and a swashing exterior, which, on the present occasion, was rendered yet more peculiar by a patch covering his left eye and a part of his cheek. The sleeves of his thickset velvet jerkin were polished and shone with grease,—his buff and huge tops, which reached almost to the knees, were of the same materials extended breadth from the haunch-bone to his small arms, supported on the one side his large black-knive sword, on the other a dagger of like proportions.

He paid his compliments to Nigel with a predetermined effrontery, which announced that he would not be repelled by any coldness of reserve. He asked Trapbois how he did, by the familiar name of Peter Pillory, and then, seizing upon the opportunity, emptied it off at a draught, to the health of the old man and youngest freeman of Alsatia, the now living Master Nigel Grahame.

He had set down the empty pitcher and, with a deep breath, he began to criticise the liquor that lately contained it.—"Sufficient single malt for a Pillory—and, as I take it, brewed at the rate of a bell of malt to a butt of Thames—as dead as a door-nail, and yet it went hissing down my throat, by Jove, like water upon hot iron.—You are a noble man, noble Master Grahame, but, good faith,

"Or to leap a flea—run a snail—match a wherry, eh?"

"No—I will do none of these," answered Nigel.

Here the old man, who had been watching with his little peery eyes, pulled the bulky Hector by the skirt, and whispered, "Do not vapour him the huff, it will not pass—let the trout play, he will rise to the hook presently."

But the bully, confiding in his own strength, and probably mistaking for timidity the patient scorn with which Nigel received his proposals, incited also by the open casket, began to assume a louder and more threatening tone. He drew himself up, bent his brows, assumed a look of professional ferocity, and continued, "In Alsatia, look ye, a man must be neighbourly and companionable. Zouns! sir, we would slit any nose that was turned up at us honest fellows.—Ay, sir, we would slit it up to the gristle, though it had smelt nothing all its life but musk, ambergins, and court-scented water.—Rabbit me, I am a soldier, and care no more for a lord than a lamplighter!"

"Are you seeking a quarrel, sir?" said Nigel, calmly, having in truth no desire to engage himself in a discreditable broil in such a place, and with such a character.

"Quarrel, sir?" said the captain; "I am not seeking a quarrel, though I care not how soon I find one. Only I wish you to understand you must be neighbourly, that's all. What if we should go over the water to the garden, and see a bull lanked this fine morning—'death, will you do nothing?"

"Something I am strangely tempted to do at this moment," said Nigel.

"Videlicet," said Colepepper, with a swaggering air, "let us hear the temptation."

"I am tempted to throw you headlong from the window, unless you presently make the best of your way down stairs."

"Throw me from the window?—hell and furies!" exclaimed the captain; "I have confronted twenty crooked sabres at Buda with my single rapier, and shall a chitty-faced, beggarly Scots lordling, speak of me and a window in the same breath?—Stand off, old Pillory, let me make Scotch collops of him—he dies the death!"

"For the love of Heaven, gentlemen," exclaimed the old miser, throwing himself between them, "do not break the peace on any consideration! Noble guest, forbear the captain—he is a very Hector of Troy—Trusty Hector, forbear my guest, he is like to prove a very Achilles—ugh—ugh—"

Here he was interrupted by his asthma, but, nevertheless, continued to interpose his person between Colepepper (who had unsheathed his whinyard, and was making vain passes at his antagonist) and Nigel, who had stepped back to take his sword, and now held it undrawn in his left hand.

"Make an end of this foolery, you scoundrel!" said Nigel—"Do you come hither to vent your noisy oaths and your bottled-up valour on me? You seem to know me, and I am half ashamed to say I have at length been able to recollect you—remember the garden behind the ordinary, you dastardly ruffian, and the speed with which fifty men saw you run from a drawn sword.—Get you gone, sir, and do not put me to the vile labour of cudgelling such a cowardly rascal down stairs."

The bully's countenance grew dark as night at this unexpected recognition; for he had undoubtedly thought himself secure in his change of dress, and his black patch, from being discovered by a person who had seen him but once. He set his teeth, clenched his hands, and it seemed as if he was seeking for a moment's courage to fly upon his antagonist. But his heart failed, he sheathed his sword, turned his back in gloomy silence, and spoke not until he reached the door, when, turning round, he said, with a deep oath, "If I be not avenged of you for this insolence ere many days go by, I would the gallows had my body and the devil my spirit!"

So saying, and with a look where determined spite and malice made his features savagely fierce, though they could not overcome his fear, he turned and left the house. Nigel followed him as far as the gallery at the head of the staircase, with the purpose of seeing him depart, and ere he returned was met by Mistress Martha Traphois, whom the noise of the quarrel had summoned from her own apartment. He could not resist saying to her in his natural displeasure—"would, madam, you could teach your father and his friends the lesson which you had the goodness to bestow on me this morning, and prevail on them to leave me the unmolested privacy of my own apartment."

"If you came hither for quiet or retirement, my man," answered she, "you have been advised to an evil retreat. You might seek mercy in the Chamber, or holiness in hell, with better success than quiet in Alsatia. But my father shall trouble you no longer."

So saying, she entered the apartment, and, fixing her eyes on the casket, she said with emphasis—"you display such a loadstone, it will draw our steel knife to your throat."

While Nigel hastily shut the casket, she addressed her father, upbraiding him, with small reverence, keeping company with the cowardly, hectoring, and deriding villain, John Colepepper.

"Ay, ay, child," said the old man, with the winning leer which intimated perfect satisfaction with his own superior address—"I know—I know—I know—I'll crossbite him—I know them all, and I'll manage them—ay, ay—I have the trick on't—ugh—"

"You manage, father!" said the austere old woman, "you will manage to have your throat cut, ere long. You cannot hide from them your person and your gold as formerly."

"My gains, wench? my gold?" said the old man, "alack-a-day, few of these and hard got—very hard got."

"This will not serve you, father, any longer," said she, "and had not served you thus long, but Bully Colepepper had contrived a cheaper way of plundering your house, even by means of my miserable self.—But why do I speak to him of all this?" she said, checking herself, and shrugging her shoulders with an expression of pity which did not contain much short of scorn. "He hears me not—but he does not of me.—Is it not strange that the love of getting gold should survive the care to preserve body and property and life?"

"Your father," said Lord Glenvarloch, who could not help respecting the strong sense and feeling shown by this poor woman, even amidst all her nervousness and severity, "your father seems to have his faculties sufficiently alert when he is in the midst of his ordinary pursuits and functions. I wonder he is not sensible of the weight of your arguments."

"Nature made him a man senseless of danger, and that insensibility is the best thing I have derived from him," said she; "age has left him shrewdness, but to tread his old beaten paths, but not to seek new courses. The old blind horse will long continue to go its rounds in the mill, when it would stumble in the open meadow."

"Daughter!—why, wench—why, housewife!" said the old man, awakening out of some dream, in which he had been sneering and chuckling in imagination probably over a successful piece of roguery.—"go to chamber, wench—go to chamber—draw bolts—chain—look sharp to door—let none in or out but worshipful Master Grahame—I must take my clock and go to Duke Hildebrod—ay, ay, time has been my own warrant was enough; but the lower winds are the more are we under the wind."

And, with his wonted chorus of muttering and coughing, the old man left the apartment. His daughter stood for a moment looking after him, with her usual expression of discontent and sorrow.

"You ought to persuade your father," said Nigel, "to leave this evil neighbourhood, if you are in real apprehensive for his safety."

"He would be safe in no other quarter," said the daughter; "I would rather the old man were publicly dishonoured. In other quarters he would be pelted and pursued, like an owl which ventures into sunshine. Here he was safe, while his comrades could avail themselves of his talents; but now squeezed and fleeced by them on every pretence. They consider him as a vessel on the strand, from which each may snatch a prey; and the very jealousy which they entertain respecting him as a common property, may perhaps induce them to guard him from more private and daring assaults."

"Still, methinks, you ought to leave this place," answered Nigel. "since you might find a safe retreat in some distant country."

"In Scotland, doubtless," said she, looking at him with a sharp and suspicious eye, "and enrich strangers with our rescued wealth—Ha! young man?"

"Madam, if you knew me," said Lord Glenvarloch, "you would spare the suspicion implied in your words."

"Who shall assure me of that?" said Martha, sharply. "They say you are a brawler and a gamester, and I know how far these are to be trusted by the unhappy."

"They do me wrong, by Heaven!" said Lord Glenvarloch.

"It may be so," said Martha; "I am little interested in the degree of your vice or your folly; but it is plain, that the one or the other has conducted you either, and that your best hope of peace, safety, and happiness, is to be gone, with the least possible delay, from a place which is always a sty for swine, and often a shambles." So saying, she left the apartment.

There was something in the ungracious manner of his female, amounting almost to contempt of him. He spoke to—an indignity to which Glenvarloch, notwithstanding his poverty, had not as yet been personally exposed, and which, therefore, gave him a transitory feeling of painful surprise. Neither did the dark hints which Martha threw out concerning the danger of his place of refuge, sound by any means agreeably to his ears. The bravest man, placed in a situation in which he is surrounded by suspicious persons, and removed from all counsel and assistance, except those afforded by a valiant heart and a strong arm, experiences a sinking of the spirit, a consciousness of abandonment, which for a moment chills his blood, and depresses his natural gallantry of disposition.

But, if sad reflections arose in Nigel's mind, he had not time to indulge them; and, if he saw little prospect of finding friends in Alsatia, he found that he was not likely to be solitary for lack of visitors.

He had scarcely paced his apartment for ten minutes, endeavouring to arrange his ideas on the course which he was to pursue on quitting Alsatia, when he was interrupted by the Sovereign of the quarter, the great Duke Hildebrod himself, before whose approach the bolts and chains of the miser's dwelling fell, or withdrew, as of their own accord; and both the folding leaves of the door were opened, that he might roll himself into the house like a huge butt of liquor, a vessel to which he bore a considerable outward resemblance, both in size, shape, complexion, and contents.

"Good-morrow to your lordship," said the greasy puncheon, cocking his single eye, and rolling it upon Nigel with a singular expression of familiar impudence; whilst his grim bull-dog, which was close at his heels, made a kind of gurgling in his throat, as if saluting, in similar fashion, a starved cat, the only living thing in Trapbois' house which we have not yet enumerated, and which had flown up to the top of the tester, where she stood clutching and grinning at the mastiff, whose greeting she accepted with as much good-will as Nigel bestowed on that of the dog's master.

"Peace, Belzie!—D—n thee, peace!" said Duke Hildebrod. "Beasts and fools will be meddling, my lord."

"I thought, sir," answered Nigel, with as much haughtiness as was consistent with the cool distance which he desired to preserve, "I thought I had told you, my name at present was Nigel Grahame."

His eminence of Whitefriars on this burst out into a loud, chuckling, impudent laugh, repeating the word, till his voice was almost inarticulate,—"Niggle Green—Niggle Green—Niggle Green!—why, my lord, you would be queered in the drinking of a penny pot of Malmsey, if you cry before you are touched. Why, you have told me the secret even now, had I not had a shrewd guess of it before. Why, Master Nigel, since that is the word, I only called you my lord, because we made you a peer of Alsatia last night, when the sack was predominant.—How you look now!—Ha! ha! ha!"

Nigel, indeed, conscious that he had unnecessarily betrayed himself, replied hastily,—"he was much obliged to him for the honours conferred, but did not propose to remain in the Sanctuary long enough to enjoy them."

"Why, that may be as you will, and you will walk by wise counsel," answered the ducal porpoise; and, although Nigel remained standing, in hopes to accelerate his guest's departure, he threw himself into one of the old tapestry-backed easy-chairs, which cracked under his weight, and began to call for old Trapbois.

The crone of all work appearing instead of her master, the Duke cursed her for a careless jade, to let a strange gentleman, and a brave guest, go without his morning's draught.

"I never take one, sir," said Glenvarloch.

"Time to begin—time to begin," answered the Duke.—"Here, you old refuse of Sathan, go to our palace, and fetch Lord Green's morning draught. Let us see—what shall it be, my Lord?—a humming double pot of ale, with a roasted crab dancing in it like a wherry above bridge?—or, hum—ay, young men are sweet-toothed—a quart of burnt sack, with sugar and spice?—good against the fogs. Or, what say you to sipping a gill of right distilled waters? Come, we will have them all, and you shall take your choice.—Here, you Jezebel, let Tim send the ale, and the sack, and the nipperkin of double-distilled, with a bit of diet-loaf, or some such trinket, and score it to the new conier."

Glenvarloch, bethinking himself that it might be as well to endure this fellow's insolence for a brief season, as to get into farther discreditable quarrels, suffered him to take his own way, without interruption, only observing, "You make yourself at home, sir, in my apartment; but, for the time, you may use your pleasure. Meanwhile, I would fain know what has procured me the honour of this unexpected visit?"

"You shall know that when old Deb has brought the liquor—I never speak of business dry-lipped. Why, how she drumbles—I warrant she stops to take a sip on the road, and then you will think you have had unchristian measure.—In the meanwhile, look at that dog there—look Belzebub in the face, and tell me if you ever saw a sweeter beast—never flew but at head in his life."

And after this congenial panegyric, he was proceeding with a tale of a dog and a bull which threatened to be somewhat of the longest, when he was interrupted by the return of the old crone, and two of his own tapsters, bearing the various kinds of drinkables which he had demanded, and which probably was the only species of interruption he would have endured with equanimity.

When the cups and cans were duly arranged upon the table, and when Deborah, whom the Ducal generosity honoured with a penny farthing in the way of gratuity, had withdrawn with her satellites, the worthy potentate, having first slightly invited Lord Glenvarloch to partake of the liquor which he was to pay for, and after having observed, that, excepting three poached eggs, a pint of bastard, and a cup of clary, he was fasting from every thing but sin, set himself seriously to reinforce the radical moisture. Glenvarloch had seen Scottish lairds and Dutch burgomasters at their potations; but their exploits (though each might be termed a thirsty generation) were nothing to those of Duke Hildebrod, who seemed an absolute sandbed, capable of absorbing any given quantity of liquid, without being either vivified or overflowed. He drank off the ale to quench a thirst which, as he said, kept him in a fever from morning to night, and night to morning; tipped off the sack to correct the crudity of the ale; sent the spirits after the sack to keep all quiet, and then declared that, probably, he should not taste liquor till post meridiem, unless it was in compliment to some especial friend. Finally, he intimated that he was ready to proceed on the business which brought him from home so early, a proposition which Nigel readily received, though he could not help suspecting that the most important purpose of Duke Hildebrod's visit was already transacted.

In this, however, Lord Glenvarloch proved to be mistaken. Hildebrod, before opening what he had to say, made an accurate survey of the apartment, laying, from time to time, his finger on his nose, and winking on Nigel with his single eye, while he opened and shut the doors, lifted the tapestry which concealed, in one or two places, the dilapidation of time upon the wainscoted walls, peeped into closets, and, finally, looked under the bed, to assure himself that the coast was clear of listeners and interlopers. He then resumed his seat, and beckoned confidentially to Nigel to draw his chair close to him.

"I am well as I am, Master Hildebrod," replied the young lord, little disposed to encourage the familiarity which the man endeavoured to fix on him; but the undismayed Duke proceeded as follows:

"You shall pardon me, my lord—and now I give you the title right seriously—if I remind you that our waters may be watched; for though old Trapbois be as deaf as Saint Paul's, yet his daughter has sharp ears, and sharp eyes enough, and it is of them that it is my business to speak."

"Say away, then, sir," said Nigel, edging his chair somewhat closer to the Quicksand, "although I cannot conceive what business I have either with mine host or his daughter."

"We will see that in the twinkling of a quart-pot," answered the gracious Duke; "and first, my lord, you must not think to dance in a net before old Jack Hildebrod, that has thrice your years o'er his head, and was born, like King Richard, with all his eye-teeth ready cut."

"Well, sir, go on," said Nigel.

"Why, then, my lord, I presume to say, that, if you are, as I believe you are, that Lord Glenvarloch whom all the world talk of—the Scotch gallant that has spent all, to a thin cloak and a light purse—be not moved, my lord, it is so noised of you—men call you the sparrowhawk, who will fly at all—ay, were it in the very Park—Be not moved, my lord."

"I am ashamed, sirrah," replied Glenvarloch, "that you should have power to move me by your insolence—but beware—and, if you indeed guess who I am, consider how long I may be able to endure your tone of insolent familiarity."

"I crave pardon, my lord," said Hildebrod, with a sullen, yet apologetic look; "I meant no harm in speaking my poor mind. I know not what honour there may be in being familiar with your lordship, but I judge there is little safety, for Lowestoffe is laid up in lavender only for having shown you the way into Alsatin; and so, what is to come of those who maintain you when you are here, or whether they will get most honour or most trouble by doing so, I leave with your lordship's better judgment."

"I will bring no one into trouble on my account," said Lord Glenvarloch. "I will leave Whitefriars to-morrow. Nay, by Heaven, I will leave it this day."

"You will have more wit in your anger, I trust," said Duke Hildebrod; "listen first to what I have to say to you, and, if honest Jack Hildebrod puts you not in the way of nicking them all, may he never cast doublets, or gull a greenhorn again! And so, my lord, in plain words, you must wap and win."

"Your words must be still plainer before I can understand them," said Nigel.

"What the devil—a gamester, one who deals with the devil's bones and the doctors, and not understand pedler's French! Nay, then, I must speak plain English, and that's the simpleton's tongue."

"Speak, then, sir," said Nigel; "and I pray you be brief, for I have little more time to bestow on you."

"Well, then, my lord, to be brief, as you and the lawyers call it—I understand you have an estate in the north, which changes masters for want of the redeeming ready.—Ay, you start, but you cannot dance in a net before me, as I said before; and so the King runs the frowning humour on you, and the Court pours you the go-by; and the Prince scowls at you from under his cap; and the favourite serves you the puckered brow and the cold shoulder; and the favourite's favourite"—

"To go no farther, sir," interrupted Nigel, "suppose all this true—and what follows?"

"What follows?" returned Duke Hildebrod. "Nay, this follows, that you will owe good deed, as well as good will, to him who shall put you in the way to walk with your beaver cocked in the presence as we were Earl of Kildare; bully the courtiers; meet the Prince's blighting look with a bold brow; court the favourite; baffle his deputy, and"—

"This is all well," said Nigel; "but how is it accomplished?"

"By making thee a Prince of Peru, my lord—in northern latitudes: propping thine old castle with gold—fertilizing thy failing fortunes with gold—it shall but cost thee to put thy baron's coronet on day or so on the brows of an old Caduca her man's daughter of the house, and thou art married to a mass of treasure that shall do all I have said thee, and"—

"What, you would have me marry this old woman here, the daughter of mine host?" said Nigel, surprised and angry, yet unable to suppress some smile to laugh.

"Nay, my lord, I would have you marry fifty thousand good sterling pounds; for that, and better, old Trapbois hoarded; and thou shalt do a deal of mercy in it to the old man, who will lose his pig smelts in some worse way—for now that he is well nigh past his day of work, his day of payment is to follow."

"Truly, this is a most courteous offer," said Lord Glenvarloch; "but may I pray of your candour, noble duke, to tell me why you dispose of so much wealth on a stranger like me, who will leave you to-morrow?"

"In sooth, my lord," said the Duke, "that once smacks more of the wit of Beaujeu's ordinary, or any word I have yet heard your lordship speak in reason it is you should be answered. Touching my peers, it is but necessary to say, that Mistress Mrs Trapbois will none of them, whether clerical or lay. The captain hath asked her, so hath the parson; she will none of them—she looks higher than ex and is, to say truth, a woman of sense, and so too profound, and of spirit something too high, mixed up with greasy buff or rusty prunella. For ourselves we need but hint that we have a consort in the East of the living, and, what is more to purpose, Mrs Martha knows it. So, as she will not lace her key hood save with a quality binding, you, my lord, must be the man, and must carry off fifty thousand decuses, the spoils of five thousand bullies, curms and spendthrifts,—always deducting from the sum some five thousand pounds for our princely service and countenance, without which, as matters stand in Alsatin, you would find it hard to wash plate."

"But has your wisdom considered, sir," replied Glenvarloch, "how this wedlock can serve me in my present emergency?"

"As for that, my lord," said Duke Hildebrod, "with forty or fifty thousand pounds in your pocket you cannot save yourself, you will deserve to lose your head for your folly, and your hand for being close-fisted."

"But, since your goodness has taken my matter into such serious consideration," continued Nigel, "who conceived there was no prudence in breaking with a man, who, in his way, meant him favour rather than offence, perhaps you may be able to tell me how my kindred will be likely to receive such a bride as you recommend to me?"

"Touching that matter, my lord, I have always heard your countrymen knew as well as other folk on which side their bread was buttered. And, trusting from report, I know no place where fifty thousand pounds—fifty thousand pounds, I say—will make a woman more welcome than it is likely to be in your ancient kingdom. And, truly, saving the slight twist in her shoulder, Mrs. Martha Trapbois is a person of very awful and majestic appearance, and may, for aught I know, be come of better blood than any one wots of; for old Trapbois looks not over like to be her father, and her mother was a generous, liberal sort of a woman."

"I am afraid," answered Nigel, "that chance is rather too vague to assure her a gracious reception into an honourable house."

"Why, then, my lord," replied Hildebrod, "I think it like she will be even with them; for I will venture to say, she has as much ill-nature as will make her a match for your whole clan."

"That may inconvenience me a little," replied Nigel.

"Not a whit—not a whit," said the Duke, fertile in expedients; "if she should become rather intolerable, which is not unlikely, your honourable house, which I presume to be a castle, hath, doubtless, both turrets and dungeons, and ye may bestow your bonny bride on either the one or the other, and then you know you will be out of hearing of her tongue, and she will be either above or below the contempt of your friends."

"It is sagely counselled, most equitable sir," replied Nigel, "and such restraint would be a fit meed for her folly that gave me any power over her."

"You entertain the project then, my lord?" said Duke Hildebrod.

"I must turn it in my mind for twenty-four hours," said Nigel; "and I will pray you so to order matters that I be not farther interrupted by any visitors."

"We will utter an edict to secure your privacy," said the Duke; "and you do not think," he added, lowering his voice to a confidential whisper, "that ten thousand is too much to pay to the Sovereign, in name of wardship?"

"Ten thousand!" said Lord Glenvarloch; "why, you said five thousand but now."

"Aha! art avised of that?" said the Duke, touching the side of his nose with his finger; "nay, if you have marked me so closely, you are thinking on the case more nearly than I believed, till you trapped me. Vell, well, we will not quarrel about the consideration, as old Trapbois would call it—do you win and rear the dame; it will be no hard matter with your ice and figure, and I will take care that no one interrupts you. I will have an edict from the Senate as soon as they meet for their meridiem."

So saying, Duke Hildebrod took his leave.

CHAPTER XXIV.

This is the time—Heaven's maiden sentinel
Hath quitted her high watch—the lesser spangles
Are paling one by one: give me the ladder
And the short lever—bid Anthony Keep with his carbine the wicket-gate;
And do thou bare thy knife and follow me,
For we will in and do it—darkness like this Is dawning of our fortune.—Old Play.

WHEN Duke Hildebrod had withdrawn, Nigel's first impulse was an irresistible feeling to laugh at the sage adviser, who would have thus connected him with age, ugliness, and ill-temper; but his next thought was pity for the unfortunate father and daughter, who, being the only persons possessed of wealth in this unhappy district, seemed like a wreck on the sea-shore of a barbarous country, only secured from under for the moment by the jealousy of the tribes among whom it had been cast. Neither could he help being conscious that his own residence here was upon conditions equally precarious, and that he was considered by the Alsatians in the same light of a god-son on the Cornish coast, or a sickly but wealthy caravan travelling through the wilds of Africa, and emphatically termed by the nations of despoilers through whose regions it passes, Dummalafoag, which signifies a thing given to be devoured—a common prey to all men.

Nigel had already formed his own plan to extricate himself, at whatever risk, from his perilous and degrading situation; and, in order that he might carry it to instant execution, he only awaited the return of Lowestoffe's messenger. He expected him, however, in vain, and could only amuse himself by looking through such parts of his baggage as had been sent to him from his former lodgings, in order to select a small packet of the most necessary articles to take with him, in the event of his quitting his lodgings secretly and suddenly, as speed and privacy would, he foresaw, be particularly necessary, if he meant to obtain an interview with the King, which was the course his spirit and his interest alike determined him to pursue.

While he was thus engaged, he found, greatly to his satisfaction, that Master Lowestoffe had transmitted not only his rapier and poniard, but a pair of pistols, which he had used in travelling; of a smaller and more convenient size than the large petronels, or horse pistols, which were then in common use, as being made for wearing at the girdle or in the pockets. Next to having stout and friendly comrades, a man is chiefly emboldened by finding himself well armed in case of need, and Nigel, who had thought with some anxiety on the hazard of trusting his life, if attacked, to the protection of the clumsy weapon with which Lowestoffe had equipped him, in order to complete his disguise, felt an emotion of confidence approaching to triumph, as, drawing his own good and well-tried rapier, he wiped it with his handkerchief, examined its point, bent it once or twice against the ground to prove its well-known metal, and finally replaced it in the scabbard, the more hastily, that he heard a tap at the door of his chamber, and had no mind to be found vapouring in the apartment with his sword drawn.

It was his old host who entered, to tell him with many cringes that the price of his apartment was to be a crown per diem; and that, according to the custom of Whitefriars, the rent was always payable per advance, although he never scrupled to let the money lie till a week or fortnight, or even a month, in the hands of any honourable guest like Master Grahame, always upon some reasonable consideration for the use. Nigel got rid of the old dotard's intrusion, by throwing down two pieces of gold, and requesting the accommodation of his present apartment for eight days, adding, however, he did not think he should tarry so long.

The miser, with a sparkling eye and a trembling hand, clutched fast the proffered coin, and, having balanced the pieces with exquisite pleasure on the extremity of his withered finger, began almost instantly to show that not even the possession of gold can gratify for more than an instant the very heart that is most eager in the pursuit of it. First, the pieces might be light—with hasty hand he drew a small pair of scales from his bosom and weighed them, first together, then separately, and smiled with glee as he saw them attain the due depression in the balance—a circumstance which might add to his profits, if it were true, as was currently reported, that little of the gold coinage was current in Alsatia in a perfect state, and that none ever left the Sanctuary in that condition.

Another fear then occurred to trouble the old miser's pleasure. He had been just able to comprehend that Nigel intended to leave the Friars sooner than the arrival of the term for which he had deposited the rent. This might imply an expectation of refunding, which, as a Scotch wag said, of all species of funding, jumped least with the old gentleman's humour. He was beginning to enter a hypothetical caveat on this subject, and to quote several reasons why no part of the money once consigned as room-rent, could be repaid back on any pretence, without great hardship to the landlord, when Nigel, growing impatient, told him that the money was his absolutely, and without any intention on his part of resuming any of it—all he asked in return was the liberty of enjoying in private the apartment he had paid for. Old Trapbois, who had still at his tongue's end much of the smooth language, by which, in his time, he had hastened the ruin of many a young spendthrift, began to launch out upon the noble and generous disposition of his new guest, until Nigel, growing impatient, took the old gentleman by the hand, and gently, yet irresistibly, leading him to the door of his chamber, put him out, but with such a decent and moderate exertion of his superior strength, as to render the action in no shape indecorous, and, fastening the door, began to do that for his pistols which he had done for his favourite sword, examining with care, the flints and locks, and reviewing the state of his small provision of ammunition.

In this operation he was a second time interrupted by a knocking at his door—he called upon the person to enter, having no doubt that it was Lowestoffe's messenger at length arrived. It was, however, the ungracious daughter of old Trapbois, who, muttering something about her father's mistake, laid down upon the table one of the pieces of gold which Nigel had just given to him, saying, that what she retained was the full rent for the term he had specified. Nigel replied, he had paid the money, and had no desire to receive it again.

"Do as you will with it, then," replied his hostess, "for there it lies, and shall lie for me. If you are fool enough to pay more than is reason, my father shall not be knave enough to take it."

"But your father, mistress," said Nigel, "your father told me"—

"Oh, my father, my father," said she, interrupting him,—"my father managed these affairs while he was able—I manage them now, and that may in the long run be as well for both of us."

She then looked on the table, and observed the weapons.

"You have arms, I see," she said; "do you know how to use them?"

"I should do so, mistress," replied Nigel, "for it has been my occupation."

"You are a soldier, then?" she demanded.

"No farther as yet, than as every gentleman of my country is a soldier."

"Ay, that is your point of honour—to cut the throats of the poor—a proper gentlemanlike occupation for those who should protect them!"

"I do not deal in cutting throats, mistress," replied Nigel; "but I carry arms to defend myself, and my country, if it needs me."

"Ay," replied Martha, "it is fairly worded; but men say you are as prompt as others in petty brawls, where neither your safety nor your country is in hazard; and that had it not been so, you would not have been in the sanctuary to-day."

"Mistress," returned Nigel, "I should labour in vain to make you understand that a man's honour, which is, or should be, dearer to him than his life, may often call on and compel us to hazard our own lives, or those of others, on what would otherwise seem trifling contingencies."

"God's law says nought of that," said the female; "I have only read there, that thou shalt not kill. But I have neither time nor inclination to preach to you—you will find enough of fighting here if you like it, and well if it come not to seek you when you are least prepared. Farewell for the present—the char-woman will execute your commands for your meals."

She left the room, just as Nigel, provoked at her assuming a superior tone of judgment and of censure, was about to be so superfluous as to enter into a dispute with an old pawnbroker's daughter on the subject of the point of honour. He smiled at himself for the folly into which the spirit of self-vindication had so nearly hurried him.

Lord Glenvarloch then applied to old Deborah the char-woman, by whose intermediation he was provided with a tolerably decent dinner; and the only embarrassment which he experienced, was from the almost forcible entry of the old dotard his landlord, who insisted upon giving his assistance at laying the cloth. Nigel had some difficulty to prevent him from displacing his arms and some papers which were lying on the small table at which he had been sitting; and nothing short of a stern and positive injunction to the contrary could compel him to use another board (though there were two in the room) for the purpose of laying the cloth.

Having at length obliged him to relinquish his purpose, he could not help observing that the eyes of the old dotard seemed still anxiously fixed upon the small table on which lay his sword and pistols; and that amidst all the little duties which he seemed officially anxious to render to his guest, he took every opportunity of looking towards and approaching these subjects of his attention. At length, when Trapbois thought he had completely avoided the notice of his guest, Nigel, through the observation of one of the cracked mirrors, on which channel of communication the old man had not calculated, beheld him actually extend his hand towards the table in question. He thought it unnecessary to use farther ceremony, but telling his landlord, in a stern voice, that he permitted no one to touch his arms, he commanded him to leave the apartment. The old usurer made no need a mauling sort of apology, in which that Nigel distinctly apprehended, was a frequent repetition of the word consideration, and which did not seem to him to require any other answer than restoration of his command to him to leave the apartment, upon pain of worse consequences.

The ancient Hebe, who acted as Lord Glenvarloch's cupbearer, took his part against the intruder; the still more antiquated Ganymede, and mistress old Trapbois leaving the room instantly, menaced him at the same time with her mistress's displeasure if he remained there any longer. The old man was more under petticoat government than any other; the threat of the char-woman produced greater effect upon him than the more formidable displeasure of Nigel. He withdrew grumbling and muttering. Lord Glenvarloch heard him bar a large door at the nearer end of the gallery, which served as a division betwixt the other parts of the extensive mansion; the apartment occupied by his guest, which, as every reader is aware, had its access from the landing at the head of the grand staircase.

Nigel accepted the careful sound of the bolts as they were severally drawn by the tremulous hand of old Trapbois, as an omen that the sea would not mean again to revisit him in the course of the evening, and heartily rejoiced that he was at last to be left to uninterrupted solitude.

The old woman asked if there was aught else to be done for his accommodation; and, indeed, she hitherto seemed as if the pleasure of serving him were more properly the reward which she expected to renew her youth and activity. Nigel desired to have candles, to have a fire lighted in his apartment, and a few fagots placed beside it, that he might sit it from time to time, as he began to feel the effects of the damp and low situation of the house close at hand as was to the Thames. But while the woman was absent upon his errand, he began to think in what way he should pass the long evening with which he was threatened.

His own reflections promised to Nigel little amusement, and less applause. He had considered his own perilous situation in every light in which it could be viewed, and foresaw as little utility as comfort in resuming the survey. To divert the current of his ideas, books were, of course, the readiest resource; and although, like most of us, Nigel had, in his time, sauntered through large libraries, and even spent long time there without greatly disturbing their ordered contents, he was now in a situation where the possession of a volume, even of very inferior merit, becomes a real treasure. The old housewife returned shortly afterwards with fagots, and some pieces of half-burnt wax-candles, the perquisites, probably real or usurped, of some experienced groom of the chambers, two of which she placed in large candlesticks, of different shapes and patterns, and laid the others on the table, that Nigel might rest them from time to time as they burnt to the socket. She heard with interest Lord Glenvarloch's request to have a book—any sort of book—to pass away the night withal, and returned for answer, that she knew of no other books in the house than her young mistress's (as she always denominated Mistress Martha Trapbois) Bible, which the owner would not lend; her master's Whetstone of Witte, being the second part of Arithmetic, by Robert Record, with the Case-like Practice and Rule of Equation; which promised volume Nigel declined to borrow. She offered, however, to bring him some books from Duke Hildesheim.

— who sometimes, good gentleman, gave a glance at a book when the Duke of Altona left him a much longer time."

Nigel embraced the proposal, and his unwearied line settled away on this second embassy. She returned a short time with a tattered quarto volume under her arm, and a bottle of sack on her hand, for the Duke, judging that mere reading was dry work, had set the wine by way of sauce to help it down, not forgetting to add the price to the morning's score, which he had already run up against the stranger in the Sanctuary.

Nigel sat on the bench, and did not refuse the wine, thinking that a glass or two, as it really proved to be of good quality, would be no bad interlude to his studies. He drank with thanks and assurance of strength, the poor old drudge who had been so zealous in his service, trimmed his fire and candles, and found the corner of the old arm chair in a convenient posture between the fire and the table at which he had dined, and which now supported the measure of sack and the lights, and thus accompanying his studies with such luxurious appliances as were in his power, he began to examine the only volume with which the ducal library of Altona had been able to supply him.

The contents, though of a kind generally interesting, were not well calculated to dispel the gloom by which he was surrounded. The book was entitled God's Revenge against Murder, not as the bibliographical reader may easily conjecture the work which Reynolds published under that imposing name, as one of a much earlier date, printed and sold by W. Wells, and which, could a copy now be found, could sell for much more than its weight in gold.*

Nigel had soon enough of the doleful tales which the book contained, and attempted one or two other copies of taking the evening. He looked out at midnight, but the night was rainy, with gusts of wind, and tried to coax the fire, but the fagots were green, and smoked without burning, and so he was no longer temperate; he felt his blood somewhat heated by the canary sack which he had already drunk. He had no farther inclination to that pursuit. He next attempted to compose a memorial addressed to the King, in which he set forth his case and his grievances, but speedily stung with the idea that his application would be treated with scorn, he flung a scroll into the fire, and, in a sort of despair, resumed the book which he had laid aside.

Nigel became more interested in the volume at the second than at the first attempt which he made to browse it. The narratives, strange and shocking as they were to human feeling, possessed yet the interest of novelty or of information which rivets the attention by its awakening horrors. Much was told of strange and horrible acts of blood by which men, setting nature and humanity aside at defiance, and, for the thirst of revenge, the lust of gold, or the ravings of irregular ambition, broken into the charactere of life. Yet more surprising and mysterious tales were recounted of the mode in which deaths of blood had come to be discovered and avenged. Animals, irrational animals, had told the secret, and birds of the air had carried the masterful elements had seemed to betray the deed which had polluted them—earth had seemed to support the murderer's steps, fire to warm his frozen limbs, water to refresh his parched lips, air to relieve his gasping cry. All, in short, bore evidence to the homicide's guilt. In other circumstances, the criminal's own weakened conscience pursued and brought him to justice, and in some narratives the grave was said to have yawned, that the ghost of the sufferer might find revenge.

It was now wearing late in the night, and the sack was still in Nigel's hands, when the tapestry which hung behind him flapped against the wall, and the wind produced by its motion waved the flame of the candles by which he was reading. Nigel started and turned round, in that excited and irritated state of mind which grows from the nature of his studies, especially at a period when a certain degree of superstitious was incubated as a point of religious faith. It was not without emotion that he saw the bloodless countenance, meagre form, and ghastly aspect of old Trapham, once more in the very act of extending his withered hand towards the table which supported his arms. Convinced by this untimely apparition that something evil was meditated towards him, Nigel sprang up, seized his sword, drew it, and placing it at the old man's breast, demanded of him what he did in his apartment at so untimely an hour. Trapham showed neither fear nor surprise, and only answered by some imperfect expressions intimating he would part with his life rather than with his property, and Lord Glenvarloch, strangely embarrassed, knew not what to think of the intruder's motions, and still less how to get rid of him. As he again tried the means of mutilation, he was surprised by a second apparition from behind the tapestry, in the person of the daughter of Trapham, bearing a lamp in her hand. She also seemed to possess her father's immobility to danger, for coming close to Nigel, she pushed aside unceremoniously his naked sword, and even attempted to take it out of his hand.

"For shame," she said, "your sword on a man of eighty years and more!—the honour of a Scottish gentleman! give it to me to make a spindle of!"

Stand back, said Nigel, "I mean your father no injury, but I will know what has caused him to prove this whole day, and even at this late hour of night, around my arms."

"Your arms!" repeated she; "alas! young man, the whole arms in the Tower of London are of little value to him, in comparison of this marvellous piece of gold which I left this morning on the table of a young spendthrift too careless to put what belonged to him into his own purse."

So saying, she showed the piece of gold, which, still remaining on the table, where she left it, had been the bait that attracted old Trapham so frequently to the spot, and which, even in the silence of the night, had so dwell on his imagination, that he had made use of a private passage long disused, to enter his guest's apartment in order to possess himself of the treasure during his slumbers. He now exclaimed, at the highest tones of his cracked and feeble voice:

"It is mine—it is mine!"—he gave it to me for a consideration—I will die ere I part with my property!"

"It is indeed his own, mistress," said Nigel, "and I do entreat you to restore it to the person on whom I have bestowed it, and let me have my apartment in quiet."

"I will account with you for it, then,"—and the modern, reluctantly giving to her father the morsel of Man-meat, on which he doted as if his heavy fingers had been the talons of a hawk among its prey; and then making a contented muttering and mumbling like an old dog after he has been fed, and just when he is wheeling himself three round for the purpose of lying down, he followed his daughter behind the tapestry through a little sliding-door which was perceived when the hangings were drawn apart.

"This shall be properly fastened to-morrow," said the daughter to Nigel, speaking in such a tone that her father, deaf and engrossed by his acquisition, could not hear her, "to-night I will continue to watch him closely—I wish you good repose."

These few words, pronounced in a tone of more civility than she had yet made use of towards her lodger, contained a wish which was not to be accomplished although her guest, presently after her departure, retired to bed.

There was a slight fever in Nigel's blood, occasioned by the various events of the evening, which put him, as the phrase is, beside his wits. Puzzling and painful thoughts rolled on his mind like a troubled stream, and the more he laboured to lull himself to slumber, the farther he seemed from attaining his object. He tried all the resources, common to such oc-ses; kept counting from one to a thousand, until his head was giddy—he watched the embers of the wood fire till his eyes were dazzled—he listened to the dull moaning of the wind, the swinging and creaking of signs which projected from the houses, and the bay-ing of here and there a homeless dog, till his very ear was weary.

Suddenly, however, amid this monotony, came a sound which startled him at once. It was a female shriek. He sat up in his bed to listen, then remembered he was in Alsatia, where brawls of every sort were current among the unruly inhabitants. But another scream, and another, and another, succeeded so close, that he was certain, though the noise was remote and sounded stifled, it must be in the same house with himself.

Nigel jumped up hastily, put on a part of his clothes, seized his sword and pistols, and ran to the door of his chamber. Here he plainly heard the screams redoubled, and, as he thought, the sounds came from the usurer's apartment. All access to the gallery was effectually excluded by the intermediate door, which the brave young lord shook with eager, but vain impatience. But the secret passage occurred suddenly to his recollection. He hastened back to his room, and succeeded with some difficulty in lighting a candle, powerfully agitated by hearing the cries repeated, yet still more afraid lest they should sink into silence.

He rushed along the narrow and winding entrance, guided by the noise, which now burst more wildly on his ear; and, while he descended a narrow staircase which terminated the passage, he heard the stifled voices of men, encouraging, as it seemed, each other.—"D—n her, strike her down—silence her—beat her brains out!"—while the voice of his hostess, though now almost exhausted, was repeating the cry of "murder," and "help." At the bottom of the staircase was a small door, which gave way before Nigel as he precipitated himself upon the scene of action, a cocked pistol in one hand, a candle in the other, and his naked sword under his arm.

Two ruffians had, with great difficulty, overpowered, or, rather, were on the point of overpowering, the daughter of Trapbois, whose resistance appeared to have been most desperate, for the floor was covered with fragments of her clothes, and handfuls of her hair. It appeared that her life was about to be the price of her defence, for one villain had drawn a long clasp-knife, when they were surprised by the entrance of Nigel, who, as they turned towards him, shot the fellow with the knife dead on the spot, and when the other advanced to him, hurled the candlestick at his head, and then attacked him with his sword. It was dark, save some pale moonlight from the window; and the ruffian, after firing a pistol without effect, and fighting a traverse or two with his sword, lost heart, made for the window, leaped over it, and escaped. Nigel fired his remaining pistol after him at a venture, and then called for light.

"There is light in the kitchen," answered Martha Trapbois, with more presence of mind than could have been expected. "Stay, you know not the way; I will fetch it myself.—Oh! my father—my poor father!—I knew it would come to this—and all along of the accursed gold!—They have MURDERED him!"

CHAPTER XXV.

Death finds us 'mid our playthings—snatches us,
As a cross nurse might do a wayward child,
From all our toys and baubles. His rough call Unlooses all our favorite ties on earth;
And well if they are such as may be answer'd
In yonder world, where all is judged of truly.—Old Play.

It was a ghastly scene which opened, upon Martha Trapbois's return with a light. Her own haggard and austere features were exaggerated by all the desperation of grief, fear, and passion—but the latter was predominant. On the floor lay the body of the robber, who had expired without a groan, while his blood, flowing plentifully, had crimsoned all around. Another body lay also there, on which the unfortunate woman precipitated herself in agony, for it was that of her unhappy father. In the next moment she started up, and exclaiming—"There may be life yet," strove to raise the body. Nigel went to her assistance, but not without a glance at the open window, which Martha, as acute as if undisturbed either by passion or terror, failed not to interpret justly.

"Fear not," she cried, "fear not; they are cowards, to whom courage is as much unknown as mercy. If I had had weapons, I could have defended myself against them without assistance or protection.—Oh! my poor father! protection comes too late to this cold and stiff corpse.—He is dead—dead!"

While she spoke, they were attempting to raise the dead body of the old miser; but it was evident, from the feeling of the inactive weight and rigidness that life had forsaken her station. Nigel looked at a wound, but saw none. The daughter of the usurer ceased, with more presence of mind than a daughter could at the time have been supposed capable of exercising, discovered the instrument of his murder—a red scarf, which had been drawn so tight round the throat, as to stifle his cries for assistance in the instance, and afterwards to extinguish life.

She undid the fatal noose; and, laying the man's body in the arms of Lord Glenvarloch, ran for water, for spirits, for essences, in the vain hope that life might be only suspended. That hope was indeed vain. She chafed his temples, raised his arms, loosened his nightgown, (for it seemed as if he had arisen from bed upon hearing the entrance of the robbers,) and, finally, opened, with difficulty, his stiff and closely-clenched hands, from one of which dropped a key, from the other the very piece of gold which the unhappy man had been a little before so anxious, and which probably, in the impaired state of his mental faculties, he was disposed to devote as desperate energy, as if its amount had been necessary to his actual existence.

"It is in vain—it is in vain," said the daughter, desisting from her fruitless attempts to revive the spirit which had been effectually dislodged from the neck had been twisted by the violence of the robbers; "It is in vain—he is murdered—I always knew it would be thus; and now I witness it!"

She then snatched up the key and the piece of money, but it was only to dash them again on the floor, as she exclaimed, "Accursed be ye both, for ye are the causes of this deed!"

Nigel would have spoken—would have reminded her, that measures should be instantly taken in the pursuit of the murderer who had escaped, as well for her own security against his return; but she interrupted him sharply.

"Be silent," she said, "be silent. Think ye that thoughts of my own heart are not enough to distress me, and with such a sight as this before me? I will be silent," she said again, and in a yet sterner tone—"Can a daughter listen, and her father's murdered corpse lying on her knees?"

Lord Glenvarloch, however overpowered by the energy of her grief, felt not the less the embarrassment of his own situation. He had discharged his pistols—the robber might return—he had probably other assistants besides the man who had fallen, and it seemed to him, indeed, as if he had heard a murmur beneath the windows. He explained hastily to his companion the necessity of procuring ammunition.

"You are right," she said, somewhat contentedly, "and have ventured already more than I expected of man. Go, and shift for yourself, and that is your purpose—leave me to my fate."

Without stopping for needless expostulation, Nigel hastened to his own room through the secret passage, furnished himself with the ammunition he required, and returned with the same celerity; wondering himself at the accuracy with which he achieved, in the dark, all the meanderings of the passage which he had traversed only once, and that in a moment of such violent agitation.

He found, on his return, the unfortunate woman standing like a statue by the body of her father, while she had laid straight on the floor, having covered her face with the skirt of his gown. She testified neither surprise nor pleasure at Nigel's return, but said to him calmly—"My moan is made—my sorrow—" is sorrow at least that man shall ever have noting is gone past; but I will have justice, and the base villain who murdered this poor defenceless old man, when he had not by the course of nature, a twelve-month's life in him, shall not cumber the earth long after him. Stranger, whom heaven has sent to forward the revenge reserved for this action, go to Hildebrod's—there they are awake all night in their revels—bid him come hither—he is bound by his duty, and will not, and shall not, refuse his assistance, which I know well I can reward. Why do ye tarry?—go instantly.”

“I would,” said Nigel, “but I am fearful of leaving you alone; the villains may return, and”——

“True, most true,” answered Martha, “he may turn; and, though I care little for his murdering him, he may possess himself of what has most tempted him. Keep this key and this piece of gold; they are both of importance—defend your life if assailed, and if you kill the villain I will make you rich. I go myself to call for aid.”

Nigel would have remonstrated with her, but she had departed, and in a moment he heard the house-door clank behind her. For an instant he thought of following her; but upon recollection that the distance was but short betwixt the tavern of Hildebrod and the house of Trapbois, he concluded that she knew better than he—incurred little danger in passing it, that he would do well in the meanwhile to remain on the watch as she recommended.

It was no pleasant situation for one unused to such scenes, to remain in the apartment with two dead bodies, recently those of living and breathing men, who had both, within the space of less than half an hour, suffered violent death; one of them by the hand of an assassin, the other, whose blood still continued to flow from the wound in his throat, and to flood around him, by the spectator's own deed of violence, though of justice. He turned his face from these wretched relics of mortality with a feeling of disgust, mingled with superstition; and he found, when he had done so, that the consciousness of the presence of these ghastly objects, though unseen by him, rendered him more uncomfortable than even when he had his eyes fixed upon, and reflected by, the cold, staring, lifeless eyeballs of the deceased. They also played her usual sport with him. He thought he heard the well-worn damask nightgown of the deceased usurer rustle; anon, that he heard the slaughtered bravo draw up his leg, the boot clanking the floor as if he was about to rise; and then he deemed he heard the footsteps and the whisper of the returned ruffian under the window from which he had lately escaped. To face the last and the real danger, and to parry the terrors which the class of feelings were like to impress upon him, he went to the window, and was much cheered to receive the light of several torches illuminating the street, and followed, as the murmur of voices denoted by a number of persons, armed, it would seem, with firelocks and halberds, and attendant on Hildebrod, who (not in his fantastic office of duke, but in which he really possessed, of bailiff of the liberty sanctuary of Whitefriars) was on his way to interfere into the crime and its circumstances.

It was a strange and melancholy contrast to see these debauchees, disturbed in the very depth of their night revel, on their arrival at such a scene as they stared on each other, and on the bloody bodies before them, with lack-lustre eyes; staggered on uncertain steps over boards slippery with blood; the noisy brawling voices sunk into stammering whispers; and, with spirits quelled by what they saw, their brains were still stupified by the liquor which they had drunk, they seemed like men walking in their sleep.

Hildebrod was an exception to the general situation. That seasoned cask, however full, was at times capable of motion, when there occurred a blow sufficiently strong to set him a-rolling. He was much shocked at what he beheld, and his proceedings, in consequence, had more in them of gravity and propriety, than he might have been supposed capable of exhibiting upon any occasion whatever. The daughter was first examined, and stated, with wonderful accuracy and distinctness, the manner in which she had been alarmed with a noise of struggling and violence in her father's apartment, and that the more readily, because she was watching him on account of some alarm concerning his health. On her entrance, she had seen her father sinking under the strength of two men, upon whom she rushed with all the fury she was capable of. As their faces were blackened, and their figures disguised, she could not pretend, in the hurry of a moment so dreadfully agitating, to distinguish either of them as persons whom she had seen before. She remembered little more except the firing of shots, until she found herself alone with her guest, and saw that the ruffians had escaped.

Lord Glenvarloch told his story as we have given it to the reader. The direct evidence thus received, Hildebrod examined the premises. He found that the villains had made their entrance by the window out of which the survivor had made his escape; yet it seemed singular that they should have done so, as it was secured with strong iron bars, which old Trapbois was in the habit of shutting with his own hand at nightfall. He minutely down with great accuracy, the state of every thing in the apartment, and examined carefully the features of the slain robber. He was dressed like a seaman of the lowest order, but his face was known to none present. Hildebrod next sent for an Alsatian surgeon, whose vices, undoing what his skill might have done for him, had consigned him to the wretched practice of this place. He made him examine the dead bodies, and make a proper declaration of the manner in which the sufferers seemed to have come by their end. The circumstance of the sash did not escape the learned judge, and having listened to all that could be heard or conjectured on the subject, and collected all particulars of evidence which appeared to bear on the bloody transaction, he commanded the door of the apartment to be locked until next morning; and carrying the unfortunate daughter of the murdered man into the kitchen, where there was no one in presence but Lord Glenvarloch, he asked her gravely, whether she suspected no one in particular of having committed the deed.

“Do you suspect no one?” answered Martha, looking fixedly on him.

“Perhaps I may, mistress; but it is my part to ask questions, yours to answer them. That's the rule of the game.”

“Then I suspect him who wore yonder sash. Do not you know whom I mean?”

“Why, if you call on me for honours, I must needs say I have seen Captain Peppercull have one of such a fashion, and he was not a man to change his suits often.”

“Send out then,” said Martha, “and have him apprehended.”

“If it is he, he will be far by this time; but I will communicate with the higher powers,” answered the judge.

“You would have him escape,” resumed she, fixing her eyes on him sternly.

“By cock and pie,” replied Hildebrod, “did it depend on me, the murdering cut-throat should hang as high as ever Haman did—but let me take my time. He has friends among us, that you wot well; and all that should assist me are as drunk as fiddlers.”

“I will have revenge—I will have it,” repeated she; “and take heed you trifle not with me.”

“Trifle! I would sooner trifle with a she-bear the minute after they had baited her. I tell you, mistress, be but patient, and we will have him. I know all his haunts, and he cannot forbear them long; and I will have trap-doors open for him. You cannot want justice, mistress, for you have the means to get it.”

“They who help me in my revenge,” said Martha, “shall share those means.”

“Enough said,” replied Hildebrod; “and now I would have you go to my house, and get something hot—you will be but dreary here by yourself.”

“I will send for the old char-woman,” replied Martha, “and we have the stranger gentleman, besides.”

"Umph, umph—the stranger gentleman!" said Hildebrod to Nigel, whom he drew a little apart. "I fancy the captain has made the stranger gentleman's fortune when he was making a bold dash for his own. I can tell your honour—I must not say lordship—that I think my having chanced to give the greasy buff-and-iron scoundrel some hint of what I recommended to you to-day, has put him on this rough game. The better for you—you will get the cash without the father-in-law.—You will keep conditions I trust?"

"I wish you had said nothing to any one of a scheme so absurd," said Nigel.

"Absurd!—Why, think you she will not have thee? Take her with the tear in her eye, man—take her with the tear in her eye. Let me hear from you to-morrow. Good night, good night—a nod is as good as a wink. I must to my business of sealing and locking up. By the way, this horrid work has put all out of my head—Here is a fellow from Mr. Lowestoffe has been asking to see you. As he said his business was express, the Senate only made him drink a couple of flagons, and he was just coming to beat up your quarters when this breeze blew up.—Ah, friend! there is Master Nigel Grahame."

A young man, dressed in a green plush jerkin, with a badge on the sleeve, and having the appearance of waterman, approached and took Nigel aside, while Duke Hildebrod went from place to place to exercise his authority, and to see the windows fastened, and the doors of the apartment locked up. The news communicated by Lowestoffe's messenger were not the most pleasant. They were intimated in a courteous whisper to Nigel, to the following effect:—That Master Lowestoffe prayed him to consult his safety by instantly leaving Whitefriars, for that a warrant from the Lord Chief Justice had been issued out for apprehending him, and would be put in force to-morrow, by the assistance of a party of musketeers, a force which the Alsations neither would nor dared to resist.

"And so, squire," said the aquatic emissary, "my wherry is to wait you at the Temple Stairs yonder, at five this morning, and, if you would give the bloodhounds the slip, why, you may."

"Why did not Master Lowestoffe write to me?" said Nigel.

"Alas! the good gentleman lies up in lavender for it himself, and has as little to do with pen and ink as if he were a parson."

"Did he send any token to me?" said Nigel.

"Token?—ay, marry did he—token enough, an I have not forgot it," said the fellow; then, giving a hoist to the waistband of his breeches, he said,—“Ay, I have it—you were to believe me, because your name was written with an O, for Grahame. Ay, that was it, I think.—Well, shall we meet in two hours, when tide turns, and go down the river like a twelve-oared barge?"

"Where is the king just now, knowest thou?" answered Lord Glenvarloch.

"The king? why, he went down to Greenwich yesterday by water, like a noble sovereign as he is, who will always float where he can. He was to have hunted this week, but that purpose is broken, they say; and the Prince and the Duke, and all of them at Greenwich, are as merry as minnows."

"Well," replied Nigel, "I will be ready to go at five; do thou come hither to carry my baggage."

"Ay, ay, master," replied the fellow, and left the house, mixing himself with the disorderly attendants of Duke Hildebrod, who were now retiring. That potentate entreated Nigel to make fast the doors behind him, and, pointing to the female who sat by the expiring fire with her limbs outstretched, like one whom the hand of Death had already arrested, he whispered, "Mind your hits, and mind your bargain, or I will cut your bow-string for you before you can draw it."

Feeling deeply the ineffable brutality which could recommend the prosecuting such views over a wretch in such a condition, Lord Glenvarloch yet commanded his temper so far as to receive the advice in silence, and attend to the former part of it, by barring the door carefully behind Duke Hildebrod and his suite, ma, in all probability, to a dungeon. I might, indeed, transport you from hence with me, if you could afterwards bestow yourself with any friend."

"Friend!" she exclaimed—"I have no friend—they have long since discarded us. A spectre arising from the dead were more welcome than I should be at the doors of those who have disclaimed us; and, if they were willing to restore their friendship to me now, I would despise it, because they withdrew it from him—from him!" (here she underwent strong but suppressed agitation, and then added firmly)—"from him who lies yonder—I have no friend." Here she paused; and then suddenly, as if recollecting herself, added, "I have no friend, but I have that will purchase many—I have that which will purchase both friends and avengers.—It is well thought of, I must not leave it for a prey to cheats and ruffians.—Stranger, you must return to yonder room. Pass through it boldly to him—that is, to the sleeping apartment; push the bedstead aside; beneath each of the posts is a brass plate, as if to support the weight, but it is that upon the left, nearest to the wall, which must serve your turn—press the corner of the plate, and it will spring up and show a keyhole, which this key will open. You will then lift a concealed trap-door, and in a cavity of the floor you will discover a small chest. Bring it hither; it shall accompany our journey, and it will be hard if the contents cannot purchase me a place of refuge."

"But the door communicating with the kitchen has been locked by those people," said Nigel.

"True, I had forgot; they had their reasons for that, doubtless," answered she. "But the secret passage from your apartment is open, and you may go that way."

Lord Glenvarloch took the key, and, as he lighted a lamp to show him the way, she read in his countenance some unwillingness to the task imposed.

"You fear?" she said—"there is no cause; the murderer and his victim are both at rest. Take courage, I will go with you myself—you cannot know the trick of the spring, and the chest will be too heavy for you."

"No fear, no fear," answered Lord Glenvarloch, ashamed of the construction she put upon a momentary hesitation, arising from a dislike to look upon what is horrible, often connected with those high-wrought minds which are the last to fear what is merely dangerous—"I will do your errand as you desire; but for you, you must not—cannot go yonder."

"I can, I will," she said. "I am composed. You shall see that I am so." She took from the table a piece of unfinished sewing-work, and, with steadiness and composure, passed a silken thread into the eye of a fine needle.—"Could I have done that," she said, with a smile yet more ghastly than her previous look of fixed despair, "had not my heart and hand been both steady?"

She then led the way rapidly up stairs to Nigel's chamber, and proceeded through the secret passage with the same haste, as if she had feared her resolution might have failed her ere her purpose was executed. At the bottom of the stairs she paused a moment, before entering the fatal apartment, then hurried through with a rapid step to the sleeping chamber beyond, followed closely by Lord Glenvarloch, whose reluctance to approach the scene of butchery was altogether lost in the anxiety which he felt on account of the survivor of the tragedy.

Her first action was to pull aside the curtains of her father's bed. The bed-clothes were thrown aside in confusion doubtless in the action of his starting from sleep to oppose the entrance of the villains into the next apartment. The hard mattress scarcely showed the slight pressure where the emaciated body of the old miser had been deposited. His daughter sank beside the bed, clasped her hands, and prayed to Heaven, in a short and affecting manner, for support in her affliction, and for vengeance on the villains who had made her fatherless. A low-muttered and still more brief petition recommended to Heaven the soul of the sufferer, and invoked pardon for his sins, in virtue of the great Christian atonement.

This duty of piety performed, she signed to Nigel to follow her; and, having pushed aside the heavy bedstead, they saw the brass plate which Martha had described. She pressed the spring, and, at once, the plate starting up, showed the keyhole, and a large iron ring used in lifting the trap-door, which, when raised, displayed the strong-box, or small chest, as had been mentioned, and which proved indeed so very weighty, that it might perhaps have been scarcely possible for Nigel, though a very strong man, to have raised it without assistance.

Having replaced every thing as they had found it, Nigel, with such help as his companion was able to afford, assumed his load, and made a shift to carry into the next apartment, where lay the miser's owner, so vulnerable to sounds and circumstances, which if any thing could have broken his long last slumbers would certainly have done so.

His unfortunate daughter went up to his body, as had been the courage to remove the sheet which had been decently disposed over it. She put her hands to the heart, but there was no throb—held a feather to the lips, but there was no motion—then kissed with deep reverence the starting veins of the pale forehead, and then the emaciated hand.

"I would you could hear me," she said,—"Father, I would you could hear me owner, that, if I now saw what you most valued on earth, it is only to assist in obtaining vengeance for your death!"

She replaced the covering, and, without a tear, sigh, or an additional word of any kind, renewed her efforts, until they conveyed the strong-box between them into Lord Glenvarloch's sleeping apartment. "It must pass," she said, "as part of your baggage. I will be in readiness as soon as the waterman calls."

She retired, and Lord Glenvarloch, who saw the hour of their departure approach, tore down a part of the old hanging to make a covering, which he cords upon the trunk, lest the peculiarity of its shape, and the care with which it was banded and counterbanded with bars of steel, might afford suspicious suspicion the treasure which it contained. Having taken this measure of precaution, he changed the rascal's disguise, which he had assumed on entering Whitefriars, into a suit becoming his quality, and then, unable to sleep, though exhausted with the events of the night, he threw himself on his bed to await the summons of the waterman.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Green we find our way, gentle stream—we stem and
The wherry cut with sounds of revelry
Wake not the slumbering echoes of thy banks
With voices of fate and doom—we do but seek
The broad pathway of thy swelling bosom
To glide in silent safety—The Double Bridal.

GRAY, of rather yellow light, was beginning to twinkle through the fogs of Whitefriars, when a knock at the door of the unhappy miser announced to Lord Glenvarloch the summons of the boatman. He found at the door the man whom he had seen the night before, with a companion.

"Come, come, master, let us get afloat," said one of them, in a rough inpressive whisper, "time is tide wait for no man."

"They shall not wait for me," said Lord Glenvarloch; "but I have some things to carry with me."

"By my word, no man will take a pair of oars now, fast unless he means to load the wherry like a six-horn wagon. When they don't want to shift the whole lot, they take a sculler, and be d—d to them.—Come, come, where be your rattle-traps?"

One of the men was soon sufficiently loaded, in his own estimation at least, with Lord Glenvarloch's trunk and its accompaniments, with which burden he began to trudge towards the Temple Stairs. His comrade, who seemed the principal, began to handle the trunk which contained the miser's treasure, he pitched it down again in an instant, declaring, with great oath, that it was as reasonable to expect a man to carry Paul's on his back. The daughter of Traybush, who had by this time joined them, muffled up in a long dark hood and mantle, exclaimed to Lord Glenvarloch—"Let them leave it, it's their own."

them leave it all; let us but escape from this horrible place."

We have mentioned elsewhere, that Nigel was a very athletic young man, and, impelled by a strong feeling of compassion and indignation, he showed his bodily strength singularly on this occasion, by seizing on the ponderous strong-box, and, by means of the rope he had cast around it, throwing it on his shoulders, and marching resolutely forward under a weight, which would have sunk to the earth three young gallants, at the least, of our degenerate day. The waterman followed him in amazement, calling out, "Why, master, master, you might as well go me t'other end on't!" and anon offered his assistance to support it in some degree behind, which after the first minute or two Nigel was fain to accept. His strength was almost exhausted when he reached the wherry, which was lying at the Temple Stairs according to appointment; and, when he pitched the trunk into it, the weight sank the bow of the boat so low in the water as wellnigh to upset it.

"We shall have us hard a fare of it," said the waterman to his companion, "as if we were ferrying over an honest bankrupt with all his secreted goods—Ho, ho! good woman, what are you stepping in for?—our gunwale lies deep enough in the water without live lumber to boot."

"This person comes with me," said Lord Glenvarloch; "she is for the present under my protection."

"Come, come, master," rejoined the fellow, "that is out of my commission. You must not double my freight on me—she may go by land—and, as for protection, her face will protect her from Berwick to the Land's End."

"You will not except at my doubling the loading, if I double the fare?" said Nigel, determined on no account to relinquish the protection of this unhappy woman, for which he had already devised some sort of plan, likely now to be baffled by the characteristic rudeness of the Thames watermen.

"Ay, by G—, but I will except, though," said the fellow with the green plush jacket; "I will overload my wherry neither for love nor money—I love my boat as well as my wife, and a thought better."

"Nay, nay, comrade," said his mate, "that is speaking no true water language. For double fare we are bound to row a witch in her eggshell if she bid us; and so pull away, Jack, and let us have no more prating."

They got into the stream-way accordingly, and, although heavily laden, began to move down the river with reasonable speed.

The lighter vessels which passed, overtook, or crossed them, in their course, failed not to assail them with the boisterous raillery, which was then called water-wit; for which the extreme plainness of Mistress Martha's features, contrasted with the youth, handsome figure, and good looks of Nigel, furnished the principal topics; while the circumstance of the boat being somewhat overloaded, did not escape their notice. They were hailed successively, as a grocer's wife upon a party of pleasure with her eldest apprentice—as an old woman carrying her grandson to school—and as a young strapping Irishman, conveying an ancient maiden to Dr. Rigmarole's at Red-rifle, who buckles beggars for a tester and a dram of Geneva. All this abuse was retorted in a similar strain of humour by Green-jacket and his companion, who maintained the war of wit with the same alacrity with which they were assailed.

Meanwhile, Lord Glenvarloch asked his desolate companion if she had thought on any place where she could remain in safety with her property. She confessed in more detail than formerly, that her father's character had left her no friends; and that, from the time he had betaken himself to Whitefriars, to escape certain legal consequences of his eager pursuit of gain, she had lived a life of total seclusion; not associating with the society which the place afforded, and, by her residence there, as well as her father's parsimony, effectually cut off from all other company. What she now wished, was, in the first place, to obtain the shelter of a decent lodging, and the countenance of honest people, however low in life, until she should obtain legal advice as to the mode of obtaining justice on her father's murderer. She had no hesitation to charge the guilt upon Colepepper, (commonly called Peppercull,) whom she knew to be capable of any act of treacherous cruelty, as he was cowardly, where actual manhood was required. He had been strongly suspected of two robberies before one of which was coupled with an atrocious murder. He had, she intimated, made pretensions to her as the easiest and safest way of obtaining possession of her father's wealth; and, on her refusing his addresses, if they could be termed so, in the most positive terms, he had thrown out such obscure hints of vengeance, as, joined with some imperfect assault upon the house, had kept her in frequent alarm, both on her father's account and her own.

Nigel, but that his feeling of respectful delicacy, the unfortunate woman forbade him to do so, could have communicated a circumstance corroborative of her suspicions, which had already occurred to his own mind. He recollected the hint that old E. debarbed threw forth on the preceding night, that a communication betwixt himself and Colepepper hastened the catastrophe. As this communication related to the plan which Hildebrand had been pressed to form, of promoting a marriage betwixt Nigel himself and the rich heiress of Trapbois, the fear of losing an opportunity not to be regained, together with a mean malignity of a low-bred ruffian disappointed a favourite scheme, was most likely to instigate a bravo to the deed of violence which had been committed. The reflection that his own name was some degree implicated with the causes of this terrible tragedy, doubled Lord Glenvarloch's anxiety on behalf of the victim whom he had rescued, and at the same time he formed the tacit resolution, that as soon as his own affairs were put upon some footing he would contribute all in his power towards the investigation of this bloody affair.

After ascertaining from his companion that she could form no better plan of her own, he recommended to her to take up her lodging for the night at the house of his old landlord, Christie the ship-deller, at Paul's Wharf, describing the decency and honesty of that worthy couple, and expressing his hopes that they would receive her into their house, or recommend her at least to that of some person for whom they would be responsible, until she should have time to enter upon other arrangements for herself.

The poor woman received advice so grateful to her in her desolate condition, with an expressive thanks, brief indeed, but deeper than any thing yet extracted from the austerity of her natural disposition.

Lord Glenvarloch then proceeded to inform Nigel that certain reasons, connected with his personal safety, called him immediately to Greenwich, and, therefore, it would not be in his power to accompany her to Christie's house, which he would otherwise have done with pleasure; but tearing a leaf from his note, he wrote on it a few lines, addressed to his landlord as a man of honesty and humanity, in which he described the bearer as a person who stood in the necessity of temporary protection and good advice, for which her circumstances enabled her to make ample acknowledgment. He therefore requested John Christie, as his old and good friend, to afford her the shelter of his roof for a short time; or, if that might not be consistent with his convenience, at least to direct her to a proper lodging—and, that he imposed on him the additional, and somewhat more difficult commission, to recommend her to the counsel and services of an honest, at least a reputable and skilful attorney, for the transacting some business of importance. This note he subscribed with his real name, and, delivering it to his protégé, who received it with another deeply uttered "I thank you," which spoke the sterling feelings of her gratitude better than a thousand combined phrases, he commanded the waterman to pull in for Paul's Wharf, which they were now approaching.

"We have not time," said Green-jacket; "we must not be stopping every instant."

But, upon Nicol's answer, upon his commands being obeyed, and adding, that it was for the purpose of attaining the lady ashore, the waterman declared he would rather have her ransom than her company; and at the wherry alongside of the wharf accordingly left two of the porters who ply in such places, were still ordered to undertake the charge of the plunder as strong box, and at the same time to guide the way to the well-known mansion of John Christie, with whom all who lived in that neighbourhood were intimately acquainted.

The boat, much lightened of its load, went down to Thames at a rate increased in proportion. But we must forbear to pursue her in her voyage for a few minutes, more we have previously to mention the aim of Lord Glenvarloch's demonstration.

Mistress Martha Trophobis reached the shop in perfect safety, and was about to enter it, when a sudden gleam of the uncertainty of her situation, and of so singularly painful a task of telling her story, came over her so strongly, that she paused a moment at the very threshold of her proposed place of refuge to ask in what manner she could best proceed in the accomplishment of the friend whom Providence had lined up to her. Had she possessed that knowledge of the world, from which her habits of life had constantly excluded her, she might have known that the very sum of money which she brought along with her, might judiciously managed, have been a passport to her into the mansions of nobles, and the palaces of princes. But, however conscious of its general value, which seemed so many firms and companies, she was so unacquainted as to be most unimpairedly afraid that the means by which the wealth had been acquired, might exclude its inheritance from her even in the house of an humble tradesman.

While she thus delayed a more reasonable counter-heritation arose, in a considerable noise and altercation within the house, which grew louder and louder; the disputants issued forth upon the street or lane before the door.

The first who entered upon the scene was a tall, well-bred, hard-favoured man, who stalked out of a shop hastily, with a gait like that of a Spaniard in passion, who, doubting to add speed to his locomotion by running, only condescended, in the utmost trims of his angry haste, to add length to his stride. He forced about, as soon as he was out of the shop, upon his pursuit a dervish-looking, elderly, thin tradesman, no other than John Christie himself, the owner of the shop and tenement, by whom he seemed to be followed, and who was in a state of agitation more than is usually expressed by such a man.

"I'll hear no more on't," said the personage who at appeared on the scene.—"Sir, I will hear no more on it. Besides being a most false and impudent man, as I can testify it in Scotland and England, Sir, Mr. Grandfather Magnanimus, he returned with a broad accentuation of the first vowel well known in the colleges of Edinburgh and Glasgow. Let us we can only express in print by doubling the first of letters and of vowels, and which would be cheered the cockles of the reigning monarch had been with a hearing, as he was a fervent scholar.

What he deemed the genuine pronunciation of the man's tongue, than for any of the royal prerogative, for which he was at times disposed to meet as vigorously in his speeches to Parliament.

"I say not an ounce of reason change," said John Christie in reply, "what you call it, but it is true. I am a free Englishman, and have but to speak truth in my own concerns, and your master is a better than a villain, and you are no more than swaggering casemate, whose head I will presently rub, as I have known it well broken before on a fair occasion."

And, as saying, he flourished the passing shovel, which usually made clean the steps of his little shop, which he had caught up as the readiest weapon, striking his furrowed cheek, and advanced there.

It upon him. The cautious Scot (for such our class must already have pronounced him, from his dress and paloury) drew back as the enraged shop-chandler approached, but in a wary manner, and bearing his hand on his sword hilt rather in the act of one who was losing habitual forbearance and caution of deportment than as alarmed by the attack of an antagonist inferior to himself in youth, strength, and weapons.

"Hide back," he said, "Maister Christie—I may bid back, and consult your safety, man. I have owned working you in your own house under terrible provocation, because I am ignorant how the laws here may pronounce respecting burglary and home-robbery, and such matters, and besides, I would not willingly hurt ye, man, even on the counter, that is free to us both, but I would your kindness of long since, and partly consider ye as a poor deceived creature. But don't do me out and I am not wont to swear, but if you touch my Scotch shoulder with the stick of yours, I will make an inch of my Andromeda's dervishish intimacy with your guts, neighbour."

And therewithal, though still retreating from the brandished shovel, he made one third of the basket-hilted broadsword which he wore, visible from the sheath. The wrath of John Christie was abated, either by his natural temperance of disposition, or perhaps in part by the glimpse of cold steel, which flashed on him from his adversary's last retreat.

I would do well to cry out on thee, and have thee dashed at the wharf," he said, grounding his shovel, however, at the same time, "for a paltry swaggoner, that would draw thy bit of iron there on an honest citizen before his own door, but get thee gone, and reckon on a salt set for thy supper, if thou shouldst ever come near my house again. I wish it had been at the bottom of the Thames where it first gave the use of its roof to smooth-faced, oily-tongued, double-minded Scots thieves."

"It's an ill bird that souls its own nest," replied his adversary, not perhaps the less bold that he now matters were taking the turn of a pacific debate; "and a pity it is that a kindly Scot should ever have married in foreign parts, and given life to a pure proud, pudding-headed, fat-patted, lean-brained Southern, even such as you, Maister Christie. But fare ye well, fare ye well, far ever and a day, and, if you quarrel with a Scot again, man, say as much to all as will as ye like, but say none of his patron or of his country men, or it will scarce be your flat cap that will keep your long legs from the sharp abridgment of a Highland whinger man."

"And, if you continue your insolence to me before my own door, were it but two minutes longer," retorted John Christie, "I will call the constable, and make your Scottish ankles acquainted with an English pair of stocks!"

As saying, he turned to retire into his shop with some show of victory, for his enemy, whatever might be his innate valour, manifested no desire to drive matters to extremity; conscious, perhaps, that whatever advantage he might gain in single combat with John Christie, would be more than overbalanced by incurring an affair with the constituted authorities of Old England, not at that time apt to be particularly favourable to their new fellow-subjects, in the various successive broils which were then constantly taking place between the individuals of two proud nations, who still retained a stronger sense of their national animosity during centuries, than of that late wound for a few years under the government of the same prince.

Mrs. Martha Trophobis had dwelt too long in Altona, to be either surprised or terrified at the altercation she had witnessed. Indeed, she only wondered that the debate did not end in some of those acts of violence by which they were wont to settle their differences in the Sanctuary. As the two parties were in each other, she, who had witnessed the quarrel, was more than usually alarmed, and, as if she were of the same nature, she was not at all surprised, or concerned, did not hesitate to say, Maister Christie, in return to his shop, and I will be with you, which Lord Glenvarloch had just said. It has been better acquainted with life and business, she would certainly have wanted for a more temperate manner, with she had reason to repent of her precipitation, when, without saying a single word, or taking the trouble to gather more of the information contained in the letter than was expressed in the subscription, the incensed ship-chandler threw it down on the ground, trampled it in high disdain, and, without addressing a single word to the bearer, except, indeed, something much more like a hearty curse than was perfectly consistent with his own grave appearance, he retired into his shop and shut the hatch-door.

It was with the most inexpressible anguish that the desolate, friendless, and unhappy female, thus beheld her sole hope of succour, countenance, and protection, vanish at once, without being able to conceive a reason; for to do her justice, the idea that her friend, whom she knew by the name of Nigel Grahame, had imposed on her, a solution which might readily have occurred to many in her situation, never once entered her mind. Although it was not her temper easily to bend her mind to entreaty, she could not help exclaiming after the ireful and retreating ship-chandler,—"Good Master, hear me but a moment! for mercy's sake, for honesty's sake!"

"Mercy and honesty from him, mistress!" said the Scot, who, though he essayed not to interrupt the retreat of his antagonist, still kept stout possession of the field of action,—"ye might as weel expect brandy from bean-stalks, or milk from a craig of blue whunstone. The man is mad, horn mad, to boot."

"I must have mistaken the person to whom the letter was addressed, then;" and, as she spoke, Mistress Martha Trapbois was in the act of stooping to lift the paper which had been so uncourteously received. Her companion, with natural civility, anticipated her purpose; but, what was not quite so much in etiquette, he took a sly glance at it as he was about to hand it to her, and his eye having caught the subscription, he said, with surprise, "Glenvarloch—Nigel Olisaut of Glenvarloch! Do you know the Lord Glenvarloch, mistress?"

"I know not of whom you speak," said Mrs. Martha, peevishly. "I had that paper from one Master Nigel Gram."

"Nigel Grahame!—umph.—O, ay, very true—I had forgot," said the Scotsman. "A tall, well-set young man, about my height; bright blue eyes like a hawk's; a pleasant speech, something leaning to the kindly north-country accentuation, but not much, in respect of his having been resident abroad?"

"All this is true—and what of it all?" said the daughter of the miser.

"Hair of my complexion?"

"Yours is red," replied she.

"I pray you, peace," said the Scotsman. "I was going to say—of my complexion, but with a deeper shade of the chestnut. Weel, mistress, if I have guessed the man aright, he is one with whom I am, and have been, intimate and familiar,—nay, I may truly say I have done him much service in my time, and may live to do him more. I had indeed a sincere goodwill for him, and I doubt he has been much at a loss since we parted; but the fault is not mine. Wherefore, as this letter will not avail you with him to whom it is directed, you may believe that Heaven hath sent it to me, who have a special regard for the writer—I have, besides, as much mercy and honesty within me as man can weel make his bread with, and am willing to aid any distressed creature, that is my friend's friend, with my counsel, and otherwise, so that I am not put to much charges, being in a strange country, like a poor lamb that has wandered from its ain native hirsle, and leaves a tail of its woo' in every d—d Southron bramble that comes across it." While he spoke thus, he read the contents of the letter, without waiting for permission, and then continued,—"And so this is all that you are wanting, my dove? nothing more than safe and honourable lodging, and sustenance, upon your own charges?"

"Nothing more," said she. "If you are a man and a Christian, you will help me to what I need so much."

"A man I am," replied the formal Caledonian, "e'en sic as ye see me; and a Christian I may call myself, though unworthy, and though I have heard little pure doctrine since I came hither—a' polluted with men's devices—ahem! Weel, and if ye honest woman," (here he peeped under her) "as an honest woman ye seem likely to be—let me tell you, they are a kind of cattle not in the streets of this city as I would desire to be. I was almost strangled with my own band by twa pallians, wha wanted yestreen, nae farther gharle me into a change-house—however, if ye cent honest woman," (here he took another) "features certainly bearing no beauty which confer suspicion," "as decent and honest ye seem why, I will advise you to a decent house, wha will get dounce, quiet entertainment, on reasonable terms, and the occasional benefit of my own care and direction—that is, from time to time, as my avocations may permit."

"May I venture to accept of such an offer, stranger?" said Martha, with natural hesitation.

"Troth, I see nothing to hinder you, mistress," replied the bonny Scot; "ye can but see the plan do after as ye think best. Besides, we are no strangers, neither; for I know your friend, as it's like, know mine, whilk knowledge, on hand, is a medium of communication between us as the middle of the string connecteth its two or extremities. But I will enlarge on this far we pass along, gin ye list to bid your twa lads of porters there lift up your little kist between whilk a true Scotsman might carry under his arm. Let me tell you, mistress, ye will soon make a pock-end of it in Lon'on, if you hire twa knaves the work of ane."

So saying, he led the way, followed by Mrs. Martha Trapbois, whose singular destiny, she had heaped her with wealth, had left her, for comfort, no wiser counsellor, or more distinguished protector, than honest Richie Moniplies, a discarded vintner.

CHAPTER XXVII.

This way lie safety and a sure retreat:

Yonder lie danger, shame, and punishment.

Most welcome danger then—Nay, let me say,

Though spoke with swelling heart—welcome e'en the

And welcome punishment—for, call me guilty,

I do but pay the tax that's due to justice;

And call me guiltless, then that punishment

Is shame to those alone who do inflict it.—The Tempest

We left Lord Glenvarloch, to whose fortune story chiefly attaches itself, gliding swiftly down the Thames. He was not, as the reader may have served, very affable in his disposition, or apt to enter into conversation with those into whose company he was casually thrown. This was, indeed, an error in his conduct, arising less from pride, though of feeling we do not pretend to exculpate him, than from a sort of bashful reluctance to mix in the conversation of those with whom he was not familiar. A fault only to be cured by experience and knowledge of the world, which soon teaches every sensible acute person the important lesson, that amusement, and what is of more consequence, that information and increase of knowledge, are to be derived from the conversation of every individual whatever, whom he is thrown into a natural train of communication. For ourselves, we can assure the reader—and perhaps if we have ever been able to give him amusement, it is owing in a great degree to the cause—that we never found ourselves in conversation with the stupidest of all possible companions, in a post-chaise, or with the most arrant cumberhead that ever occupied a place in the mail-coach, while finding, that, in the course of our conversation with him, we had some ideas suggested to us, either of fact or of theory, or some information communicated in the course of our journey, which we should have regretted not to have learned, and which we should have been sorry to have immediately forgotten. But Nigel, somewhat immured within the Bastille of his reason, some philosopher (Tom Paine, we think) has been enough expressed that sort of shyness which in dignified situations are apt to be beset with, not from not exactly knowing how far, or with whom they ought to be familiar, than from any real aristocratic pride. Besides, the immediate pressure of our adventurer's own affairs was such as exclusively to engross his attention.

He sat, therefore, wrapt in his cloak, in the stern of the boat, with his mind entirely bent upon the probable issue of the interview with his Sovereign, which it was his purpose to seek; for which abstraction of mind he may be fully justified, although, perhaps, by questioning the watermen who were transporting him down the river, he might have discovered matters of high concernment to him.

At any rate, Nigel remained silent till the wherry approached the town of Greenwich, when he commanded the men to put in for the nearest landing-place, as it was his purpose to go ashore there, and dismiss them from farther attendance.

"That is not possible," said the fellow with the green jacket, who, as we have already said, seemed to take on himself the charge of pilotage. "We must," he continued, "to Gravesend, where a Scottish vessel, which dropt down the river last tide for the very purpose, lies with her anchor a-peak, waiting to carry you to your own dear northern country. Your snimock is slung, and all is ready for you, and you are of going ashore at Greenwich, as seriously as if it were a thing were possible!"

"I see no impossibility," said Nigel, "in your land-me where I desire to be landed; but very little possibility of your carrying me any where I am not desirous of going."

"Why, whether do you manage the wherry, or we, master?" asked Green-jacket, in a tone betwixt jest and earnest; "I take it she will go the way we row."

"Ay," retorted Nigel, "but I take it you will row on the course I direct you, otherwise your chance of payment is but a poor one."

"Suppose we are content to risk that," said the untutored waterman, "I wish to know how you, who are so big—I mean no offence, master, but you do are big—would help yourself in such a case?"

"Simply thus," answered Lord Glenvarloch—"You are me, an hour since, bring down to the boat a trunk of neither of you could lift. If we are to contest the destination of our voyage, the same strength which tossed that chest into the wherry, will suffice to fling you out of it; wherefore, before we begin the fight, I pray you to remember, that, whither I would go, there I will oblige you to carry me."

"Gramercy for your kindness," said Green-jacket; "and now mark me in return. My comrade and I are two men—and you, were you as stout as George Green, can pass but for one; and two, you will all are more than a match for one. You mistake our reckoning, my friend."

"It is you who mistake," answered Nigel, who began to grow warm; "it is I who am three to two, and I—I carry two men's lives at my girdle."

"Saying, he opened his cloak and showed the two pistols which he had disposed at his girdle. Green-jacket was unmoved at the display.

"I have got," said he, "a pair of barkers that will catch yours," and he showed that he also was armed with pistols; "so you may begin as soon as you list."

"Then," said Lord Glenvarloch, drawing forth and holding a pistol, "the sooner the better. Take notice, would you as a ruffian, who have declared you will force on my person; and that I will shoot you through the head if you do not instantly put me ashore at Greenwich."

The other waterman, alarmed at Nigel's gesture, upon his oar; but Green-jacket replied coolly—"Look you, master, I should not care a tinker to venture a life with you on this matter; but the truth is, I am employed to do you good, and not to do you harm."

"By whom are you employed?" said the Lord Glenvarloch; "or who dare concern themselves in me, or my affairs, without my authority?"

"As to that," answered the waterman, in the same tone of indifference, "I shall not show my commis-

For myself, I care not, as I said, whether you stay at Greenwich to get yourself hanged, or go down on board the Royal Thistle, to make your escape to your own country; you will be equally out of my reach either way. But it is fair to put the choice before you."

"My choice is made," said Nigel. "I have told you thrice already it is my pleasure to be landed at Greenwich."

"Write it on a piece of paper," said the waterman, "that such is your positive will; I must have something to show to my employers, that the transgression of their orders lies with yourself, not with me."

"I choose to hold this trinket in my hand for the present," said Nigel, showing his pistol, "and will write you the acquittance when I go ashore."

"I would not go ashore with you for a hundred pieces," said the waterman. "Ill luck has ever attended you, except in small gaming; do me fair justice, and give me the testimony I desire. If you are afraid of foul play while you write it, you may hold my pistols, if you will." He offered the weapons to Nigel accordingly, who, while they were under his control, and all possibility of his being taken at advantage was excluded, no longer hesitated to give the waterman an acknowledgment, in the following terms:—

"Jack in the Green, with his mate, belonging to the wherry called the Jolly Raven, have done their duty faithfully by me, landing me at Greenwich by my express command; and being themselves willing and desirous to carry me on board the Royal Thistle, presently lying at Gravesend." Having finished this acknowledgment, which he signed with the letters, N. O. G. as indicating his name and title, he again requested to know of the waterman, to whom he delivered it, the name of his employers.

"Sir," replied Jack in the Green, "I have respected your secret, do not you seek to pry into mine. It would do you no good to know for whom I am taking this present trouble; and, to be brief, you shall not know it—and, if you will fight in the quarrel, as you said even now, the sooner we begin the better. Only this you may be cock-sure of, that we designed you no harm, and that, if you fall into any, it will be of your own wilful seeking." As he spoke, they approached the landing-place, where Nigel instantly jumped ashore. The waterman placed his small mail-trunk on the stairs, observing that there were plenty of spare hands about, to carry it where he would.

"We part friends, I hope, my lads," said the young nobleman, offering at the same time a piece of money more than double the usual fare, to the boatmen.

"We part as we met," answered Green-jacket; "and, for your money, I am paid sufficiently with this bit of paper. Only, if you owe me any love for the cast I have given you, I pray you not to dive so deep into the pockets of the next apprentice that you find fool enough to play the cavalier.—And you, you greedy swine," said he to his companion, who still had a longing eye fixed on the money which Nigel continued to offer, "push off, or, if I take a stretcher in hand, I'll break the knave's pate of thee." The fellow pushed off, as he was commanded, but still could not help muttering, "This was entirely out of waterman's rules."

Glenvarloch, though without the devotion of the "injured Thales" of the moralist, to the memory of that great princess, had now attained

"The hallow'd soil which gave Eliza birth," whose halls were now less respectably occupied by her successor. It was not, as has been well shown by a late author, that James was void either of parts or of good intentions; and his predecessor was at least as arbitrary in effect as he was in theory. But, while Elizabeth possessed a sternness of masculine sense and determination which rendered even her weaknesses, some of which were in themselves sufficiently ridiculous, in a certain degree respectable, James, on the other hand, was so utterly devoid of "firm resolve," so well called by the Scottish bard,

"The stalk of carle-hemp in man," that even his virtues and his good meaning became laughable, from the whimsical uncertainty of his conduct; so that the wisest things he ever said, and the best actions he ever did, were often touched with a strain of the ludicrous and fidgety character of the man. Accordingly, though at different periods of his reign he contrived to acquire with his people a certain degree of temporary popularity, it never long outlived the occasion which produced it; so true it is, that the mass of mankind will respect a monarch stained with actual guilt, more than one whose foibles render him only ridiculous.

To return from this digression. Lord Glenvarloch soon received, as Green-jacket had assured him, the offer of an idle bargeman to transport his baggage where he listed; but that where was a question of momentary doubt. At length, recollecting the necessity that his hair and beard should be properly arranged before he attempted to enter the royal presence, and desirous, at the same time, of obtaining some information of the motions of the Sovereign and of the Court, he desired to be guided to the next barber's shop, which we have already mentioned as the place where news of every kind circled and centred. He was speedily shown the way to such an emporium of intelligence, and soon found he was likely to hear all he desired to know, and much more, while his head was subjected to the art of a nimble tonsor, the glibness of whose tongue kept pace with the nimbleness of his fingers, while he ran on, without stint or stop, in the following excursive manner:

"The Court here, master?—yes, master—much to the advantage of trade—good custom stirring. His Majesty loves Greenwich—hunts every morning in the Park—all decent persons admitted that have the entries of the Palace—no rabble—frightened the King's horse with their hallooing, the uncombed slaves.—Yes, sir, the beard more peaked? Yes, master, so it is worn. I know the last cut—dress several of the courtiers—one valet-of-the-chamber, two pages of the body, the clerk of the kitchen, three running footmen, two dog-boys, and an honourable Scottish knight, Sir Munko Malgrowler."

"Malagrowther, I suppose?" said Nigel, thrusting in his conjectural emendation, with infinite difficulty, betwixt two clauses of the barber's text.

"Yes, sir—Malcrowder, sir, as you say, sir—hard names the Scots have, sir, for an English mouth. Sir Munko is a handsome person, sir—perhaps you know him—bating the loss of his fingers, and the lameness of his leg, and the length of his chin. Sir, it takes me one minute, twelve seconds, more time to trim that chin of his, than any chin that I know in the town of Greenwich, sir. But he is a very comely gentleman, for all that; and a pleasant—a very pleasant gentleman, sir—and a good-humoured, saving that he is so deaf he can never hear good of any one, and so wise, that he can never believe it; but he is a very good-natured gentleman for all that, except when one speaks too low, or when a hair turns awry.—Did I graze you, sir? We shall put it to rights in a moment, with one drop of styptic—my styptic, or rather my wife's, sir—She makes the water herself. One drop of the styptic, sir, and a bit of black taffeta patch, just big enough to be the saddle to a flea, sir—Yes, sir, rather improves than otherwise. The Prince had a patch the other day, and so had the Duke; and, if you will believe me, there are seventeen yards three quarters of black taffeta already cut into patches for the courtiers."

"But Sir Mungo Malagrowther?" again interjected Nigel, with difficulty.

"Ay, ay, sir—Sir Munko, as you say; a pleasant, good-humoured gentleman as ever—To be spoken with, did you say? O ay, easily to be spoken withal, that is, as easily as his infirmity will permit. He will presently, unless some one hath asked him forth to breakfast, be taking his bone of broiled beef at my neighbour Ned Kilderkin's yonder, removed from over the way. Ned keeps an eating-house, sir, famous for pork-griskins; but Sir Munko cannot abide pork, no more than the King's most Sacred Majesty,*

* The Scots, till within the last generation, disliked swine's flesh as an article of food as much as the Highlanders do at present. It was remarked as extraordinary rapacity, when the Border depredators condescended to make prey of the accursed race, whom the fiend made his habitation. Ben Jonson, in drawing James's character, says, he loved "no part of a swine."

nor my Lord Duke of Lennox, nor Lord I—nay, I am sure, sir, if I touched you th was your fault, not mine.—But a single drop styptic, another little patch that would doublet for a flea, just under the left mon will become you when you smile, sir, as dimple; and if you would salute your fair but I beg pardon, you are a grave gentle grave to be so young.—Hope I have given it is my duty to entertain customers—my and my pleasure—Sir Munko Malcrowder, sir, I dare say he is at this moment in Ned's house, for few folks ask him out, now Lennox is gone to London. You will go again—yes, sir—there you shall find him with single ale, stirred with a sprig of rosemary never drinks strong potations, sir, unless Lord Huntinglen—take heed, sir—or any son who asks him forth to breakfast—but he always drinks at Ned's, with his broiled beef or mutton—or, it may be, lamb at the but not pork, though Ned is famous for his But the Scots never eat pork—strange to folk think they are a sort of Jews. Then seinblance, sir,—Do you not think so? I call our most gracious Sovereign the sec mon, and Solomon, you know, was king of so the thing bears a face, you see. I believe will find yourself trimmed now to your will be judged by the fair mistress of your! Grave pardon—no offence, I trust. Pray, a glass—one touch of the crisping tongs, to a straggler. Thank your munificence, sir—custom while you stay in Greenwich. We have a tune on that ghittern, to put you in concord for the day?—Twang, twang twang, dillo. Something out of tune, sir—hands to touch it—we cannot keep these artists. Let me help you with your clack, sir—You would not play yourself, sir, wall. Way to Sir Munko's eating-house?—Yes, it is Ned's eating-house, not Sir Munko's.—Th to be sure, eats there, and that makes it his house in some sense, sir—ha, ha! Yonder moved from over the way, new whitewash and red lattice—fat man in his doublet at Ned himself, sir—worth a thousand pounds—better singeing pigs' faces than trimming—but ours is the less mechanical vocation well, sir; hope your custom." So saying length permitted Nigel to depart, whose ear tormented with his continued babble, tingle had ceased, as if a bell had been rung close for the same space of time.

Upon his arrival at the eating-house, who posed to meet with Sir Mungo Malagrowther, whom, in despair of better advice, he true receive some information as to the best mode of inducing himself into the royal presence. Lord loch found, in the host with whom he co the consequential taciturnity of an English to pass in the world. Ned Kilderkin, a banker writes, only touching the need, asked if Sir Mungo Malagrowther was the pried, No. Being interrogated whether he pected? he said, Yes. And being again say when he was expected, he answered. As Lord Glenvarloch next inquired, wh self could have any breakfast? the land not even a syllable in reply, but, ushering neat room where there were several tables, one of them before an arm-chair, and Lord Glenvarloch to take possession, he him, in a very few minutes, a substantial roast-beef, together with a foaming tankard refreshment the keen air of the river disp notwithstanding his mental embarrassments much honour.

While Nigel was thus engaged in disc commons, but raising his head at the s whenever he heard the door of the apartm eagerly desiring the arrival of Sir Mungo Malagrowther. (an event which had seldom been ex any one with so much anxious interest,) a; seemed, of at least equal importance with the first, entered into the apartment, and began to hold a colloquy with the publican, who thought proper to carry on the conference on his side unbouqueted. The important gentleman's occupation might be judged from his dress. A milk-white jerkin, and a white kersey; a white apron twisted around his body in the manner of a sash, in which, instead of a like dagger, was stuck a long-bladed knife, and with buck's horn; a white nightcap on his head, under which his hair was neatly tucked, sufficiently portrayed him as one of those priests of Cook whom the vulgar call cooks; and the air with which he rated the publican for having neglected to provide some provisions to the Palace, showed that he catered to royalty itself.

"This will never answer," he said; "Master Kilderkin—the King twice asked for sweetbreads, and asparagus, which are a favourite dish of his Sacred Majesty, and they were not to be had, because Master Kilderkin had not supplied them to the clerk of the kitchen, as by bargain bound." Here Kilderkin made some apology, brief, according to his nature, and muttered in a lowly tone after the fashion of all who find themselves in a scrape. His superior replied, in a lofty strain of voice, "Do not tell me of the carrier and his wain, and of the hen-coops coming from Norfolk with the poultry; a loyal man would have sent an express—he would have gone upon tumps, like Widdrington. What if the King had lost his appetite, Master Kilderkin? What if his most Sacred Majesty had lost his dinner? O Master Kilderkin, if you had but the just sense of the dignity of your profession, which is told of by the witty African, 'for so the King's most excellent Majesty delectates him, Publius Terentius, Tanquam in speculo patinas inspicere jubet.'"

"You are learned, Master Linklater," replied the English publican, compelling, as it were with difficulty, his mouth to utter three or four words consecutively.

"A poor smatterer," said Mr. Linklater; "but it would be a shame to us, who are his most excellent Majesty's countrymen, not in some sort to have checked those arts wherewith he is so deeply imbued—ad exemplar, Master Kilderkin, totus componitur—which is as much as to say, as the King says the cook learns. In brief, Master Kilderkin, though had the luck to be bred where humanities may be had at the matter of an English five groats by the quarter, I, like others, have acquired—ahem—!"—Here, the speaker's eye having fallen upon Lord Glenvarloch, he suddenly stopped in his learned language, with such symptoms of embarrassment as caused Ned Kilderkin to stretch his taciturnity so far as not only to ask him what he ailed, but whether he would take any thing.

"Nothing," replied the learned rival of the philosophical Syrus; "Nothing—and yet I do feel a little riddy. I could taste a glass of your dame's aqua bilis."

"I will fetch it," said Ned, giving a nod; and he was no sooner turned, than the cook walked near him where Lord Glenvarloch was seated, and regarding him with a look of significance, where more meant than met the ear, said—"You are a stranger from Greenwich, sir. I advise you to take the opportunity to step into the Park—the western wicket was when I came hither; I think it will be locked presently, so you had better make the best of your way—is, if you have any curiosity. The venison is now in season just now, sir, and there is a pleasure in looking at a hart of grease. I always think they are bounding so blithely past, what a pleasure would be, to broach their plump haunches on a stand and to embattle their breasts in a noble fortification of puff-paste, with plenty of black pepper."

He said no more, as Kilderkin re-entered with the animal, but edged off from Nigel without waiting any longer, only repeating the same look of intelligence which he had accosted him.

Nothing makes men's wits so alert as personal interest. Nigel took the first opportunity which his attention to the yeoman of the royal kitchen permitted, to discharge his reckoning, and readily obtained a direction to the wicket in question. He found it upon the latch, as he had been taught to expect; and perceived that it admitted him to a narrow foot-path, which traversed a close and tangled thicket, designed for the cover of the does and the young fawns. Here he conjectured it would be proper to wait; nor had he been stationary above five minutes, when the cook, scalded as much with heat of motion as ever he had been at his huge fireplace, arrived almost breathless, and with his pass-key hastily locked the wicket behind him.

Ere Lord Glenvarloch had time to speculate upon this action, the man approached with anxiety, and said—"Good lord, my Lord Glenvarloch!—why will you endanger yourself thus?"

"You know me then, my friend?" said Nigel.

"Not much of that, my lord—but I know your honour's noble house well.—My name is Laurie Linklater, my lord."

"Linklater!" repeated Nigel. "I should recollect"—

"Under your lordship's favour," he continued, "I was 'prentice, my lord, to old Mungo Moniplies, the fletcher at the wanton West-Port of Edinburgh, which I wish I saw again before I died. And, your honour's noble father having taken Richie Moniplies into his house to wait on your lordship, there was a sort of connexion, your lordship sees."

"Ah!" said Lord Glenvarloch, "I had almost forgot your name, but not your kind purpose. You tried to put Richie in the way of presenting a supplication to his Majesty?"

"Most true, my lord," replied the King's cook. "I had like to have come by mischief in the job; for Richie, who was always wilful, 'wadna be guided by me,' as the sang says. But nobody amongst these brave English cooks can kittle up his Majesty's most sacred palate with our own gusty Scottish dishes. So I've betook myself to my craft, and concocted a mess of friar's chicken for the soup, and a savoury hachis, that made the whole cabal coup the crans; and, instead of disgrace, I came by preferment. I am one of the clerks of the kitchen now, make me thankful—with a finger in the purveyor's office, and may get my whole hand in by and by."

"I am truly glad," said Nigel, "to hear that you have not suffered on my account,—still more so at your good fortune."

"You bear a kind heart, my lord," said Linklater, "and do not forget poor people; and, troth, I see not why they should be forgotten, since the King's errand may sometimes fall in the cadger's gate. I have followed your lordship in the street, just to look at such a stately shoot of the old oak-tree; and my heart jumped into my throat, when I saw you sitting openly in the eating-house yonder, and knew there was such danger to your person."

"What! there are warrants against me, then?" said Nigel.

"It is even true, my lord; and there are those are willing to blacken you as much as they can.—God forgive them, that would sacrifice an honourable house for their own base ends!"

"Amen," said Nigel.

"For, say your lordship may have been a little wild, like other young gentlemen"—

"We have little time to talk of it, my friend," said Nigel. "The point in question is, how am I to get speech of the King?"

"The King, my lord!" said Linklater, in astonishment; "why, will not that be rushing wilfully into danger—scalding yourself, as I may say, with your own ladle?"

"My good friend," answered Nigel, "my experience of the Court, and my knowledge of the circumstances in which I stand, tell me, that the manliest and most direct road is, in my case, the surest and the safest. The king has both a head to apprehend what is just, and a heart to do what is kind."

"It is even true, my lord, and so we, his old servants, know," added Linklater; "but, wo's me, if you knew how many folks make it their daily and nightly purpose to set his head against his heart, and his heart against his head—to make him do hard things because they are called just, and unjust things because they are represented as kind. Wo's me! it is with his Sacred Majesty, and the favourites who work upon him, even according to the homely proverb that men taunt my calling with,—'God sends good meat, but the devil sends cooks.'

"It signifies not talking of it, my good friend," said Nigel, "I must take my risk—my honour pre-emptorily demands it. They may maim me, or beggar me, but they shall not say I fled from my accusers. My peers shall hear my vindication."

"Your peers?" exclaimed the cook—"Alack-a-day, my lord, we are not in Scotland, where the nobles can bang it out bravely, were it even with the King himself now and then. This mess must be cooked in the Star-Chamber, and that is an oven seven times heated, my lord;—and yet, if you are determined to see the King, I will not say but you may find some favour, for he likes well any thing that is appealed directly to his own wisdom, and sometimes, in the like cases, I have known him stick by his own opinion, which is always a fair one. Only mind, if you will forgive me, my lord—mind to spice high with Latin; a curn or two of Greek would not be amiss; and, if you can bring in any thing about the judgment of Solomon, in the original Hebrew, and season with a merry jest or so, the dish will be the more palatable.—Truly, I think, that, besides my skill in art, I owe much to the stripes of the Rector of the High School, who imprinted on my mind that cooking scene in the Heautontimorumenos."

"Leaving that aside, my friend," said Lord Glenvarloch, "can you inform me which way I shall most readily get to the sight and speech of the King?"

"To the sight of him readily enough," said Linklater; "he is galloping about these alleys, to see them strike the hart, to get him an appetite for a nooning—and that reminds me I should be in the kitchen. To the speech of the King you will not come so easily, unless you could either meet him alone, which rarely chances, or wait for him among the crowd that go to see him alight. And now, farewell, my lord, and God speed!—if I could do more for you, I would offer it."

"You have done enough, perhaps, to endanger yourself," said Lord Glenvarloch, "I pray you to be gone, and leave me to my fate."

The honest cook lingered, but a nearer burst of the horns apprized him that there was no time to lose; and, acquainting Nigel that he would leave the postern-door on the latch to secure his retreat in that direction, he bade God bless him, and farewell.

In the kindness of this humble countryman, flowing partly from national partiality, partly from a sense of long-remembered benefits, which had been scarce thought on by those who had bestowed them, Lord Glenvarloch though he saw the last touch of sympathy which he was to receive in this cold and courtly region, and felt that he must now be sufficient to himself, or be utterly lost.

He traversed more than one alley guided by the sounds of the chase, and met several of the inferior attendants upon the King's sport, who regarded him only as one of the spectators who were sometimes permitted to enter the Park by the concurrence of the officers about the Court. Still there was no appearance of James, or any of his principal courtiers, and Nigel began to think whether, at the risk of incurring disgrace similar to that which had attended the rash exploit of Richie Moniplies, he should not repair to the Palace-gate, in order to address the King on his return, when Fortune presented him the opportunity of doing so, in her own way.

He was in one of those long walks by which the Park was traversed, when he heard, first a distant rustling, then the rapid approach of hoofs shaking the firm earth on which he stood; then a distant halloo, warned by which he stood up by the side of the avenue, leaving free room for the passage of the chase. The stag, reeling, covered with foam, and blackened with sweat, his nostrils expanded as he gasped for breath, made a shift to come up as far as where Nigel stood, and, without turning to bay, was there pulled down by two tall greyhounds of the breed of the hardy deer-stalkers of the Scottish Borders, but which has been long unknown in England. The dog struck at the buck's throat, another at his sharp nose and fangs, I might almost say animal's bowels. It would have been a Lord Glenvarloch, himself persecuted as if he had thought upon the occasion like the choleric Jacques; but habit is a strange master, and fear that his feelings on the occasion were those of the practised huntsman than of the noble. He had no time, however, to indulge them, what befell.

A single horseman followed the chase, up so thoroughly subjected to the rein, that it was a touch of the bridle as if it had been a mechanical pulse operating on the nicest piece of machinery, seated deep in his demi-pique saddle, and ed up there as to make falling almost impossible for the rider, without either fear or hesitation, to cease or diminish the speed at which he rode, even on the most animating occasions of the chase. He seldom exceeded three fourths of a gallop, keeping his haunches under him, and never pushing forward beyond the managed pace of the King. The security with which he chose to ride even this favourite, and, in the ordinary of what dangerous amusement, as well as the equipage, marked King James. No attendant within sight; indeed, it was often a necessity to permit the Sovereign to suppose he was ridden and distanced all the rest of the chase.

"Weel dune, Bash—weel dune, Battie," he claimed, as he came up. "By the honour of the King, ye are a credit to the Braes of Balwhither!—horse, man," he called out to Nigel, waving his hand to see to whom he had addressed himself. "Haud my naig, and help me down out o' the saddle—deil ding your saul, sirrah, canna ye mak for these lazy smaiks come up?—haud the reins—dinna let him swerve—now, haud the reins, man, and now we are on terra firma, saying, without casting an eye on his ass, to the King Jamie, unsheathing the short, sharp (couteau de chasse), which was the only weapon he carried, and which he drew with great alacrity across the throat of the buck, and put an end to its struggles and its agonies.

Lord Glenvarloch, who knew well the occasion demanded, hung the buck by the King's palfrey on the branch of a tree, and, duteously down, turned the slaughtered deer back, and kept the quarrée in that position. The King, too intent upon his sport to observe else, drew his couteau down the breast of the stag secundum artem; and, having made a cut as to ascertain the depth of the fat upon the back, exclaimed, in a sort of rapture, "Three white fat on the brisket!—prime—prime—crowned sinner—and deil ane o' the lazy lo myself! Seven—aught—aught times on the back! By G—d, a hart of aught times, and the best season! Bash and Battie, blessings on the root of ye! Buss me, my bairns, buss me." He accordingly fawned upon him, licked him with his jaws, and soon put him in such a state that he had seemed treason had been doing it upon his anointed body. "Bide down, with ye—Bide down, with a wanion," cried the most overturned by the obstreperous career of the large stag-hounds. "But ye are just like a gic ye an inch and ye take an ell.—And what be ye, friend?" he said, now finding leisure for a nearer view of Nigel, and observing what emotion of sylvan delight had escaped him, in the name of our train, man. In the name of the devil are ye?"

"An unfortunate man, sire," replied Nigel. "I dare say that," answered the King, "or I wad have seen naething of you. Myself a' their happiness to themselves; but let I wrang wi' them, and I am sure to hear of it." "And to whom else can we carry our c

"It would ill become me to attempt the exculpation of this unhappy man," said Lord Delgarno, "comparing the height of his present attempt, which has made all true men's blood curdle in their veins. Ye cannot avoid intimating, with all due submission to His Majesty's infallible judgment in justice to one who showed himself formerly only my enemy, though a now despised, a hummer in much blacker colours, than the Oldfaunt always appeared to me more as a Puritan than as a Papist."

"Ah, Delgarno, art thou there, man?" said the King. "And ye behaved to keep back, son, and leave to our own natural strength and the care of Providence, when we were in grips with the villain?"

"Providence, may it please your most Gracious Majesty would not fail to aid, in such a strait, the arms of three warring kingdoms," said Lord Delgarno.

"Surely man, surely," replied the King—"but a gift of your father with his long whinyard, would have been a blithe matter a short while syne; and in sure we will aid the ends of Providence in our favour, y' keeping near us two stout beef-eaters of the guard. And so the Oldfaunt is a Puritan?" not the less like to be a Papist for all that—for extremities meet, as is scholastic proveth. There are, as I have proved in my book, Puritans of papistical principles—it is just a new sort on an old horn."

Here the King was reminded by the Prince, who seemed perhaps that he was going to recite the whole Mathew's Sermon that it would be best to move towards the Palace, and consider what was to be done in satisfying the public mind, in whom the morning's adventure was likely to excite much speculation. As they entered the gate of the Palace a female bowed and presented a paper, which the King received, and, with a sort of groan, thrust it into his side pocket. The Prince expressed some curiosity to know its contents. "The valet in waiting will tell you them," said the King, "when I strip off my raiment. D'ye think, say, that I can read all that is thrust into my hands? No to me, man." (He pointed to the pockets of his great trunk breeches, which were stuffed with papers.)

"We are like an ass—that we should so speak—sopping between two burdens. Ay ay, Assus fortis quibus inter terminos, as the Vulgate hath it—ay, ay, Vidi terram quod esset optima et cupimus eam, sed non possumus eam habere, as the Vulgate hath it—ay, ay, Vidi terram quod esset optima et cupimus eam, sed non possumus eam habere—I saw this land of England, and became an overburdened king thereof."

"You are indeed well loaded, my dear dad and good son," said the Duke of Buckingham, receiving the paper which King James emptied out of his pockets.

"Ay ay," continued the monarch, "take them to me per carcerem borne—the one pouch stuffed with petitions, rather with ransomers, a fine time I have on't. On my conscience I believe the tale."

Cadmus was hieroglyphical, and that the dragon's with which he sowed were the letters he invented gave laughing, Baby Charles?—Mind what I say."

"I am I come here first from our air country where men are as rude as the weather, by my conscience, right and was a baddy lot, one would have thought the King had little to do but to walk by quiet waters, et equum refectum. But, I know how or why the man is air changed—read that libel upon us and on our regimen. The dragon's teeth are sown, Baby Charles; I pray God they bear a harvest harvest your day, if I sold not live to see it. God forbid I could, for there will be an awful day's homping at the shearing of them."

"I shall know how to stifle the crop in the blade—George?" said the Prince, turning to the favourite with a look expressive of some contempt for his father's apprehensions, and full of confidence in the prior firmness and decision of his own counsels.

While this discourse was passing, Nigel, in charge a purveyor-at-arms, was pushed and dragged through the small town, all the inhabitants of which, being been alarmed by the report of an attack on the King's life, now pressed forward to see the supposed savior. Amid the confusion of the moment he could mark the faces of the victuals, arrested into a stare of stupid wonder, and that of the barber grinning beneath horror and eager curiosity. He thought that he also had a glimpse of his waterman in the green jacket.

He had no time for remarks, being placed in a boat with the purveyor and two yeomen of the guard, and rowed up the river as fast as the arms of six stout watermen could pull against the tide. They passed the groves of masts which even then astonished the stranger with the extended commerce of London, and now approached those low and blackened walls of curtain and bastion, which exhibit here and there a piece of ordnance, and here and there a solitary sentinel under arms, but have otherwise so little of the military terrors of a citadel. A projecting low-browed arch, which had lowered over many an innocent, and many a guilty head, in similar circumstances, now spread its dark frowns over that of Nigel. The boat was put close up to the broad steps against which the tide was leaping as a lazy wave. The warder on duty looked from the wicket and spoke to the purveyor in whispers. In a few minutes the Lieutenant of the Tower appeared, received, and granted an acknowledgment for the body of Nigel, Lord Glenvarloch.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

To towers of Julius' London's lasting shame,
With many a foul and midnight murder done.—GRAY.

Such is the exclamation of Gray. Bards, long before him, had said something like it, and the same sentiment must, in some shape or other, have frequently occurred to those who, remembering the fate of other captives in that memorable state-prison, may have had but too much reason to anticipate their own. The dark and low arch, which seemed, like the entrance to Dante's Hell, to forbid hope of escape, the muttered sounds of the warders, and the gloomy light observed in opening and shutting the great wicket, the cold and constrained salutation of the Lieutenant of the fortress, who showed his prisoner that distant and measured respect which appears as a tax to decorum, all struck upon Nigel's heart, impressing on him the cruel consciousness of a fate.

"I am a prisoner," he said, the words escaping from him almost unawares; "I am a prisoner, and in the Tower?"

The Lieutenant bowed—"And it is my duty," he said, "to show your Lordship your chamber, where, I am compelled to say, my orders are to place you under some restraint. I will make it as easy as my duty permits."

Nigel only bowed in return to this compliment, and followed the Lieutenant to the ancient buildings on the western side of the parade, and adjoining to the chapel used in those days as a state-prison, but now ours as the mess-room of the officers of the guard upon duty at the fortress. The double doors were unlocked, the prisoner ascended a few steps, followed by the Lieutenant, and a warder of the highest rank. They entered a large, but irregular, low-roofed, and dark apartment, exhibiting a very scanty proportion of furniture. The warder had orders to light a fire, and attend to Lord Glenvarloch's commands in all things consistent with his duty; and the Lieutenant, having made his reverence with the customary compliment that he trusted his lordship would not long remain under his guardianship, took his leave.

Nigel would have asked some questions of the warder, who remained to put the apartment into order, but the man had caught the spirit of his office. He turned not to hear some of the prisoner's questions, though of the most ordinary kind, did not reply to others, and when he did speak, it was in a short and sullen tone, which, though not positively discourteous, was such as at least to encourage no further communication.

Nigel left him, therefore, to do his work in silence, and proceeded to amuse himself with the melancholy

* Tower's Chain, which comes from the Tower of London to the Thames, was, as its name implies, that by which persons charged with state offences were conveyed to their prison. When the tide is making and the streamer gate is closed from within the building, it used to be a most striking sight of the old galleys, but it is now much injured by the alterations, being half built up with masonry to support a steam-engine, or something of that sort.

task of deciphering the names, mottoes, verses, and hieroglyphics, with which his predecessors in captivity had covered the walls of their prison-house. There he saw the names of many a forgotten sufferer mingled with others which will continue in remembrance until English history shall perish. There were the pious effusions of the devout Catholic, poured forth on the eve of his sealing his profession at Tyburn, mingled with those of the firm Protestant, about to feed the fires of Smithfield. There the slender hand of the unfortunate Jane Grey, whose fate was to draw tears from future generations, might be contrasted with the bolder touch which impressed deep on the walls the Bear and Ragged Staff, the proud emblem of the proud Dudleys. It was like the roll of the prophet, a record of lamentation and mourning, and yet not unmixed with brief interjections of resignation, and sentences expressive of the firmest resolution.*

In the sad task of examining the miseries of his predecessors in captivity, Lord Glenvarloch was interrupted by the sudden opening of the door of his prison-room. It was the warder, who came to inform him, that, by order of the Lieutenant of the Tower, his lordship was to have the society and attendance of a fellow-prisoner in his place of confinement. Nigel replied hastily, that he wished no attendance, and would rather be left alone; but the warder gave him to understand, with a kind of grumbling civility, that the Lieutenant was the best judge how his prisoners should be accommodated, and that he would have no trouble with the boy, who was such a slip of a thing as was scarce worth turning a key upon.—“There, Giles,” he said, “bring the child in.”

Another warder put the “lad before him” into the room, and, both withdrawing, bolt crashed and chain clanged, as they replaced these ponderous obstacles to freedom. The boy was clad in a gray suit of the finest cloth, laid down with silver lace, with a buff-coloured cloak of the same pattern. His cap, which was a Montero of black velvet, was pulled over his brows, and, with the profusion of his long ringlets, almost concealed his face. He stood on the very spot where the warder had quitted his collar, about two steps from the door of the apartment, his eyes fixed on the ground, and every joint trembling with confusion and terror. Nigel could well have dispensed with his society, but it was not in his nature to behold distress, whether of body or mind, without endeavouring to relieve it.

“Cheer up,” he said, “my pretty lad. We are to be companions, it seems, for a little time—at least I trust your confinement will be short, since you are too young to have done aught to deserve long restraint. Come, come—do not be discouraged. Your hand is cold and trembles? the air is warm too—but it may be the damp of this darksome room. Place you by the fire.—What! weeping ripe, my little man? I pray you, do not be a child. You have no beard yet, to be dishonoured by your tears, but yet you should not cry like a girl. Think you are only shut up for playing truant, and you can pass a day without weeping, surely.”

The boy suffered himself to be led and seated by the fire, but, after retaining for a long time the very posture which he assumed in sitting down, he suddenly changed it in order to wring his hands with an air of the bitterest distress, and then, spreading them before his face, wept so plentifully, that the tears found their way in floods through his slender fingers.

Nigel was in some degree rendered insensible to his own situation, by his feelings for the intense agony by which so young and beautiful a creature seemed to be utterly overwhelmed; and, sitting down close beside the boy, he applied the most soothing terms which occurred, to endeavour to alleviate his distress; and with an action which the difference of their age rendered natural, drew his hand kindly along the long hair of the disconsolate child. The lad appeared so shy as even to shrink from this slight approach to familiarity—yet, when Lord Glenvarloch, perceiving and allowing for his timidity, sat down on the further side of the fire, he appeared to be more at his ease, and to hearken with some apparent interest to the arguments which from time to time Nigel used to induce him to moderate, at least, the violence of his grief. As the boy listened, his tears, though they continued to flow freely, seemed to escape from the source more easily, his sobs were less convulsive, and became gradually changed into low sighs, which succeeded each other, indicating as much sorrow, perhaps, but less alarm, than his first transport had shown.

“Tell me who and what you are, my pretty boy,” said Nigel.—“Consider me, child, as a comfort who wishes to be kind to you, would you but tell him how he can be so.”

“Sir—my lord, I mean,” answered the boy, timidly, and in a voice which could scarce be heard even across the brief distance which divided them.—“you are very good—and I—am very unhappy.”

A second fit of tears interrupted what else he intended to say, and it required a renewal of Lord Glenvarloch’s good-natured expostulations and encouragements, to bring him once more to such a posture as rendered the lad capable of expressing himself intelligibly. At length, however, he was able to say—“I am sensible of your goodness, my lord—grateful for it—but I am a poor unhappy creature, and, what is worse, have myself only to thank for my misfortunes.”

“We are seldom absolutely miserable, my acquaintance,” said Nigel, “without being more or less responsible for it—I may well say so, otherwise I had not been here to-day—but you are very young, and can have but little to answer for.”

“O sir! I wish I could say so—I have been wilful and obstinate—and rash and ungovernable—and now—now, how dearly do I pay the price!”

“Pshaw, my boy,” replied Nigel; “this is not some childish frolic—some breaking out of bounds—some truant trick—And yet how should any of us have brought you to the Tower?—There is something mysterious about you, young man, which I must enquire into.”

“Indeed, indeed, my lord, there is no harm in me,” said the boy, more moved it would seem by the last words, by which he seemed considerably alarmed, than by all the kind expostulations and arguments which Nigel had previously used.—“I am innocent—that is, I have done wrong, but not to deserve being in this frightful place.”

“Tell me the truth, then,” said Nigel, in a tone which commanded mingled with encouragement; “I have nothing to fear from me, and as little to hope perhaps—yet, placed as I am, I would know of whom I speak.”

“With an unhappy—boy, sir—and idle and naturally disposed, as your lordship said,” answered the boy, looking up, and showing a countenance in which paleness and blushes succeeded each other, and shamefacedness alternately had influence.—“I left my father’s house without leave, to see the hunt in the Park at Greenwich; there came a storm, and all the gates were shut—I was frightened, and hid myself in a thicket, and I was found by some of the rangers and examined—and they gave no good account of myself—and so I was brought hither.”

“I am an unhappy, a most unhappy being,” said Lord Glenvarloch, rising and walking through the apartment; “nothing approaches me but shares my own bad fate! Death and imprisonment do not stop, and involve all who are found near me. This boy’s story sounds strangely.—You say you were examined, my young friend—Let me pray you say whether you told your name, and your means of getting admission into the Park—if so, they surely would not have detained you?”

“O my lord,” said the boy, “I took care not to tell them the name of the friend that let me in; and I told to my father—I would not he knew where I now was for all the wealth in London!”

* These memorials of illustrious criminals, or of innocent persons who had the fate of such, are still preserved, though at one time, in the course of repairing the rooms, they were in some danger of being whitewashed. They are preserved at present with becoming respect, and have most of them been engraved.—See BAYLEY’S History and Antiquities of the Tower of London.

"But you do not expect," said Nigel, "that they will demand you till you let them know who and what you are?"

"What good will it do them to keep me unless a nature as myself?" said the boy; "they must let me go, were it but out of shame."

"Do not trust to that—tell me your name and station—I will communicate them to the Lieutenant—he is a man of quality and honour, and will not only be willing to procure your liberation, but also, I have no doubt, will intercede with your father. I am partly answerable for such poor aid as I can afford, to get me out of this embarrassment, since I occasioned the trouble owing to which you were arrested; so tell me your name, and your father's name."

"My name is you? O never, never!" answered the boy in a tone of deep emotion, the cause of which Nigel could not comprehend.

"Are you so much afraid of me, young man," he said, "because I am here accused and a prisoner? Consider, a man may be both, and deserve neither suspicion nor restraint. Why should you distrust me? To whom I am friendly, and I am myself so much in the same circumstances, that I cannot but pity your situation when I reflect on my own. Be wise; I have spoken kindly to you—I mean so kindly as I speak."

"O, I doubt it not, I doubt it not, my lord," said the boy, "and I could tell you all—that is, almost all." "Tell me nothing, my young friend, excepting what may assist me in being useful to you," said Nigel.

"You are generous, my lord," said the boy; "and am sure—O sure, I might safely trust to your honour—but yet—I am so sore hearted—I have got so rash, so unguarded—I can never tell you of a folly. Besides, I have already told too much to a whose heart I thought I had moved—yet I find myself here."

"To whom did you make this disclosure?" said Nigel.

"I dare not tell," replied the youth.

"There is something singular about you, my young man," said Lord Glenvarloch, withdrawing with a little degree of compulsion the hand with which the boy had again covered his eyes; "do not pain yourself with thinking on your situation just at present: your pulse is high, and your hand feverish—lay yourself on your side, and try to compose yourself to sleep. It is the readiest and best remedy for the fatigue with which you are worrying yourself."

"I thank you for your considerate kindness, my lord," said the boy; "with your leave I will remain a little space quiet in this chair. I am better thus than on the couch. I can think undisturbedly on what I have done, and have still to do; and if God will, I shall be able to do it." "It shall be so," said Nigel.

So saying, the boy drew his hand from Lord Nigel's, and drawing around him and partly over his face the folds of his ample cloak, he resigned himself to sleep. His companion, notwithstanding the exhausting scenes of this and the preceding day, continued his pensive walk up and down the apartment.

Every reader has experienced, that times occur, when, far from being lords of external circumstances, we are unable to rule even the wayward realm of his own thoughts. It was Nigel's natural wish to consider his own situation coolly, and fix on the course which it became him as a man of sense and courage to adopt; and yet, in spite of himself, and notwithstanding the deep interest of the critical state in which he was placed, it did so happen that his fellow-prisoner's situation occupied more of his thoughts than his own. There was no accounting for this ordering of the imagination, but also there was no trying with it. The pleading tones of one of the sweetest voices he had ever heard, still rung in his ear, though it seemed that sleep had now fettered the tongue of the speaker. He drew near on tiptoe to satisfy himself whether it were so. The folds of the cloak hid the lower part of his face entirely; but the nose, which had fallen a little aside, permitted him to see the forehead streaked with blue veins, the closed eyes, and the long black eyelashes.

"Poor child," said Nigel to himself, as he looked on him, nestled up as it were in the folds of his mantle, "the dew is yet on thy eyelashes, and thou hast fairly wept thyself asleep. Sorrow is a rough nurse to one so young and delicate as thou art. Peace be to thy slumbers, I will not disturb them. My own misfortunes require my attention, and it is to their contemplation that I must resign myself."

He attempted to do so, but was crossed at every turn by conjectures which intruded themselves as before, and which all regarded the sleeper rather than himself. He was angry and vexed, and expostulated with himself concerning the overwearing interest which he took in the concerns of one of whom he knew nothing, saving that the boy was forced into his company, perhaps as a spy, by those to whose custody he was committed—but the spell could not be broken, and the thoughts which he struggled to dismiss, continued to haunt him.

Thus passed half an hour or more; at the conclusion of which, the harsh sound of the revolving bolts was again heard, and the voice of the warder announced that a man desired to speak with Lord Glenvarloch. "A man to speak with me, under my present circumstances?—Who can it be?" And John Christie, his landlord of Paul's Wharf, resolved his doubts, by entering the apartment. "Welcome—most welcome, mine honest landlord!" said Lord Glenvarloch. "How could I have dreamt of seeing you in my present close lodgings?" And at the same time, with the frankness of old kindness, he walked up to Christie and offered his hand; but John started back at the look of a bandit.

"Keep your courtesies to yourself, my lord," said he, gruffly; "I have had as many of them already as may serve me for my life."

"Why, Master Christie," said Nigel, "what means this? I trust I have not offended you?"

"Ask me no questions, my lord," said Christie, bluntly. "I am a man of peace—I come not hither to wrangle with you at this place and season. Just suppose that I am well informed of all the obligations from your honour's nobleness, and then acquaint me, in as few words as may be, where is the unhappy woman—What have you done with her?"

"What have I done with her?" said Lord Glenvarloch. "Done with whom? I know not what you are speaking of."

"Oh, yes, my lord," said Christie; "play surmise as well as you will, you must have some guess that I am speaking of the poor fool that was my wife, till she became your lordship's light o' love."

"Your wife? Has your wife left you? and, if she has, do you mean to ask her of me?"

"Yes, my lord, singular as it may seem," returned Christie, in a tone of bitter irony, and with a sort of grim smile descending from the decomposition of his features, the gleam of his eye, and the frock which stood up behind him. "I do come to make that demand of your lordship. Doubtless, you are surprised I should take the trouble; but I cannot tell great men and little men think differently. She has lain in my bosom, and drunk of my cup, and such as she is, I cannot forget that, though I will never see her again—she must not starve, my lord, or do worse, to gain bread, though I reckon your lordship may think I am robbing the public in trying to change her course."

"By my faith as a Christian, by my honour as a gentleman," said Lord Glenvarloch, "I ought amiss has chanced with your wife, I know nothing of it. I trust in Heaven you are as much mistaken as imputing guilt to her, as in supposing me her partner in it."

"Pis! tis! my lord," said Christie, "why will you make it so tough? She is but the wife of a clad-pated old chandler, who was not enough to marry a wench twenty years younger than himself. Your lordship cannot have more glory by it than you have had already; and, as for advantage and solace, I take it Dame Nelly is now unnecessary to your gratification. I should be sorry to interrupt the course of your pleasure; an old wretch should have more consideration of his condition. But, your promiscuous lordship being mixed up here among other chaps, I take it of the kingdom, Dame Nelly cannot. I take it, be admitted to share the hours of dalliance which— Here the incensed husband stammered, broke off his tone of irony, and proceeded, striking his staff against the ground—"O that these false limbs of yours, which I wish had been hamstrung when they first crossed my honest threshold, were free from the fitters they have well deserved! I would give you the odds of your youth, and your weapon, and would beguile my soul to the foul fiend if I, with this piece of oak, did not make you such an example to all ungrateful pick-thank courtiers, that it should be a proverb to the end of time, how John Christie swaddled his wife's fine leman!"

"I understand not your insolence," said Nigel, "but I forgive it, because you labour under some strange delusion. In so far as I can comprehend your vehement charge, it is entirely undeserved on my part. You seem to impute to me the seduction of your wife—I trust she is innocent. For me, at least, she is as innocent as an angel in bliss. I never thought of her—never touched her hand or cheek save in honourable courtesy."

"O, ay—courtesy!—that is the very word. She always praised your lordship's honourable courtesy. Ye have cozened me between ye, with your courtesy. My lord—my lord, you came to us no very wealthy man—you know it. It was for no lucre of gain I took you and your swash-buckler, your Don Diego yonder, under my poor roof. I never cared if the little room were let or no; I could live without it. If you could not have paid for it, you should never have been asked. All the wharf knows John Christie has the means and spirit to do a kindness. When you first darkened my honest doorway, I was as happy as a man need to be, who is no youngster, and has the rheumatism. Nelly was the kindest and best-humoured wench—we might have a word now and then about a gown or a ribbon, but a kinder soul on the whole, and a more careful, considering her years, till you came—and what is she now!— But I will not be a fool to cry, if I can help it. What she is, is not the question, but where she is; and that I must learn, sir, of you."

"How can you, when I tell you," replied Nigel, "that I am as ignorant as yourself, or rather much more so? Till this moment, I never heard of any disagreement betwixt your dame and you."

"That is a lie," said John Christie, bluntly.

"How, you base villain!" said Lord Glenvarloch, "do you presume on my situation? If it were not that I hold you mad, and perhaps made so by some wrong sustained, you should find my being weaponless were no protection; I would beat your brains out against the wall."

"Ay, ay," answered Christie, "bully as ye list. Ye have been at the ordinaries, and in Alsatia, and learned the ruffian's rant, I doubt not. But I repeat, you have spoken an untruth, when you said you knew not of my wife's falsehood; for, when you were twitted with it among your gay mates, it was a common jest among you, and your lordship took all the credit they would give you for your gallantry and gratitude."

There was a mixture of truth in this part of the charge, which disconcerted Lord Glenvarloch exceedingly; for he could not, as a man of honour, deny that Lord Dalgarno, and others, had occasionally jested with him on the subject of Dame Nelly, and that, though he had not played exactly le faufacon des rices qu'il n'avoit pas, he had not at least been sufficiently anxious to clear himself of the suspicion of such a crime to men who considered it as a merit. It was therefore with some hesitation, and in a sort of qualifying tone, that he admitted that some idle jests had passed upon such a supposition, although without the least foundation in truth. John Christie would not listen to his vindication any longer. "By your own account," he said, "you permitted lies to be told of you in jest. How do I know you are speaking truth, now you are serious? You thought it, I suppose, a fine thing to wear the reputation of having dishonoured an honest family,—who will not think that you had real grounds for your base bravado to rest upon? I will not believe otherwise for one, and "It signifies little to any one what ails me," said the boy.

"True," replied Lord Glenvarloch; "but you knew ere you went to sleep how little I could assist you in your difficulties, and you seemed disposed, notwithstanding, to put some confidence in me."

"If I did, I have changed my mind," said the lad. "And what may have occasioned this change of mind, I trow?" said Lord Glenvarloch.—"Some men wake through their sleep—perhaps you have the gift of hearing in it?"

"No, but the Patriarch Joseph never dreamt truer dreams than I do."

"Indeed!" said Lord Glenvarloch. "And, pray, what dream have you had that has deprived me of your good opinion; for that, I think, seems the moral of the matter?"

"You shall judge yourself," answered the boy. "I dreamed I was in a wild forest, where there was a cry of hounds, and winding of horns, exactly as I heard at Greenwich Park."

"That was because you were in the Park this morning, you simple child," said Nigel.

"Stay, my lord," said the youth. "I went on in my dream, till, at the top of a broad green alley, I saw a noble stag which had fallen into the toils; and methought I knew that he was the very stag which the whole party were hunting, and that if the chase came to the dogs would tear him to pieces, or the hunters would cut his throat; and I had pity on the gallant stag, and though I was of a different kind from him, I thought I was somewhat afraid of him, I thought I would venture something to free so stately a creature; and I pulled out my knife, and just as I was beginning to cut the meshes of the net, the animal started up in my face in the likeness of a tiger, much larger and fiercer than any you may have seen in the herd of the wild beasts yonder, and was just about to tear me limb from limb, when you awakened me."

"Methinks," said Nigel, "I deserve more thanks than I have got, for rescuing you from such a dangerous waking you. But, my pretty master, methinks all this tale of a tiger and a stag has little to do with your change of temper towards me."

"I know not whether it has or no," said the lad; "but I will not tell you who I am."

"You will keep your secret to yourself then, I perceive," said Nigel, turning from him, and resuming his walk through the room; then stopping suddenly, he —"And yet you shall not escape from me without knowing that I penetrate your mystery."

"My mystery!" said the youth, at once alarmed and irritated,— "what mean you, my lord?"

"Only that I can read your dream without the assistance of a Chaldean interpreter, and my exposition is that my fair companion does not wear the dress of a man."

"And if I do not, my lord," said his companion, "I will start up, and folding her cloak tight around me, my dress, such as it is, covers one who will not be taken in."

"Many would call that speech a fair challenge," said Lord Glenvarloch, looking on her fixedly; "but men do not masquerade in men's clothes, to make use of men's weapons."

"I have no such purpose," said the seeming boy; "I have other means of protection, and powerful—"

"I would first know what is your purpose," said Lord Glenvarloch; "whatever you are—whatever you may have brought you into this ambiguous situation, I am sensible—every look, word, and action of yours, makes me sensible, that you are no proper object of importunity, far less of ill usage. What instances can have forced you into so doubtful a situation, I know not; but I feel assured there is, and be, nothing in them of premeditated wrong, which would expose you to cold-blooded insult. From you have nothing to dread."

"I expected nothing less from your nobleness, my lord," answered the female; "my adventure, though at first it was both desperate and foolish, is not so very foolish, nor my safety here so utterly unprotected, as at first sight—and in this strange dress, it may appear to be. I have suffered enough, and more than enough, by the degradation of having been seen in this unfeminine attire, and the comments you must necessarily have made on my conduct—but I thank God that I am so far protected, that I could not have been subjected to insult unavenged."

When this extraordinary explanation had proceeded thus far, the warder appeared, to place before Lord Glenvarloch a meal, which, for his present situation, might be called comfortable, and which, if not equal to the cookery of the celebrated Chevalier Beaujeu, was much superior in neatness and cleanliness to that of Alsatia. A warder attended to do the honours of the table, and made a sign to the disguised female to rise and assist him in his functions. But Nigel declaring that he knew the youth's parents, interfered, and caused his companion to eat along with him. She consented with a sort of embarrassment, which rendered her pretty features yet more interesting. Yet she maintained with a natural grace that sort of good-breeding which belongs to the table; and it seemed to Nigel, whether already prejudiced in her favour by the extraordinary circumstances of their meeting, or whether really judging from what was actually the fact, that he had seldom seen a young person comport herself with more decorous propriety, mixed with ingenuous simplicity; while the consciousness of the peculiarity of her situation threw a singular colouring over her whole demeanour, which could be neither said to be formal, nor easy, nor embarrassed, but was compounded of, and shaded with, an interchange of all these three characteristics. Wine was placed on the table, of which she could not be prevailed on to taste a glass. Their conversation was, of course, limited by the presence of the warder to the business of the table; but Nigel had, long ere the cloth was removed, formed the resolution, if possible, of making himself master of this young person's history, the more especially as he now began to think that the tones of her voice and her features were not so strange to him as he had originally supposed. This, however, was a conviction which he adopted slowly, and only as it dawned upon him from particular circumstances during the course of the repast.

At length the prison-meal was finished, and Lord Glenvarloch began to think how he might most easily enter upon the topic he meditated, when the warder announced a visitor.

"Soh!" said Nigel, something displeased, "I find even a prison does not save one from importunate visitations."

He prepared to receive his guest, however, while his alarmed companion flew to the large cradle-shaped chair, which had first served her as a place of refuge, drew her cloak around her, and disposed herself as much as she could to avoid observation. She had scarce made her arrangements for that purpose, when the door opened, and the worthy citizen, George Heriot, entered the prison-chamber.

He cast around the apartment his usual sharp, quick glance of observation, and, advancing to Nigel, said—"My lord, I wish I could say I was happy to see you."

"The sight of those who are unhappy themselves, Master Heriot, seldom produces happiness to their friends—I, however, am glad to see you."

He extended his hand, but Heriot bowed with much formal complaisance, instead of accepting the courtesy, which in those times, when the distinction of ranks was much guarded by etiquette and ceremony, was considered as a distinguished favour.

"You are displeased with me, Master Heriot," said Lord Glenvarloch, reddening, for he was not deceived by the worthy citizen's affectation of extreme reverence and respect.

"By no means, my lord," replied Heriot; "but I have been in France, and have thought it as well to import, along with other more substantial articles, a small sample of that good-breeding which the French are so renowned for."

"It is not kind of you," said Nigel, "to bestow the first use of it on an old and obliged friend."

Harriet only answered to this observation with a short dry cough, and then proceeded.

"Hem! hem!" I say, sham! My lord, as my French gentleman may not carry me far, I would willingly know whether I am to speak as a fraud, since your lordship is pleased to term me such; or whether I am, as befits my condition, to confine myself to the modest business which must be treated of between us."

"Speak as a friend by all means, Master Heron," said Nigel; "I perceive you have adopted some of the numerous prejudices against me, if not all of them. Speak out, and frankly—what I cannot deny I will at least concede."

"And I trust, my lord, refrain," said Heriot.

"As far as is in my power, certainly," answered Nigel.

"Ah! my lord," continued Fleet, "that is a melancholy though a necessary restriction; for how lightly may any one do an hundred times more than the degree of evil which it may be within his power to repair to the sufferers and to society? But we are not alone here," he said, stopping, and darting his shrewd eye towards the sufficed figure of the disengaged maiden, whose utmost efforts had not enabled her to adjust her position as altogether to escape observation. More anxious to prevent her being discovered than to keep his own affairs private, Nigel hastily answered—

"In a page of time; you may speak freely before him. He is of France, and knows no English."

"I am then to speak freely," said Horat, after a second glance at the chair; "perhaps my words may be more free than welcome."

"Go on, sir," said Nigel. "I have told you I can bear proof."

"In one word, then, my lord—why do I find you in this place, and whelmed with charges which must blacken a name rendered famous by ages of virtue?"

"Simply then, you find me here," said Nurgel, "hesitant, to begin from my original error, I would be wiser than my father."

"It was a difficult task, my lord," replied Harriet; "your father was valued generally as the wisest and one of the bravest men of Scotland."

"He commended me," continued Nigel, "to avoid all gambling, and I took upon me to modify this injunction into regulating my play according to my skill, money, and the course of my luck."

"Ay, self opinion, acting on a desire of acquiescence, my lord—you hoped to touch pitch and not to be defiled," answered Heriot. "Well, my lord, you need not say, for I have heard with much regret, how far this conduct diminished your reputation. Your next error I may without scruple remind you of—My lord, my lord, in whatever degree Lord Dalgarno may have failed towards you, the son of his father should have been sacred from your violence."

"You speak in cold blood, Master Heriot, and I was smarting under a thousand wrongs inflicted on me under the mask of friendship."

"That is, he gave your lordship bad advice, and you," said Heriot—

"Was fool enough to follow his counsel," answered Nani—"But we will pass this, Master Heroes, if you please. Old men and young men, men of the sword and men of peaceful occupation, always have thought, always will think, differently, on such subjects."

"I grant," answered Horatio, "the distinction between the old nobility and the young noblemen—still you should have had patronage for Lord Huntingdon's sake, and prudence for your own. Supposing your quarrel just"—

"I pray you to pass on to some other charge," said Lord Glenvarloch.

"I am not your accuser, my lord; but I trust in Heaven, that your own heart has already accused you bitterly on the inhospitable wrong which your late landlord has sustained at your hand."

"Had I been guilty of what you allude to," said Lord Glenvarloch,—"had a moment of temptation hurried me away, I had long ere now most bitterly repented it. But whoever may have witnessed the "Glory!—I never did, never would, have shot varlock. "I could not prevent other men up

"You would have known well enough how to "Your grave remonstrances will drive us," said Nani. "There is a show of sense and sense on what you say; and yet, it is positively absurd my telling the retreat of a fugitive of whom I know nothing earthly."

"It is well, my lord," answered Hamlet, "You have a right, such as it is, to hear your officers, but, were my discourages on them, would be so totally unavailing, we had better proceed in this way. Yet your father's wishes were so strong, it seems to plead that I should go on."

"True, my lord," said Horatio; "but even if there lacks explanation. Your lady departed this morning in a wherry with a lady, it is said, an immense sum of money, a quite other valuable—but the woman has not been heard of."

"I parted with her at Paul's Wharf" and "where she went ashore with her things,

"Ay, that is the watermen's story, but Johnnie denies that he remembers any thing of it."

"I am sorry to hear this," said the young man; "I hope in Heaven she has not been used for the treasure she had with her."

"I hope not," replied Herriot. "Our minds are much disturbed about it. Our character suffers on all hands. Men recall the fatal case of Lord Macnaghten, hanged for one of a fencing-master; and exclaim, they will save their wives and their property at the nobility of Scotland."

"And all this is laid to my door!" and "I will not shrink under the weight," said Lord Glenvarloch. "But that is not the present point.—

If I had that casket"——

"Your baggage stood in the little anteroom, as I passed," said the citizen; "the casket caught my eye.
I think you had it of me.—It was my old friend Sir Faithful Frugal's. Ay; he, too, had a son"——

Here he stopped short.

"A son who, like Lord Glenvarloch's, did no credit to his father.—Was it not so you would have ended the sentence, Master Heriot?" asked the young nobleman.

"My lord, it was a word spoken rashly," answered Heriot. "God may mend all in his own good time;
this, however, I will say, that I have sometimes envied my friends their fair and flourishing families; and yet have I seen such changes when death has removed the head, so many rich men's sons pennyless, the heirs of so many knights and nobles acreless, that I think mine own estate and memory, as I shall order it, has a fair chance of outliving those of greater men, though God has given me no heir of my name. But this is from the purpose.—Ho! warder, bring in Lord Glenvarloch's baggage." The officer obeyed. Seals had been placed upon the trunk and casket, but were now removed, the warder said, in consequence of the subsequent orders from Court, and the whole was placed at the prisoner's free disposal.

Desirous to bring this painful visit to a conclusion, Lord Glenvarloch opened the casket, and looked through the papers which it contained, first hastily, and then more slowly and accurately; but it was all in vain. The Sovereign's signed warrant had disappeared.

"I thought and expected nothing better," said George Heriot, bitterly. "The beginning of evil is the letting out of water. Here is a fair heritage lost, I dare say, on a foul cast at dice, or a conjuring trick at cards!—My lord, your surprise is well played. I give you full joy of your accomplishments. I have seen many as young brawlers and spendthrifts, but never so young and accomplished a dissembler.—
Nay, man, never bend your angry brows on me. I speak in bitterness of heart, from what I remember of your worthy father; and if his son hears of his degeneracy from no one else, he shall hear of it from the old goldsmith."

This new suspicion drove Nigel to the very extremity of his patience; yet the motives and zeal of the good old man, as well as the circumstances of suspicion which created his displeasure, were so excellent an excuse for it, that they formed an absolute curb on the resentment of Lord Glenvarloch, and constrained him, after two or three hasty exclamations, to observe a proud and sullen silence. At length, Master Heri-ot resumed his lecture.

"Hark you, my lord," he said, "it is scarce possible that this most important paper can be absolutely assigned away. Let me know in what obscure corner, and for what petty sum, it lies pledged—something may yet be done."

"Your efforts in my favour are the more generous," said Lord Glenvarloch, "as you offer them to one whom you believe you have cause to think hardly of —but they are altogether unavailing. Fortune has taken the field against me at every point. Even let her win the battle."

"Zouns!" exclaimed Heriot, impatiently,—" you would make a saint swear! Why, I tell you, if this paper, the loss of which seems to sit so light on you, be not found, farewell to the fair lordship of Glenvarloch—firth and forest—lea and furrow—lake and stream—all that has been in the house of Olifaunt since the days of William the Lion!"

"Farewell to them, then," said Nigel,—" moan is soon made."

"Sdeath! my lord, you will make more moan for it ere you die," said Heriot, in the same tone of angry impatience.

"Not I, my old friend," said Nigel. "If I mourn, Master Heriot, it will be for having lost the good opinion of a worthy man, and lost it, as I must say, most undeservedly."

"Ay, ay, young man," said Heriot, shaking his head, "make me believe that if you can.—To sum the matter up," he said, rising from his seat, and walking towards that occupied by the disguised female, "for our matters are now drawn into small compass, you shall as soon make me believe that this masquerading mummer, on whom I now lay the hand of paternal authority, is a French page, who understands no English."

So saying, he took hold of the supposed page's cloak, and, not without some gentle degree of violence, led into the middle of the apartment the disguised fair one, who in vain attempted to cover her face, first with her mantle, and afterwards with her hands; both which impediments Master Heriot removed, something unceremoniously, and gave to view the detected daughter of the old horologist, his own fair god-daughter, Margaret Ramsay.

"Here is goodly gear!" he said; and as he spoke, he could not prevent himself from giving her a slight shake, for we have elsewhere noticed that he was a severe disciplinarian.—"How comes it, minion, that I find you in so shameless a dress, and so unworthy a situation? Nay, your modesty is now mistimed—it should have come sooner. Speak, or I will!"

"Master Heriot," said Lord Glenvarloch, "whatever right you may have over this maiden elsewhere, while in my apartment she is under my protection."

"Your protection, my lord!—a proper protector!—And how long, mistress, have you been under my lord's protection? Speak out, forsooth!"

"For the matter of two hours, godfather," answered the maiden, with a countenance bent to the ground, and covered with blushes, "but it was against my will."

"Two hours!" repeated Heriot,—"space enough for mischief.—My lord, this is, I suppose, another victim offered to your character of gallantry—another adventure to be boasted of at Beaujeu's ordinary? Methinks the roof under which you first met this silly maiden should have secured her, at least, from such a fate."

"On my honour, Master Heriot," said Lord Glenvarloch, "you remind me now, for the first time, that I saw this young lady in your family. Her features are not easily forgotten, and yet I was trying in vain to recollect where I had last looked on them. For your suspicions, they are as false as they are injurious both to her and me. I had but discovered her disguise as you entered. I am satisfied, from her whole behaviour, that her presence here in this dress was involuntary; and God forbid that I had been capable of taking advantage of it to her prejudice."

"It is well mouthed, my lord," said Master Heriot; "but a cunning clerk can read the Apocrypha as loud as the Scripture. Frankly, my lord, you are come to that pass, where your words will not be received without a warrant."

"I should not speak, perhaps," said Margaret, the natural vivacity of whose temper could never be long suppressed by any situation, however disadvantageous, "but I cannot be silent. Godfather, you do me wrong—and no less wrong to this young nobleman. You say his words want a warrant. I know where to find a warrant for some of them, and the rest I deeply and devoutly believe without one."

"And I thank you, maiden," replied Nigel, "for the good opinion you have expressed. I am at that point, it seems, though how I have been driven to it I know not, where every fair construction of my actions and motives is refused me. I am the more obliged to her who grants me that right which the world denies me. For you, lady, were I at liberty, I have a sword and arm should know how to guard your reputation."

"Upon my word, a perfect Amadis and Oriana!" said George Heriot. "I should soon get my throat cut betwixt the knight and the princess, I suppose, but that the beef-eaters are happily within halloo.—Come, come, Lady Light-o'-Love—if you mean to make your way with me, it must be by plain facts, not by speeches from romaunts and play-books. How, in Heaven's name, came you here?"

"Sir," answered Margaret, "since I must speak, I went to Greenwich this morning with Monna Paula, to present a petition to the King on the Lady Hermione."

"Mercy-a-gad!" exclaimed Heriot, "dance, too? Could she not have waited stir in her affairs! But I suppose the sent her had rendered her restless. Ah! man—he that goes partner with you, his double share of patience, for you will bri the common stock.—Well, but what o this embassy of Monna Paula's to do v surd disguise? Speak out."

"Monna Paula was frightened," answered, "and did not know how to set abou for you know she scarce ever goes out a so—and so—I agreed to go with her to ; rage; and, for the dress, I am sure you wore it at a Christmas mumming, and it not unbecoming."

"And wherefore went he not?—he had companion for Monna Paula than you, I the citizen."

"He was otherwise employed," said a voice scarce audible.

influence demanded, even at the hand of a punctilious old soldier and courtier like Sir Edward Mansel. Lady Mansel received Margaret with like courtesy, and informed Master George that she was now only her guest, and no longer her prisoner.

"She is at liberty," she said, "to return to her friends under your charge—such is his Majesty's pleasure."

"I am glad of it, madam," answered Heriot, "but only I could have wished her freedom had taken place before her foolish interview with that singular young man; and I marvel your ladyship permitted it."

"My good Master Heriot," said Sir Edward, "we act according to the commands of one better and wiser than ourselves—our orders from his Majesty must be strictly and literally obeyed; and I need not say that the wisdom of his Majesty doth more than ensure"—

"I know his Majesty's wisdom well," said Heriot; "yet there is an old proverb about fire and flax—well, let it pass."

"I see Sir Mungo Malagrowth stalking towards the door of the lodging," said the Lady Mansel, "with the gait of a lame crane—it is his second visit this morning."

"He brought the warrant for discharging Lord Glenvarloch of the charge of treason," said Sir Edward.

"And from him," said Heriot, "I heard much of what had befallen; for I came from France only late last evening, and somewhat unexpectedly."

As they spoke, Sir Mungo entered the apartment—saluted the Lieutenant of the Tower and his lady with ceremonious civility—honoured George Heriot with a patronizing nod of acknowledgment, and accosted Margaret with—"Hey! my young charge, you have not doffed your masculine attire yet?"

"She does not mean to lay it aside, Sir Mungo," said Heriot, speaking loud, "until she has had satisfaction from you, for betraying her disguise to me, like a false knight—and in very deed, Sir Mungo, I think when you told me she was rambling about in so strange a dress, you might have said also that she was under Lady Mansel's protection."

"That was the King's secret, Master Heriot," said Sir Mungo, throwing himself into a chair with an air of atrabilarious importance; "the other was a well-meaning hint to yourself, as the girl's friend."

"Yes," replied Heriot, "it was done like yourself—enough told to make me unhappy about her—not a word which could relieve my uneasiness."

"Sir Mungo will not hear that remark," said the lady; "we must change the subject.—Is there any news from Court, Sir Mungo? you have been to Greenwich?"

"You might as well ask me, madam," answered the Knight, "whether there is any news from hell."

"How, Sir Mungo, how!" said Sir Edward, "measure your words something better—You speak of the Court of King James."

"Sir Edward, if I spoke of the court of the twelve Kaisers, I would say it is as confused for the present as the infernal regions. Courtiers of forty years' standing, and such I may write myself, are as far to seek in the matter as a minnow in the Maelstrom. Some folk say the King has frowned on the Prince—some that the Prince has looked grave on the Duke—some that Lord Glenvarloch will be hanged for high treason—and some that there is matter against Lord Dalgarno that may cost him as much as his head's worth."

"And what do you, that are a courtier of forty years' standing, think of it all?" said Sir Edward Mansel.

"Nay, nay, do not ask him, Sir Edward," said the lady, with an ex-pressive look to her husband.

"Sir Mungo is too witty," added Master Heriot, "to remember that he who says aught that may be repeated to his own prejudice, does but load a piece for any of the company to shoot him dead with, at their pleasure and convenience."

"What!" said the bold Knight, "you think I am afraid of the trepan? Why now, what if I should see that Dalgarno has more wit than honesty,—the Duke more sail than ballast,—the prince more pride than prudence,—and that the King"—The Lady Mansel held up her finger in a warning manner—"that the King is my very good master, who has given me, for forty years and more, dog's wages, videlicet, bones and beating.—Why now, all this is said, and Archie Armstrong* says worse than this of the best of them every day."

"The more fool he," said George Heriot; "yet he is not so utterly wrong, for folly is his best wisdom. But do not you, Sir Mungo, set your wit against a fool's, though he be a court fool."

"A fool, said you?" replied Sir Mungo, not having fully heard what Master Heriot said, or not choosing to have it thought so,— "I have been a fool indeed, to hang on at a close-fisted Court here, when men of understanding and men of action have been making fortunes in every other place of Europe. But here a man comes indifferently off unless he gets a great key to turn, (looking at Sir Edward,) or can beat tattoo with a hammer on a pewter plate.—Well, sirs, I must make as much haste back on mine errand as if I were a fee'd messenger.—Sir Edward and my lady, I leave my commendations with you—and my good-will with you, Master Heriot—and for this breaker of bounds, if you will act by my counsel, some maceration by fasting, and a gentle use of the rod, is the best cure for her giddy fits."

"If you propose for Greenwich, Sir Mungo," said the Lieutenant, "I can spare you the labour—the King comes immediately to Whitehall."

"And that must be the reason the council are summoned to meet in' such hurry," said Sir Mungo. "Well—I will, with your permission, go to the poor lad Glenvarloch, and bestow some comfort on him."

The Lieutenant seemed to look up, and pause for a moment as if in doubt.

"The lad will want a pleasant companion, who can tell him the nature of the punishment which he is to suffer, and other matters of concernment. I will not leave him until I show him how absolutely he hath ruined himself from feather to spur, how deplorable is his present state, and how small his chance of mending it."

"Well, Sir Mungo," replied the Lieutenant, "if you really think all this likely to be very consolatory to the party concerned, I will send a warder to conduct you."

"And I," said George Heriot, "will humbly pray of Lady Mansel, that she will lend some of her hand-maiden's apparel to this giddy-brained girl; for I shall forfeit my reputation if I walk up Tower-hill with her in that mad guise—and yet the silly lassie looks not so ill in it neither."

"I will send my coach with you instantly," said the obliging lady.

"Faith, madam, and if you will honour us by such courtesy, I will gladly accept it at your hands," said the citizen, "for business presses hard on me, and the forenoon is already lost, to little purpose."

The coach being ordered accordingly, transported the worthy citizen and his charge to his mansion in Lombard Street. There he found his presence was anxiously expected by the Lady Hermione, who had just received an order to be in readiness to attend upon the Royal Privy Council in the course of an hour; and upon whom, in her inexperience of business, and long retirement from society and the world, the intimation had made as deep an impression as if it had not been the necessary consequence of the petition which she had presented to the King by Monna Paula. George Heriot gently blamed her for taking any steps in an affair so important until his return from France, especially as he had requested her to remain quiet, in a letter which accompanied the evidence he had transmitted to her from Paris. She could only plead in answer the influence which her immediately stirring in the matter was likely to have on the affair of her kinsman Lord Glenvarloch, for she was ashamed to acknowledge how much she had been gained on by the eager importunity of her youthful companion. The motive of Margaret's eagerness was, of course, the safety of Nigel; but we must leave it to time to show in what particulars that came to be with the petition of the Lady Hermione.] we return to the visit with which Sir Mungowther favoured the afflicted young man his place of captivity.

The Knight, after the usual salutations, prefaced his discourse with a great deal of regret for Nigel's situation, sat down bending and composing his grotesque features into lugubrious despondence, began his ravellings:—

"I bless God, my lord, that I was the first to have the pleasure to bring his Majesty's sage to the Lieutenant, discharging the high commission against ye, for any thing meditated against Majesty's sacred person; for, admit you be on the lesser offence, or breach of privilege of palace and its precincts, usque ad mutilationem to dismemberation, as it is most likely y the loss of a member is nothing to being drawn quick, after the fashion of a traitor."

"I should feel the shame of having deigned a punishment," answered Nigel, "more than of undergoing it."

"Doubtless, my lord, the having, as you served it, must be an excruciation to your person," replied his tormentor; "a kind of mental physical hanging, drawing, and quartering may be in some measure equipollent with the usual application of hemp, iron, fire, and the outer man."

"I say, Sir Mungo," repeated Nigel, "in order to understand my words, that I am unconscious of any error, save that of having arms on me when I chanced to approach that of your reign."

"Ye are right, my lord, to acknowledge," said Sir Mungo. "We have an old proverb, and—so forth. And indeed, as to this his Majesty has a special ill-will at all a soever, and more especially pistols; but, there is an end of that matter.* I wish to see through the next, which is altogether unlooked for."

"Surely, Sir Mungo," answered Nigel, "I might say something in my favour of the affair in the Park. None knows better than I was at that moment urged by words of most heinous nature, offered to me by Lord Mansel, many of which were reported to me by your grace to the inflammation of my passion."

"Alack-a-day!—Alack-a-day!" replied Sir Mungo, "I remember but too well how much you were inflamed, in spite of the various remarks which I made to you respecting the sacredness of the place. Alas! alas! you cannot say you were warned into the mire for want of warning."

"I see, Sir Mungo, you are determined to do me nothing which can do me service," said Nigel.

"Blithely would I do ye service," said the Knight, "and the best whilk I can think of is, to take you in the process of the punishment to the whilk ye are indubitably subjected, I having had the good fortune to behold it performed in the Queen's chamber, which had written a pasquinado. I was in my Lord Gray's train, who lay leaguer here, being always covetous of pleasing and profitable. I could not dispense with being present on this occasion."

"I should be surprised indeed," said Lord Glenvarloch, "if you had so far put restraint upon your benevolence, as to stay away from such a sight."

"Hey! was your lordship praying me to be there?"

* Wilson informs us that when Colonel Grey, a Scotchman, affected the buff dress even in the time of peace, that military garb at Court, the King, seeing him with pistols at his girdle, which he never greatly liked, merrily, "he was now so fortified, that, if he were but tualled, he would be impregnable"—Wilson's Life of James VI. apud KESNET'S History of England, 399. In 1612, the tenth year of James's reign, there was abroad that a shipload of pocket-pistols had been sent to Spain, with a view to a general massacre of the Protestants. Proclamations were of consequence sent forth, prohibiting persons from carrying pistols under a foot long in d. Ibid. p. 690.

"your own execution?" answered the Knight. "Troth, my lord, it will be a painful sight to a friend, but I will rather punish myself than baulk you. It is pretty pageant, in the main—a very pretty pageant. The fallow came on with such a bold face, it was a pleasure to look on him. He was dressed all in white, to signify harmlessness and innocence. The thing was done on a scaffold at Westminster—most likely yours will be at Charing. There were the Sheriff's aid the Marshal's men, and what not—the executioner, with his cleaver and mallet, and his man, with a tin of hot charcoal, and the irons for cautery. He was dexterous fallow that Derrick. This man Gregory was not fit to jipper a joint with him; it might be worth our lordship's while to have the loon sent to a barber-surgeon's, to learn some needful scantling of anatomy—it may be for the benefit of yourself and other unhappy sufferers, and also a kindness to Gregory." "I will not take the trouble," said Nigel.—"If the laws will demand my hand, the executioner may get off as he best can. If the King leaves it where it may chance to do him better service."

"Vera noble—vera grand, indeed, my lord," said Sir Mungo; "it is pleasant to see a brave man suffer. This fallow whom I spoke of—this Tubbs, or Stubbs, whatever the plebeian was called, came forward as bold as an emperor, and said to the people, 'Good friends, I come to leave here the hand of a true Englishman,' and clapped it on the dressing-block with much ease as if he had laid it on his sweetheart's shoulder; whereupon Derrick the hangman, adjusting, d'ye mind me, the edge of his cleaver on the very nail, hit it with the mallet with such force, that the nail flew off as far from the owner as a gauntlet which the challenger casts down in the tilt-yard. Well, sir, Stubbs, or Tubbs, lost no whit of countenance, until the fallow clapped the hissing-hot iron on his raw stump. My lord, it fizzed like a rasher bacon, and the fallow set up an elritch screech, which made some think his courage was abated; but a whit, for he plucked off his hat with his left hand, and waved it, crying, 'God save the Queen, I confound all evil counsellors!' The people gave three cheers, which he deserved for his stout heart; and, truly, I hope to see your lordship suffer by the same magnanimity."*

"I thank you, Sir Mungo," said Nigel, who had been able to forbear some natural feelings of an unpleasant nature during this lively detail,—"I have doubt the exhibition will be a very engaging one for you and the other spectators, whatever it may be to the party principally concerned."

"Vera engaging," answered Sir Mungo, "vera interesting—vera interesting indeed, though not altogether so much so as an execution for high treason. Now Digby, the Winters, Fawkes, and the rest of the gunpowder gang, suffer for that treason, which is a vera grand spectacle, as well in regard to their springs, as to their constancy in enduring."

"I am the more obliged to your goodness, Sir Mungo," replied Nigel, "that has induced you, although you have lost the sight, to congratulate me on escape from the hazard of making the same edifying appearance."

"His execution, which so captivated the imagination of Sir Mungo Malagrowther, was really a striking one. The criminal, a zealous and bigoted Puritan, had published a book in very bitter terms against the match of Elizabeth with the Duke of Anjou, which he termed an union of a daughter of God with a son of antichrist. Queen Elizabeth was greatly incensed at the freedom assumed in this work, and caused the author Stubbs, Page the publisher, and one Singleton the printer, to be taken on an act passed by Philip and Mary against the writers and dispersers of seditious publications. They were convicted, although there was an opinion strongly entertained by law-that the act was only temporary, and expired with Queen Elizabeth. Stubbs and Page received sentence to have their right hands struck off. They accordingly suffered the punishment, the being divided by a cleaver driven through the joint by the blow of a mallet. The printer was pardoned. "I remember," said the historian Camden, "being then present, that Stubbs, as his right hand was cut off, plucked off his hat with the other hand, and said, with a loud voice, 'God save the Queen!' The whole standing about was deeply silent, either out of horror at a new and unwonted kind of punishment, or out of compassion towards the man, as being of an honest and unblameable reputation, or else out of hatred to the marriage, which most were agreed would be the overthrow of religion."—CAMDEN'S Es for the year 1551.

"As you say, my lord," answered Sir Mungo, "the loss is chiefly in appearance. Nature has been very bountiful to us, and has given duplicates of some organs, that we may endure the loss of one of them, should some such circumstance chance in our pilgrimage. See my poor dexter, abridged to one thumb, one finger, and a stump,—by the blow of my adversary's weapon, however, and not by any carnal knife. Weel, sir, this poor maimed hand doth me, in some sort, as much service as ever; and, admit yours to be taken off by the wrist, you have still your left hand for your service, and are better off than the little Dutch dwarf here about town, who threads a needle, limns, writes, and tosses a pike, merely by means of his feet, without ever a hand to help him."

"Well, Sir Mungo," said Lord Glenvarloch, "this is all no doubt very consolatory; but I hope the King will spare my hand to fight for him in battle, where, notwithstanding all your kind encouragement, I could spend my blood much more cheerfully than on a scaffold."

"It is even a sad truth," replied Sir Mungo, "that your lordship was but too like to have died on a scaffold—not a soul to speak for you but that deluded lassie, Maggie Ramsay."

"Whom mean you?" said Nigel, with more interest than he had hitherto shown in the Knight's communications.

"Nay, who should I mean, but that travestied lassie whom we dined with when we honoured Heriot the goldsmith? Ye ken best how you have made interest with her, but I saw her on her knees to the King for you. She was committed to my charge, to bring her up hither in honour and safety. Had I had my own will, I would have had her to Bridewell, to flog the wild blood out of her—a cutty quean, to think of wearing the breeches, and not so much as married yet!"

"Hark ye, Sir Mungo Malagrowther," answered Nigel, "I would have you talk of that young person with fitting respect."

"With all the respect that befits your lordship's paramour, and Davy Ramsay's daughter, I shall certainly speak of her, my lord," said Sir Mungo, assuming a dry tone of irony.

Nigel was greatly disposed to have made a serious quarrel of it, but with Sir Mungo such an affair would have been ridiculous; he smothered his resentment, therefore, and conjured him to tell what he had heard and seen respecting this young person.

"Simply, that I was in the anteroom when she had audience, and heard the King say, to my great perplexity, 'Pulchra sane puella;' and Maxwell, who hath but indifferent Latin ears, thought that his Majesty called on him by his own name of Sawney, and thrust into the presence, and there I saw our Sovereign James, with his own hand, raising up the lassie, who, as I said heretofore, was travestied in man's attire. I should have had my own thoughts of it, but our gracious Master is auld, and was nae great gillraver among the queans even in his youth; and he was comforting her in his own way, and saying, 'Ye needna grieve about it, my bonnie woman, Glenvarlochides shall have fair play; and, indeed, when the hurry was off our spirits, we could not believe that he had any design on our person. And touching his other offences, we will look wisely and closely into the matter.' So I got charge to take the young fence-louper to the Tower here, and deliver her to the charge of Lady Mansel; and his Majesty charged me to say not a word to her about your offences, for, said he, the poor thing is breaking her heart for him."

"And on this you have charitably founded the opinion to the prejudice of this young lady, which you have now thought proper to express?" said Lord Glenvarloch.

"In honest truth, my lord," replied Sir Mungo, "what opinion would you have me form of a wench who gets into male habiliments, and goes on her knees to the King for a wild young nobleman? I wot not what the fashionable word may be, for the phrase changes, though the custom abides. But truly I must needs think this young laddy—if you call Watchie Ramsay's daughter a young leddy—depends herself more like a leddy of pleasure than a laddy of honour."

"You do her egregious wrong, Sir Mungo," said Nigel; "or rather you have been misled by appearances."

"So will all the world be misled, my lord," replied the satirist, "unless you were doing that to disabuse them which your father's son will hardly judge it fit to do."

"And what may that be, I pray you?"

"E'en marry the lass—make her Laddy Glenvar-loch—Ay, ay, ye may start—but it's the course you are driving on. Rather marry than do worse, if the worst be not done already."

"Sir Mungo," said Nigel, "I pray you to forbear this subject, and rather return to that of the mutilation, upon which it pleased you to enlarge a short while since."

"I have not time at present," said Sir Mungo, bearing the clock strike four; "but so soon as you shall have received sentence, my lord, you may rely on my giving you the fullest detail of the whole solemnity; and I give you my word as a knight and gentleman, that I will myself attend you on the scaffold, whoever may cast sour looks on me for doing so. I bear a heart, to stand by a friend in the worst of times."

So saying, he wished Lord Glenvarloch farewell, who felt as heartily rejoiced at his departure, though it may be a bold word, as any person who had ever undergone his society.

But, when left to his own reflections, Nigel could not help feeling solitude nearly as irksome as the company of Sir Mungo Malagrowther. The total wreck of his fortune, — which seemed now to be rendered unavoidable by the loss of the royal warrant, that had afforded him the means of redeeming his paternal estate, — was an unexpected and additional blow. When he had seen the warrant he could not precisely remember; but was inclined to think, it was in the casket when he took out money to pay the miser for his lodgings at Whitefriars. Since then, the casket had been almost constantly under his own eye, except during the short time he was separated from his baggage by the arrest in Greenwich Park. It might, indeed, have been taken out at that time, for he had no reason to think either his person or his property was in the hands of those who wished him well; but, on the other hand, the locks of the strong-box had sustained no violence that he could observe, and, being of a particular and complicated construction, he thought they could scarce be opened without an instrument made on purpose, adapted to their peculiarities, and for this there had been no time. But, speculate as he would on the matter, it was clear that this important document was gone, and probable that it had passed into no friendly hands. "Let it be so," said Nigel to himself; "I am scarcely worse off respecting my prospects of fortune, than when I first reached this accursed city. But to be hampered with cruel accusations, and stained with foul suspicions—to be the object of pity of the most degrading kind to yonder honest citizen, and of the malignity of that cynical and atrabilious courtier, who can endure the good fortune and good qualities of another no more than the mole can brook sunshine—this is indeed a deplorable reflection; and the consequences must stick to my future life, and impede whatever my head, or my hand, if it is left me, might be able to execute in my favour."

The feeling, that he is the object of general dislike and dereliction, seems to be one of the most unendurably painful to which a human being can be subjected.
The most atrocious criminals, whose nerves have not shrunk from perpetrating the most horrid cruelty, endure more from the consciousness that no man will sympathize with their sufferings, than from apprehension of the personal agony of their impending punishment; and are known often to attempt to palliate their enormities, and sometimes altogether to deny what is established by the clearest proof, rather than to leave life under the general ban of humanity.
It is no wonder that Nigel, labouring under the high in their own opinion, was very apt, when he could have no other auditor, to hold conversation with one who was sure to be a willing listener—I mean with himself. He was now brushing and arranging Lord Glenvarloch's clothes, with as much composure and quiet assiduity as if he had never been out of his service, and grumbling between whiles to his following purpose—"Humph—my time clock and jerkin were through my hands. I guess you if Orchester has been passed over them since they and last parted. The embroidery finely frayed too, and the gold buttons of the clock—By my conscience, had as I am an honest man, there is a round dozen of them gone! This comes of Alsatian frolics! Good-bye us with his grace, and not give us over to our own devices!—I see no sword—but that will be in respect of present circumstances."

Nigel for some time could not help believing that he was still in a dream, so improbable did it seem that his domestic, whom he supposed to be in Scotland, should have found him out, and obtained access to him, in his present circumstances. Looking through the curtains, however, he became well assured of the fact, when he beheld the stiff and haughty figure of Richie with a visage charged with nearly double its ordinary degree of importance, employed sedulously in brushing his master's mark and reaching himself with whistling or humming, at from interval to interval, some snatch of an old Scotch or Scottish ballad tune. Although sufficiently conscious of the identity of the party, Lord Glenvarloch could not help expressing his surprise in the superlative question—"In the name of Heaven, Richie, is this you?"

"And who else could it be, my lord?" answered Richie; "I dreamt that your lordship's levee in this place is like to be attended by one that are not bound in thereto by duty."

"I am rather surprised," answered Nigel, "that it should be attended by any one at all, especially by you, Richie, for you know that we parted, and I thought you had reached Scotland long since."

"I crave your lordship's pardon, but we have not parted yet, nor are soon likely so to do, for there being two folk's votes to the unmaking of a bargain as to the making of one. Though it was your lordship's pleasure so to conduct yourself that we were like to have parted, yet it was not, or rather on my will to be gone. To be plain, if your lordship does not ken when you have a good servant, I ken when I have a kind master; and to say truth, you will be much served now than ever, for there is not much chance of your getting out of bounds."

"I am indeed bound over to good behaviour," said Lord Glenvarloch, with a smile; "but I hope you will not take advantage of my situation to be too severe on my follies, Richie?"

"God forbid, my lord—God forbid!" replied Richie, with an expression betwixt a concerted consciousness of superior wisdom and real feeling—"especially in consideration of your lordship's having a sense of him. I did indeed remonstrate, as was my gentle duty, but I scorn to cast that up to your lordship now—Na, na, I am myself an erring creature—very conscious of some small weaknesses—there is no perfection in man."

"But Richie," said Lord Glenvarloch, "although I am much obliged to you for your proffered services, it can be of little use to me here, and may be of great use to yourself."

"Your lordship shall pardon me again, and Richie, when the relative situation of the parties had interested with ten times his ordinary dogmatism; but as I will manage the matter, your lordship shall be greatly benefited by my service, and I myself no whit prejudiced."

"I see not how that can be, my friend," said Lord Glenvarloch, "even as to your pecuniary affairs."

"Touching my pecuniary, my lord," replied Richie, "I am indifferently well provided; and as to character, my living here will be no burden to your lordship or distress to myself. Only I crave permission to annex certain conditions to my servitude with your lordship."

"Annex what you will," said Lord Glenvarloch, "for you are pretty sure to take your own way, whether you make any conditions or not. Since you will not leave me, which were, I think, your wisest course, you must, and I suppose will, serve me only on such terms as you like yourself."

"All that I ask, my lord," said Richie, gravely, and with a tone of great moderation, "is to have the uninterrupted command of my own motions, for certain important purposes which I have now in hand, always giving your lordship the solace of my company and attendance at such times as may be at once convenient for me, and necessary for your service."

"Of which, I suppose, you constitute yourself sole judge," replied Nigel, smiling.

"Unquestionably, my lord," answered Richie, gravely, "for your lordship can only know what yourself want, whereas I, who are both sides of the picture, ken both what is the best for your affairs, and what is the most needful for my own."

"Richie, my good friend," said Nigel, "I fear this arrangement, which places the master much under the disposal of the servant, would scarce suit us if we were both at large; but a prisoner as I am, I may be as well at your disposal as I am at that of so many other persons; and so you may come and go as you list, for I suppose you will not take my advice, to return to your own country, and leave me to my fate."

"The devil be in my feet if I do," said Monplaisir,—"I am not the lad to leave your lordship in foul weather, when I followed you and fed upon you through the whole summer day. And besides, there may be heavy days behind, for a' that has come and gone yet, for

"It's hame, and it's hame, and it's hame we shan' weel be, Though the cloud is in the left, and the wind is on the lee; For the sun through the work black blythe as mornin' there,— 'I'll share on ye yet in our ain country!'"

Having sung this stanza in the manner of a ballad-singer, whose voice has been cracked by matching his windpipe against the bugle of the north blast, Richie Monplaisir aided Lord Glenvarloch to rise, attended his toilet with every possible mark of the most solemn and deferential respect, then waited upon him at breakfast, and finally withdrew, pleading that he had business of importance, which would detain him for some hours.

Although Lord Glenvarloch necessarily expected to be occasionally annoyed by the self-conceit and dogmatism of Richie Monplaisir's character, yet he could not but feel the greatest pleasure from the firm and devoted attachment which this faithful follower had displayed in the present instance, and indeed promised himself an alleviation of the ennui of his imprisonment, in having the advantage of his services. It was, therefore, with pleasure that he learned from the waiter, that his servant's attendance would be allowed at all times when the general rules of the fortress permitted the entrance of strangers.

In the meanwhile, the magnanimous Richie Monplaisir had already reached Tower Wharf. Here, after looking with contempt on several scullers by whom he was pined, and whose services he rejected with a wave of his hand, he called with dignity, "First oars!" and stirred into activity several lounging Tritons of the higher order, who had not, on his first appearance, thought it worth while to accost him with proffers of service. He now took possession of a wherry, folded his arms within his ample cloak, and sitting down in the stern with an air of importance, commanded them to row to Whitehall stairs. Having reached the palace in safety, he demanded to see Master Linklater, the under-clerk of his Majesty's kitchen. The reply was, that he was not to be spoken withal, being then employed in cooking a mess of cock-a-leekie for the King's own mouth.

"Tell him," said Monplaisir, "that it is a dear countryman of his, who seeks to converse with him on matter of high import."

"A dear countryman?" said Linklater, when this pressing message was delivered to him. "Well, let him come in and be d—d, that I should say so! This now is some red-headed, long-legged, gill-white-foot frae the West Port, that, hearing of my promotion, is come up to be a turn-broche, or deputy scullion, through my interest. It is a great hinderance to any man who would rise in the world, to have such friends to hang by his skirts, in hope of being towed up along with him.—Ha! Richie Moniplies, man, is it thou? And what has brought ye here? If they should ken thee for the loon that scared the horse the other day!"

"No more o' that, neighbour," said Richie,—"I am just here on the auld errand—I maun speak with the King."

"The King? Ye are red wud," said Linklater; then shouted to his assistants in the kitchen, "Look to the broches, ye knaves—pisces purga—Salsamenta fac macerentur pulchre—I will make you understand Latin, ye knaves, as becomes the scullions of King James." Then in a cautious tone, to Richie's private ear, he continued, "Know ye not how ill your master came off the other day?—I can tell you that job made some folk shake for their office."

"Weel, but, Laurie, ye maun befriend me this time, and get this wee bit sifflication slipped into his Majesty's ain most gracious hand. I promise you the contents will be most grateful to him."

"Richie," answered Linklater, "you have certainly sworn to say your prayers in the porter's lodge, with your back bare; and twa grooms, with dog-whips, to cry amen to you."

"Na, na, Laurie, lad," said Richie, "I ken better what belangs to sifflications than I did yon day; and ye will say that yourself, if ye will but get that bit note to the King's hand."

"I will have neither hand nor foot in the matter," said the cautious Clerk of the Kitchen; "but there is his Majesty's mess of cock-a-leekie just going to be served to him in his closet—I cannot prevent you from putting the letter between the gilt bowl and the platter; his sacred Majesty will see it when he lifts the bowl, for he aye drinks out the broth."

"Enough said," replied Richie, and deposited the paper accordingly, just before a page entered to carry away the mess to his Majesty.

"Aweel, aweel, neighbour," said Laurence, when the mess was taken away, "if ye have done ony thing to bring yourself to the withy, or the scourging post, it is your ain wilful deed."

"I will blame no other for it," said Richie; and with that undismayed pertinacity of conceit, which made a fundamental part of his character, he abode the issue, which was not long of arriving.

In a few minutes Maxwell himself arrived in the apartment, and demanded hastily who had placed a writing on the King's trencher. Linklater denied all knowledge of it; but Richie Moniplies, stepping boldly forth, pronounced the emphatical confession, "I am the man."

"Follow me, then," said Maxwell, after regarding him with a look of great curiosity.

They went up a private staircase,—even that private staircase, the privilege of which at Court is accounted a nearer road to power than the grandes entrees themselves. Arriving in what Richie described as an "ill redd-up" anteroom, the usher made a sign to him to stop, while he went into the King's closet. Their conference was short, and as Maxwell opened the door to retire, Richie heard the conclusion of it.

"Ye are sure he is not dangerous?—I was caught once.—Bide within call, but not nearer the door than within three geometrical cubits. If I speak loud, start to me like a falcon—If I speak loun, keep your lang lugs out of ear-shot—and now let him come in."

Richie passed forward at Maxwell's mute signal, and in a moment found himself in the presence of the King. Most men of Richie's birth and breeding, and many others, would have been abashed at finding themselves alone with their sovereign. But Richie Moniplies had an opinion of himself too high to be controlled by any such ideas; and having made his stiff reverence, he arose once more into his perpendicular height, and stood before James as stiff as a hedge-stake.

"Have ye gotten them, man? have ye gotten them?" said the King, in a fluttered state, betwixt hope and eagerness, and some touch of fear. "Gie me them—gie me them—before a word, I charge you, on your allegiance."

Richie took a box from his bosom, and, on one knee, presented it to his Majesty, who opened it, and having ascertained that it contained certain carcanet of rubies, with which the King formerly made acquainted, he could not resist into a sort of rapture, kissing the gems, as had been capable of feeling, and repeating again with childish delight, "Onyx cum prole—Onyx cum prole!" Ah, my bright and sparklers, my heart louns light to see you!

He then turned to Richie, upon whose stoical nance his Majesty's demeanour had excited a like a grim smile, which James interrupted by cing to reprehend, saying, "Take heed, sir, you to laugh at us—we are your anointed Sovereign."

"God forbid that I should laugh!" said composing his countenance into its natural. "I did but smile, to bring my visage into com and conformity with your Majesty's physiognomy."

"Ye speak as a dutiful subject, and a man," said the King; "but what deil's you man?"

"Even Richie Moniplies, the son of auld Moniplies, at the West Port of Edinburgh, with the honour to supply your Majesty's mother's table, as weel as your Majesty's, with flesh and vivers, when time was."

"Aha!" said the King, laughing,—for he put as a useful attribute of his situation, a memory, which recollected every one with whom was brought into casual contact,—"Ye are the same traitor who had weel-nigh coupit us out of the causy of our ain court-yard? but we are our mare. Equam memento rebus in arduis" Weel, be not dismayed, Richie; for, as we have turned traitors, it is but fair that a traitor, and then, suld prove to be, contra expectationem man. How can ye by our jewels, man?—may the part of George Heriot?"

"In no sort," said Richie. "May it please Majesty, I come as Harry Wynd fought, under my own hand, and on no man's errand; as I call no one master, save Him that made me, most gracious Majesty who governs me, and noble Nigel Olifaunt, Lord of Glenvarloch, who tained me as lang as he could maintain himself, a nobleman!"

"Glenvarlochides again!" exclaimed the King, "by my honour he lies in ambush for us at every ner!—Maxwell knocks at the door. It is Get Heriot come to tell us he cannot find these jewels. Get thee behind the arras, Richie—stand close, and sneeze not—cough not—breathe not!—Jingling die is so damnably ready with his gold-ends of gold, and sae accursedly backward with his gold of siller, that, by our royal saul, we are glad of hair in his neck."

Richie got behind the arras, in obedience to commands of the good-natured King, while the monarch, who never allowed his dignity to stand in way of a frolic, having adjusted, with his own hands the tapestry, so as to complete the ambush, commanded Maxwell to tell him what was the matter without. Maxwell's reply was so low as to be lost. Richie Moniplies, the peculiarity of whose situation no means abated his curiosity and desire to gratify to the uttermost.

"Let Geordie Heriot come in," said the King; as Richie could observe through a slit in the tapestry the honest citizen, if not actually agitated, was least, discomposed. The King, whose talent for or humour, was precisely of a kind to be gratified by such a scene as ensued, received his homage with coldness, and began to talk to him with an air of serious dignity, very different from the usual levity of his behaviour. "Master Heriot," said, "if we aught remember, we opignored in our hands certain jewels of the Crown, for a certain of money—Did we, or did we not?"

"My most gracious Sovereign," said Heriot, disputably your Majesty was pleased to do so."

* Peril, interni, occidi—quo curram? quo non curram—Tene, tene—quem? quis? nescio—nilul video.*

Ah! Geordie, your een are sharp enough to look after gowd and silver, gems, rubies, and the like of that, and yet ye kenna how to come by them when they are lost.—Ay, ay—look at them, man—look at them—they are a' right and tight, sound and round, not a doublet crept in amongst them."

George Heriot, when his first surprise was over, was too old a courtier to interrupt the King's imaginary triumph, although he darted a look of some displeasure at honest Richie, who still continued on what is usually termed the broad grin. He quietly examined the stones, and finding them all perfect, he honestly and sincerely congratulated his Majesty on the recovery of a treasure which could not have been lost without some dishonour to the crown; and asked to whom he himself was to pay the sums for which they had been pledged, observing, that he had the money by him in readiness.

"Ye are in a deevil of a hurry, when there is paying in the case, Geordie," said the King.—"What's a' the haste, man? The jewels were restored by an honest, kindly countryman of ours. There he stands, and wha kens if he wants the money on the nail, or if he might not be as weel pleased wi' a bit rescript on our treasury some six months hence? Ye ken that our Exchequer is even at a low ebb just now, and ye cry pay, pay, pay, as if we had all the mines of Ophir."

"Please your Majesty," said Heriot, "if this man has the real right to these moneys, it is doubtless at his will to grant forbearance, if he will. But when I remember the guise in which I first saw him, with a tattered cloak and a broken head, I can hardly conceive it.—Are not you Richie Moniplies, with the King's favour?"

"Even sae, Master Heriot—of the ancient and honourable house of Castle Collop, near to the West Port of Edinburgh," answered Richie.

"Why, please your Majesty, he is a poor serving-man," said Heriot. "This money can never be honestly at his disposal."

"What for no?" said the King. "Wad ye have naeboddy sprack up the brne but yoursell, Geordie? Your ain cloak was thin enough when ye cam here, though ye have lined it gay and weel. And for serving-men, there has mony a red-shank come over the Tweed wi' his master's wallet on his shoulders, that now rustles it wi' his six followers behind him. There stands the man himsell; speer at him, Geordie."

"His may not be the best authority in the case," answered the cautious citizen.

"Tut, tut, man," said the King, "ye are over scrupulous. The knave deer-stealers have an apt phrase, Non est inquirendum unde venit venison. He that brings the gudes hath surely a right to dispose of the gear.—Hark ye, friend, speak the truth and shame the deil. Have ye plenary powers to dispose on the redemption-money as to delay of payments, or the like, ay or no?"

"Full power, an it like your gracious Majesty," answered Richie Moniplies; "and I am maist willing to subscribe to whatsoever may in any wise accommodate your Majesty anent the redemption-money, trusting your Majesty's grace will be kind to me in one sma' favour."

"Ey, man," said the king, "come ye to me there? I thought ye wad e'en be like the rest of them.—One would think our subjects' lives and goods were all our ain, and holden of us at our free will; but when we stand in need of ony matter of siller from them, which chances more frequently than we would it did, deil a boddle is to be had, save on the auld terms of giff-graff. It is just niffer for niffer.—Aweel, neighbour, what is it that ye want—some monopoly, I reckon? Or it may be a grant of kirk-lands and teinds, or a knight-hood, or the like? Ye maun be reasonable, unless ye propose to advance more money for our present occasions."

"My liege," answered Richie Moniplies, "the owner of these moneys places them at your Majesty's command, free of all pledge or usage as long as it is your pleasure, providing your Majesty will condescend to show some favour to the noble Lord of presently prisoner in your royal Tower of

"How, man—how, man—how, man?" the King, reddening and stammering, but tones more noble than those by which he is times agitated—"What is that you dare to—Sell our justice!—sell our mercy!—and w ed King, sworn to do justice to our subjugate, and responsible for our stewardship is over all kings?"—Here he reverently touched his bonnet, and continued, with a ness,— "We dare not traffic in such command, but that ye are a poor ignorant cre have done us this day some not unpleasant we wad have a red iron driven through y in terrorem of others.—Awa with him, Ge him, plack and bawbee, out of our mone hands, and let them care that come ahint Richie, who had counted with the utmost upon the success of this master-stroke of like an architect whose whole scaffolding gives way under him. He caught, however he thought might break his fall. "Not on for which the jewels were pledged," he said double of it, if required, should be placed: jesty's command, and even without hope of repayment, if only"—

But the King did not allow him to co sentence, crying out with greater vehem before, as if he dreaded the stability of his resolutions.—"Awa wi' him—swith awa is time he were gane, if he doubles his bode And, for your life, letna Strenie, or ony of a word from his mouth; for wha kens wh that might bring me into! Ne inducas in te—Vade retro, Satanas!—Amen."

In obedience to the royal mandate, George hurried the abashed petitioner out of the presence out of the Palace; and, when they were a lace-yard, the citizen, remembering with sentiment the airs of equality which Richie had towards him in the commencement of which had just taken place, could not forbear, by congratulating him with an ironical his favour at Court, and his improved grace senting a supplication.

"Never fash your beard about that, Master Heriot," said Richie, totally undismayed; "me when and where I am to sufflicate you hundred pounds sterling, for which these jewels engaged?"

"The instant that you bring with you then of the money," replied Heriot; "whom it is that I should see on more accounts than on

"Then will I back to his Majesty," said Moniplies, stoutly, "and get either the money pledge back again. I am fully commissioned in that matter."

"It may be so, Richie," said the citizen. "I chance it may not be so neither, for your tale all gospel; and, therefore, be assured I will it is so, ere I pay you that large sum of money shall give you an acknowledgment for it, and keep it prestable at a moment's warning. I good Richard Moniplies, of Castle Collop, West Port of Edinburgh, in the meantime I am to return to his Majesty on matters of weight speaking, and mounting the stair to re-enter face, he added, by way of summing up the "George Heriot is over old a cock to be caught chaff."

Richie stood petrified when he beheld him the Palace, and found himself, as he supposed the lurch.—"Now, plague on ye," he muttered a cunning auld skinflint! that, because ye are nest man yoursell, forsooth, must needs deal the world as if they were knaves. But deil if ye beat me yet!—Gude guide us! yonder Laurie Linklater next, and he will be on me as sufflication.—I winna stand him, by Saint Andrew

So saying, and changing the haughty style which he had that morning entered the presence the Palace, into a skulking shamble, he retraced his wherry, which was in attendance, with high, to use the approved phrase on such occasions, readily resembled a flight.

CHAPTER XXXII.

Benedict. This looks not like a nuptial.
Much Ado about Nothing.

MASTER GEORGE HERIOT had no sooner returned to the King's apartment, than James inquired of Maxwell if the Earl of Huntinglen was in attendance, and, receiving an answer in the affirmative, desired that he should be admitted. The old Scottish Lord having made his reverence in the usual manner, the King extended his hand to be kissed, and then began to address him in a tone of great sympathy.

"We told your lordship in our secret epistle of this morning, written with our ain hand, in testimony we have neither pretermitted nor forgotten your faithful service, that we had that to communicate to you that would require both patience and fortitude to endure, and therefore exhorted you to peruse some of the most thy passages of Seneca, and of Boethius de Consolatione, that the back may be, as we say, fitted for the burden—This we commend to you from our ain experience.

"Non ignara mali, miseris succurrere disco," saith Dido, and I might say in my own person, non narus; but to change the gender would affect the osody, whercof our southern subjects are tenacious. So, my lord of Huntinglen, I trust you have acted by my advice, and studied patience before ye need it—re-enti occurrere morbo—mix the medicament when the disease is coming on."

"May it please your Majesty," answered Lord Huntinglen, "I am more of an old soldier than a scholar, and if my own rough nature will not bear me out in my calamity, I hope I shall have grace to try a text of Scripture to boot."

"Ay, man, are you there with your bears?" said the King; "the Bible, man," (touching his cap,) "is indeed principium et fons—but it is pity your lordship should not peruse it in the original. For although we ourselves promote that work of translation,—since ye may read, at the beginning of every Bible, at when some palpable clouds of darkness were ought like to have overshadowed the land, after the setting of that bright occidental star, Queen Elizabeth; yet our appearance, like that of the sun in his strength, instantly dispelled these surmised mists,—say, that although, as therein mentioned, we countenanced the preaching of the gospel, and especially the translation of the Scriptures out of the original Hebrew tongues; yet nevertheless, we ourselves consented to have found a comfort in consulting them in the original Hebrew, whilk we do not perceive even the Latin version of the Septuagint, much less in the English traduction."

"Please your Majesty," said Lord Huntinglen, "if your Majesty delays communicating the bad news to which your honoured letter threatens me, until I am capable to read Hebrew like your Majesty, I fear I shall die in ignorance of the misfortune which hath fallen, or is about to befall, my house."

"You will learn it but too soon, my lord," replied the King. "I grieve to say it, but your son Dalgarno, whom I thought a very saint, as he was so much like Steenie and Baby Charles, hath turned out a very villain."

"Villain!" repeated Lord Huntinglen; and though he instantly checked himself, and added, "but it is your Majesty speaks the word," the effect of his first remark made the King step back as if he had received a blow. He also recovered himself again, and said in a pettish way which usually indicated his displeasure—"Yes, my lord, it was we that said it—non sur--canis—we are not deaf—we pray you not to raise your voice in speech with us—there is the bonny memorial—read, and judge for yourself."

The King then thrust into the old nobleman's hand a paper, containing the story of the Lady Hermione, and the evidence by which it was supported, detailed briefly and clearly, that the infamy of Lord Dalgarno, the lover by whom she had been so shamefully deceived, seemed undeniable. But a father yields not up so easily the cause of his son.

"May it please your Majesty," he said, "why was this tale not sooner told? This woman hath been here for years—wherefore was the claim on my son not made the instant she touched English ground?"

"Tell him how that came about, Geordie," said the King, addressing Heriot.

"I grieve to distress my Lord Huntinglen," said Heriot; "but I must speak the truth. For a long time the Lady Hermione could not brook the idea of making her situation public; and when her mind became changed in that particular, it was necessary to recover the evidence of the false marriage, and letters and papers connected with it, which, when she came to Paris, and just before I saw her, she had deposited with a correspondent of her father in that city. He became afterwards bankrupt, and in consequence of that misfortune, the lady's papers passed into other hands, and it was only a few days since I traced and recovered them. Without these documents of evidence, it would have been imprudent for her to have preferred her complaint, favoured as Lord Dalgarno is by powerful friends."

"Ye are saucy to say sae," said the King; "I ken what ye mean weel enough—ye think Steenie wad hae putten the weight of his foot into the scales of justice, and garr'd them whome the bucket—ye forget, Geordie, wha it is whose hand uphauls them. And ye do poor Steenie the mair wrang, for he confessed it ance before us and our privy council, that Dalgarno would have put the quean aff on him, the poor simple bairn, making him trow that she was a light-o'-love; in whilk mind he remained assured even when he parted from her, albeit Steenie might hae weel thought ane of thae cattle wadna hae resisted the like of him."

"The Lady Hermione," said George Heriot, "has always done the utmost justice to the conduct of the Duke, who, although strongly possessed with prejudice against her character, yet scorned to avail himself of her distress, and on the contrary supplied her with the means of extricating herself from her difficulties."

"It was e'en like himsell—blessings on his bonny face!" said the King; "and I believed this lady's tale the mair readily, my lord Huntinglen, that she spak nae ill of Steenie—and to make a lang tale short, my lord, it is the opinion of our council and ourself, as weel as of Baby Charles and Steenie, that your son maun amend his wrong by wedding this lady, or undergo such disgrace and discountenance as we can bestow."

The person to whom he spoke was incapable of answering him. He stood before the King motionless, and glaring with eyes of which even the lids seemed immoveable, as if suddenly converted into an ancient statue of the times of chivalry, so instantly had his hard features and strong limbs been arrested into rigidity by the blow he had received—And in a second afterwards, like the same statue when the lightning breaks upon it, he sunk at once to the ground with a heavy groan. The King was in the utmost alarm, called upon Heriot and Maxwell for help, and, presence of mind not being his forte, ran to and fro in his cabinet, exclaiming—"My ancient and beloved servant—who saved our anointed self! Vae atque dolor! My Lord of Huntinglen, look up—look up, man, and your son may marry the Queen of Sheba if he will."

By this time Maxwell and Heriot had raised the old nobleman, and placed him on a chair; while the King, observing that he began to recover himself, continued his consolations more methodically.

"Haud up your head—haud up your head, and listen to your ain kind native Prince. If there is shame, man, it comesna empty-handed—there is siller to gild it—a gude tocher, and no that bad a pedigree;—if she has been a loon, it was your son made her sae, and he can make her an honest woman again."

These suggestions, however reasonable in the common case, gave no comfort to Lord Huntinglen, if indeed he fully comprehended them; but the blubbing of his good-natured old master, which began to accompany and interrupt his royal speech, produced more rapid effect. The large tear gushed instantaneously from his eye, as he kissed the withered hands, which the King, weeping with less dignity and restraint, abandoned to him, first alternately and then both together until the feelings of the man getting entirely the better of the Sovereign a sense of dignity he greeted and shook Lord Huntingten's hands with the sympathy of an equal and a familiar friend.

"Composui lacrymas," said the monarch, "be patient man, be patient;—the council, and Baby Charles and Steenie, may a' gang to the devil, he shall not marry her since it moves you so deeply."

"He shall marry her, by God!" answered the Earl, drawing himself up, dashing the tear from his eyes, and endeavouring to revert to his companion.

"I pray your Majesty a pardon, but he shall marry her, with her dishonour for her dowry, were she the vilest courtesan in all Spain—If he gave his word, he shall make his word good, were it to the means of a creature that haunts the streets—he shall do it, or my own dagger shall take the life that I gave him. If he could swoop to use no base a fraud, though to deceive infamy, let him wed infamy!"

"No, no," the Monarch continued to mutter, "things are not so bad as that—Steenie himself never thought of her being a street-walker, even when he thought the worst of her."

"If it can at all console my Lord of Huntingten," said the citizen, "I can assure him of this lady's good birth, and most fair and unspotted fame."

"I am sorry for it," said Lord Huntingten—then interrupting himself, he said—"Heaven forgive me for being ungrateful for such comfort!" but I am well-nigh sorry she should be as you represent her so much better than the villain deserves. To be condemned to wed beauty and innocence and honest birth—

"Ay, and wealth, my lord—wealth," murmured the King, "is a better sentence than his perfidy has deserved."

"It is long," said the embittered father, "since I saw he was selfish and hardhearted, but to be a perjured liar—I never dreamed that such a blot would have fallen on my race! I will never look on him again!"

"Hoot ay, my lord, hoot ay," said the King, "ye mean tak him to task roundly! I grant you should speak more in the vein of Demetrius than Vitellius, or some of the peruigilatores patrie, but as for not seeing him again, and he your only son, that is altogether out of reason. I tell ye, man, (but I would not for a boddie that Baby Charles heard me) that he might see the glads to half the losses of Lannan, or I could find in my heart to speak such harsh words as you have said of this deed of a Dalgarno of yours."

"May it please your Majesty to permit me to retire," said Lord Huntingten, "and dispose of the case according to your own royal sense of justice, for I desire no favour for him."

"Aweel, my lord, so be it; and if your lordship can think," added the Monarch, "of any thing in our power which might comfort you!"

"Your Majesty's gracious sympathy," said Lord Huntingten, "has already comforted me as far as earth can, the rest must be from the King of Kings."

"To Him I commend you, my wild and faithful servant," said James with emotion, as the Earl withdrew from his presence. The King remained fixed in thought for some time, and then said to Heriot, "Jingling George, ye ken all the privy doings of our Court, and have done so these thirty years, though, like a wise man, ye hear, and see, and say nothing. Now, there is a thing I fain wald ken, in the way of philosophical inquiry—Did you ever hear of the unquibbled Lady Huntingten the departed Countess of this noble Earl, gangin' a wee bit gleed in her walk through the world, I mean in the way of slipping a foot, missing a leggin' girth,* or the like, ye understand me?"

* A leggin' girth is the lowest loop upon a girth, or with pad. Allan Ramsay applies the phrase in the same metaphorical sense.

"Or he wad see red they first miss an' apell."

"I think it this frae my memory."

"And that a leggin' girth apell."

"Lang weel I coudnae Tammy."

Clarke's Scotch Gaelic Gloss.

"On my word as an honest man," said Heriot, somewhat surprised at the question, "we heard her wronged by the slightest suspicion. She was a worthy lady, very strict in her walk, and lived in great esteem by her husband, save that the good Countess—nothing of a partisan, and kept more a with ministers than was altogether agreeable to Huntingten, who is, as your Majesty well knows, a man of the old rough world, that will do swear."

"O George!" exclaimed the King, "a wild-world frailty, of which we dare not even ourselves absolutely free. But the web wears from day to day, George. The sun this age may well say with the poet—

*Et sic peritulum, perit etiam, talis

This Dalgarno does not drink so much, or so much as his father; but he wencheth. Come he breaks his word and oath bairn. As to the rest of the leddy and the ministers, we are a creature, fieschle, priests and kings as others, and wha kens but what that may be for the difference between this Dalgarno and the other? The Earl is the very soul of honour, we nee mair for world's gear than a noble head quest of a soulmate, but as for his son, he is to beazen us a out ourselves, Steenie, Baby Charles and our counsel—till he heard of the tocher, as by my kingly crown he lap like a cock at a hen. There are discrepancies between parent and son to be accounted for naturally, according to the poets, Michael Scott de secretis, and other Jingling George, if your clouting the raiment paching on pots, pans, and vessels of all metal, hadna jagird a' your grammar and bairn, I coudnae have wurded on that mair as my length."

Heriot was too plain-spoken to express even for the loss of his grammar learning a passion; but after modestly hinting that many men who could not fill their fathers' shoes though no one had been suspected of such father's nightcap, he inquired "whether Dalgarno had consented to do the Lady Harriet yet?"

"Truth, man, I have small doubt that he quoth the King; "I leave him the scholastic worldly substance, which you delivered to me, counsel, and we allowed him half an hour the end upon that. It is rare reading for him to reason. I left Baby Charles and Steenie his duty before him; and if he can read what they drive him—why, I wish he wald me the gate of it. O George, Jingling George was grand to hear Baby Charles laying the guilt of dissimulation and Steenie's leucine turpitude of incontinence!"

"I am afraid," said George Heriot, musing then gravely, "I might have thought of it before, but I cannae reproving an'."

"Do ye our own soul neighbour," said the King, "but ye are not blate! I gie ye the word, and, by our soul, ye do not let the leggin' girth be lost non utendo—it will suffer in the prescription in your hands. Is it fit that Baby Charles should let his thoughts be so soon? No—no—prince's thoughts are awa' from him—Qui necesse dissimulare necesse regere.—Our subject is bound to speak the whole truth to the King, but there is nae reciprocity of obligation for Steenie having been whiles a diller lang time, as it for you, who are his goldsmith, whom I doubt he wald an uncomfortable cast that up to him?"

Heriot did not feel himself called on to part of Lannan, and sacrifice himself for upholding cause of moral truth; he did not desert a, but by discerning his words, but simply exposed now for having offended his Majesty, with the placable King was sufficiently satisfied.

"And now, George, man," quoth he, "we his culprit, and hear what he has to say for himself, or I will see the job cleared this blessed day. Ye shall come w' me, for your evidence may be wanted."

The King led the way, accordingly, into a large apartment, where the Prince, the Duke of Buckingham, and one or two privy counsellors, were seated at a table, before which stood Lord Dalgarno, in an attitude of as much elegant ease and indifference as could be expressed, considering the stiff dress and manners of the times.

All rose and bowed reverently, while the King, to use a north country word, expressive of his mode of locomotion, tumbled to his chair or throne, making sign to Heriot to stand behind him.

"We hope," said his Majesty, "that Lord Dalgarno stands prepared to do justice to this unfortunate lady, and to his own character and honour."

"May I humbly inquire the penalty," said Lord Dalgarno, "in case I should unhappily find compliance with your Majesty's demands impossible?"

"Banishment from our Court, my lord," said the King; "from our Court and our countenance."

"Unhappy exile that I may be!" said Lord Dalgarno, in a tone of subdued irony—"I will at least carry your Majesty a picture with me, for I shall never see such another king."

"And banishment, my lord," said the Prince, sternly, "from these our dominions."

"That must be by form of law, please your Royal Highness," said Dalgarno, with an affection of respect, "and I have not heard that there is a statute, compelling us, under such penalty, to marry any woman we may play the fool with. Perhaps in Grace of Buckingham can tell me?"

"You are a villain, Dalgarno," said the haughty and vehement favourite.

"Pshaw, my lord, fit to a prisoner, and in presence of your royal and paternal gossip!" said Lord Dalgarno. "But I will cut this deliberation short. I have looked over this schedule of the goods and debts of Ermione Pauletti, daughter of the late nobleman, he is called the noble, or I read wrong, Giovanni Pauletti, of the House of Sansevero, in Genoa, and of the no less noble Lady Maud Olafant, the House of Glenvarloch. Well, I declare that I am pre-contracted in Spain to this noble lady, and here has passed betwixt us some certain profane matrimonial, and now, what more does this grave assembly require of me?"

"That you should repair the gross and infamous wrong you have done the lady, by marrying her with this hour," said the Prince.

"O, may it please your Royal Highness," answered Dalgarno, "I have a trifling relationship with an old girl, who calls herself my father, who may claim some vote in the matter. Alas! every son is not blessed with an obedient parent!" He hazarded a slight glance towards the throne, to give meaning to his words.

"We have spoken ourselves with Lord Huntington," said the King, "and are authorized to consent to his name."

"I could never have expected this intervention of a paraneta, which the vulgar translate blackfoot, of such eminent dignity," said Dalgarno, scarce concealing a sneer. "And my father hath consented? He was sent to say, ere we left Scotland, that the blood of unguen and of Glenvarloch would not mingle, ere they poured into the same basin. Perhaps he has a mind to try the experiment."

"My lord," said James, "we will not be longer troubled with—Will you instantly, and non mori, take this oath to your wife, in our chapel?"

"Statim atque instanti," answered Lord Dalgarno; "for I perceive by doing so, I shall obtain power to render great services to the commonwealth—I shall have acquired wealth to supply the wants of your Majesty, and a fair wife to be at the command of his Grace Buckingham."

The Duke rose, passed to the end of the table where Lord Dalgarno was standing, and whispered in his ear, "You have placed a fair mar at my command. Now—"

"Thus taunt cut deep through Lord Dalgarno's assumed composure. He started as if on a sudden had stung him, but instantly composed himself, and, fixing on the Duke's still smiting countenance an eye which spoke unutterable hatred, he pointed the forefinger of his left hand to the hilt of his sword, but in a manner which could scarce be observed by any one save Buckingham. The Duke gave him another smile of bitter scorn, and returned to his seat, in obedience to the commands of the King, who continued calling out, "Sit down, Strenge, sit down, I command you—we will have nae barns-breaking here!"

"Your Majesty needs not test my patience," said Lord Dalgarno; "and that I may keep it the better, I will not utter another word in this presence, save those enjoined to me in that happy portion of the Prayer Book, which begins with Deary Beloved, and ends with amercement."

"You are a hardened villain, Dalgarno," said the King, "and were I the law, by my father's soul, I would rather brook the stain of having been your concubine, than run the risk of becoming your wife. But she shall be under our special protection—Come, my lords, we will ourselves see this blithesome bridal." He gave the signal by raising, and moved towards the door, followed by the Prince, the Duke, and attendants, speaking to none, and looking at no one, yet seeming as if he were conversing with the girl and manner as if in reality he were so.

They reached the door, which was a private entrance, which communicated from the royal apartments. The Bishop of Winchester, in his purple and red, stood beside the altar, and the Duke of Devonshire, in his robes of the Lady Mary, stood at the foot of the altar. Lord Dalgarno bowed profoundly to the Duke and the Prince, observing the horror with which she regarded him, walked up, and stood before the altar, with a look of gravity. "Madam, etc," he said, "I have the honour to be acquainted with the man, let me inform you, he hath in the fullest degree vindicated your honour, so far as concerns your former intercourse. It is for you to consider whether you will put your fortune and happiness into the hands of one, who has shown himself unworthy of all trust."

The lady, with much difficulty, found words to make reply. "I owe to his Majesty's goodness," she said, "the care of providing me some reservation out of my own fortune, for my decent sustenance. The rest cannot be better disposed than in buying back the fair fame of which I am deprived, and the liberty of ending my life in peace and seclusion."

"The contract has been drawn up," said the King, "under our own eye, specially discharging the parties maritally, and agreeing they shall live separate. So buckle them, my Lord Bishop, as fast as you can, that they may sunder again the sooner."

The Bishop accordingly opened his book and commenced the marriage-ceremony, under circumstances so novel and so inauspicious. The responses of the bride were only expressed by inclinations of the head and body; while those of the bridegroom were spoken boldly and distinctly, with a tone resembling levity, if not scorn. When it was concluded, Lord Dalgarno advanced as if to salute the bride, but seeing that she drew back in fear and abhorrence, he contented himself with making her a low bow. He then drew up his form to its height, and stretched himself as if to say, "I am a man of stature," but elegantly, and with a very fine blanching attitude. "I could expect," he said, "though I am a letter—but they are—light and lighty women. Well, I see all eyes look on me, and I should withdraw. The sun shines somewhere in England! But first I must ask, how this fair Lady Dalgarno is to be bestowed. Methinks it is but to be known. Is she to be wed to the hand of my Lord Duke? Or is this word—adultery—to be used?"

He then turned to the King, and his father, Lord Huntington, who had kept in the background during the ceremony, and now stepping suddenly forward, caught the lady by the arm, and confronted her, crying in a hoarse voice—"The Lady Dalgarno," he continued, "she remains as a widow in my house. A widow I esteem her as much as if the grave had closed over her dishonoured husband."

Lord Dalgarno exhibited momentary symptoms of extreme confusion, and said, in a submissive tone, "If you, my lord, can wish me dead, I cannot, though your heir, return the compliment. Few of the first-born of Israel," he added, recovering himself from the single touch of emotion he had displayed, "can say so much with truth. But I will convince you ere I go, that I am a true descendant of a house famed for its memory of injuries."

"I marvel your Majesty will listen to him longer," said Prince Charles. "Methinks we have heard enough of his daring insolence."

But James, who took the interest of a true gossip in such a scene as was now passing, could not bear to cut the controversy short, but imposed silence on his son, with "Whisht, Baby Charles—there is a good bairn, whisht!—I want to hear what the frontless loon can say."

"Only, sir," said Dalgarno, "that but for one single line in this schedule, all else that it contains could not have bribed me to take that woman's hand into mine."

"That line maun have been the summa totalis," said the King.

"Not so, sire," replied Dalgarno. "The sum total might indeed have been an object for consideration even to a Scottish king, at no very distant period; but it would have had little charms for me, save that I see here an entry which gives me the power of vengeance over the family of Glenvarloch; and learn from it that yonder pale bride, when she put the wedding torch into my hand, gave me the power of burning her mother's house to ashes!"

"How is that?" said the King. "What is he speaking about, Jingling Geordie?"

"This friendly citizen, my liege," said Lord Dalgarno, "hath expended a sum belonging to my lady, and now I thank heaven, to me, in acquiring a certain mortgage, or wadset, over the estate of Glenvarloch, which, if it be not redeemed before to-morrow at noon, will put me in possession of the fair demesnes of those who once called themselves our house's rivals."

"Can this be true?" said the King.

"It is even but too true, please your Majesty," answered the citizen. "The Lady Hermione having advanced the money for the original creditor, I was obliged, in honour and honesty, to take the rights to her; and, doubtless, they pass to her husband."

"But the warrant, man," said the King—"the warrant on our Exchequer—Couldna that supply the lad wi' the means of redemption?"

"Unhappily, my liege, he has lost it, or disposed of it—it is not to be found. He is the most unlucky youth!"

"This is a proper spot of work!" said the King, beginning to amble about and play with the points of his doublet and hose, in expression of dismay. "We cannot aid him without paying our debts twice over, and we have, in the present state of our Exchequer, scarce the means of paying them once."

"You have told me news," said Lord Dalgarno, "but I will take no advantage."

"Do not," said his father. "Be a bold villain, since thou must be one, and seek revenge with arms, and not with the usurer's weapons."

"Pardon me, my lord," said Lord Dalgarno. "Pen and ink are now my surest means of vengeance; and more land is won by the lawyer with the ram-skin than by the Andrea Ferrara with his sheepsheaf handle. But, as I said before, I will take no advantages. I will await in town to-morrow, near Covent-Garden; if any one will pay the redemption-money to my scrivener, with whom the deeds lie, the better for Lord Glenvarloch; if not, I will go forward on the next day, and travel with all despatch to the north, to take possession."

"Take a father's malison with you, unhappy wretch!" said Lord Huntinglen.

"And a King's, who is pater patriæ," said James.

"I trust to hear both lightly," said Lord Dalgarno; and bowing around him, he withdrew; while all present, oppressed, and, as it were, overawed, by his determined effrontery, found they could draw breath more freely, when he at length relieved them of his society. Lord Huntinglen, applying him comfort his new daughter-in-law, withdrew with also; and the King, with his privy-council, who had not dismissed, again returned to his chamber, though the hour was unusually late. His attendance was still commanded, but for reason was not explained to him.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

—— I'll play the eavesdropper.

Richard III., Act V., 2

JAMES had no sooner resumed his seat at the council-board, than he began to hitch in his chair, use his handkerchief, and make other intimations that he meditated a long speech. The council posed themselves to the becoming degree of attention. Charles, as strict in his notions of decorum as his father was indifferent to it, fixed himself in a attitude of rigid and respectful attention, while the haughty favourite, conscious of his power over father and son, stretched himself more easily in his seat, and, in assuming an appearance of laziness, seemed to pay a debt to ceremonial rather than to duty.

"I doubt not, my lords," said the Monarch, "some of you may be thinking the hour of rest is past, and that it is time to ask with the slave comedy—Quid de symbolo?—Nevertheless, justice and exercise judgment is our meat and drink, and now we are to pray your wisdom to consider the case of this unhappy youth, Lord Glenvarloch, whether, consistently with our honour, any can be done in his favour."

"I am surprised at your Majesty's wisdom in the inquiry," said the Duke; "it is plain this Duke hath proved one of the most insolent villains of the age, and it must therefore be clear, that if Lord Glenvarloch had run him through the body, there would have been out of the world a knave who had done it too long. I think Lord Glenvarloch hath done wrong; and I regret that, by the persuasion of a false fellow, I have myself had some hand in it."

"Ye speak like a child, Steenie—I mean my Lord of Buckingham," answered the King, "and that does not understand the logic of the action for an action may be inconsequential or even ridiculous, quoad hominem, that is, as touching him whom it is acted; and yet most criminal, quoad deum, or considering the place wherein it is done; as may lawfully dance Chrightry Beardie or any dance in a tavern, but not inter parietes ecclesiæ, that, though it may have been a good deed if stuck Lord Dalgarno, being such as he has himself, anywhere else, yet it fell under the displeasure of the Court. For, let me tell you, my lords, the law against striking would be of small use in our country if it could be eluded by justifying the person to be a knave. It is much to be lamented that the Court in Christendom where knaves are to be found; and if men are to break the peace by pretence of beating them, why, it will rain staves in our very antechamber."

"What your Majesty says," replied Prince Charles, "is marked with your usual wisdom—the precepts of the palaces must be sacred as well as the precepts of the kings, which are respected even in the most barbarous nations, as being one step only beyond the divinities. But your Majesty's will can counteract the severity of this and every other law, and it is your power, on consideration of his case, to grant this young man a free pardon."

"Rem acu tetigisti, Carole, mi puerule," said the King; "and know, my lords, that we have shrewd device and gift of our own, already in the very depth of this Lord Glenvarloch's design. I trow there be among you some that remember handling in the curious case of my Lady Levenstam how I trimmed them about the story of her behind the arras.* Now this put me to cogitation, and I remembered me of having read that Dionysius, King of Syracuse, whom historians call Τέοαρρος, which signifieth not in the Greek tongue, as in ours, a truculent usurper, but a royal king who governs, it may be, something more strictly than we and other awful monarchs, whom the ancients termed Βασιλεῖς—Now this Dionysius of Syracuse caused cunning workmen to build for himself a lugg—D'ye ken what that is, my Lord Bishop?"

* The old-fashioned weapon called the Jeddart, a species of battle-axe. Of a very great tempest, it is said south of Scotland, that it rains Jeddart staffs, as in England common people talk of its raining cats and dogs.

"A cathedral, I presume to guess," answered the Bishop.

"What the deil, man—I crave your lordship's pardon for swearing—but it was no cathedral—only a curking-place called the king's lugg, or car, where he could sit undescried, and hear the converse of his prisoners. Now, sirs, in imitation of this Dionysius, whom I took for my pattern, the rather that he was a great linguist and grammarian, and taught a school with good applause after his abdication, (either he or his successor of the same name, it matters not whilk)—I have caused them to make a lugg up at the state-prison of the Tower yonder, more like a pulpit than a cathedral, my Lord Bishop—and communicating with the arras behind the Lieutenant's chamber, where we may sit and privily hear the discourse of such prisoners as are pent up there for state-offences, and so creep into the very secrets of our enemies."

The Prince cast a glance towards the Duke, expressive of great vexation and disgust. Buckingham shrugged his shoulders, but the motion was so slight as to be almost imperceptible.

"Weel, my lords, ye ken the fray at the hunting this morning—I shall not get out of the trembling anxieties until I have a sound night's sleep—just after that, they bring ye in a pretty page that had been found in the Park. We were warned against examining him ourselves by the anxious care of those around us; nevertheless, holding our life ever at the service of these kingdoms, we commanded all to avoid the room, the rather that we suspected this boy to be a girl. What think ye, my lords?—few of you would have thought I had a hawk's eye for sic gear; but we thank God, that though we are old, we know so much of such toys as may beseein a man of decent gravity. Weel, my lords, we questioned this maiden in male attire ourselves, and I profess it was a very pretty interrogatory, and well followed. For, though she at first professed that she assumed this disguise in order to countenance the woman who should present us with the Lady Hermione's petition, for whom she professed entire affection; yet when we, suspecting

* Whether out of a meddling propensity common to all who have a gossiping disposition, or from the love of justice, which ought to make part of a prince's character, James was very fond of inquiring personally into the causes célèbres which occurred during his reign. In the imposture of the Boy of Bilson, who pretended to be possessed, and of one Richard Haydock, a poor scholar, who pretended to preach during his sleep, the King, to use the historian Wilson's expression, took delight in sounding with the line of his understanding, the depth of these British impositions, and in doing so, showed the acuteness with which he was endowed by Nature. Lady Lake's story consisted in a clamorous complaint against the Countess of Exeter, whom she accused of a purpose to put to death Lady Lake herself, and her daughter, Lady Ross, the wife of the Countess's own son-in-law, Lord Ross; and a forged letter was produced, in which Lady Exeter was made to acknowledge such a purpose. The account given of the occasion of obtaining this letter, was, that it had been written by the Countess at Wimbledon, in presence of Lady Lake and her daughter, Lady Ross, being designed to procure their forgiveness for her mischievous intention. The King remained still unsatisfied, the writing, in his opinion, bearing strong marks of forgery. Lady Lake and her daughter then alleged, that, besides their own attestation, and that of a confidential domestic, named Diego, in whose presence Lady Exeter had written the confession, their story might also be supported by the oath of their waiting maid, who had been placed behind the hangings at the time the letter was written, and heard the Countess of Exeter read over the confession after she had signed it. Determined to be at the bottom of this accusation, James, while hunting one day near Wimbledon, the scene of the alleged confession, suddenly left his sport, and, galloping hastily to Wimbledon, in order to examine personally the room, discovered, from the size of the apartment, that the alleged conversation could not have taken place in the manner sworn to; and that the tapestry of the chamber, which had remained in the same state for thirty years, was too short by two feet, and, therefore could not have concealed any one behind it. This matter was accounted an exclusive discovery of the King by his own spirit of shrewd investigation. The parties were punished in the Star Chamber by fine and imprisonment.

anguis in herba, did put her to the very question, she was compelled to own a virtuous attachment for Glenvarlochides, in such a pretty passion of shame and fear, that we had much ado to keep our own eyes from keeping company with hers in weeping. Also, she laid before us the false practices of this Dalgarno towards Glenvarlochides, inveigling him into houses of ill resort, and giving him evil counsel under pretext of sincere friendship, whereby the inexperienced lad was led to do what was prejudicial to himself, and offensive to us. But, however prettily she told her tale, we determined not altogether to trust to her narration, but rather to try the experiment whilk we had devised for such occasions. And having ourselves speedily passed from Greenwich to the Tower, we constituted ourselves eavesdropper, as it is called, to observe what should pass between Glenvarlochides and this page, whom we caused to be admitted to his apartment, well judging that if they were of counsel together to deceive us, it could not be but something of it would spunk out—And what think ye we saw, my lords?—Naething for you to sniggle and laugh at, Steenie—for I question if you could have played the temperate and Christian-like part of this poor lad Glenvarloch. He might be a Father of the Church in comparison of you, man.—And then, to try his patience yet farther, we loosed on him a courtier and a citizen, that is Sir Mungo Malagrowth and our servant George Heriot here, wha dang the poor lad about, and didna greatly spare our royal selves.—You mind, Geordie, what you said about the wives and concubines? but I forgie ye, man—nae need of kneeling, I forgie ye—the reader that it regards a certain particular, whilk, as it added not much to Solomon's credit, the lack of it cannot be said to impinge on ours. Aweel, my lords, for all temptation of sore distress and evil ensample, this poor lad never loosed his tongue on us to say one unbecoming word—which inclines us the rather, acting always by your wise advice, to treat this affair of the Park as a thing done in the heat of blood, and under strong provocation, and therefore to confer our free pardon on Lord Glenvarloch."

"I am happy your gracious Majesty," said the Duke of Buckingham, "has arrived at that conclusion, though I could never have guessed at the road by which you attained it."

"I trust," said Prince Charles, "that it is not a path which your Majesty will think it consistent with your high dignity to tread frequently."

"Never while I live again, Baby Charles, that I give you my royal word on. They say that hearkeners hear ill tales of themselves—by my saul, my very ears are tingling wi' that auld sorrow Sir Mungo's sarcasms. He called us close-fisted, Steenie—I am sure you can contradict that. But it is mere envy in the auld mutilated sinner, because he himself has neither a noble to hold in his loof, nor fingers to close on it if he had." Here the King lost recollection of Sir Mungo's irreverence in chuckling over his own wit, and only farther alluded to it by saying—"We must give the old maunderer bos in linguam—something to stop his mouth, or he will rail at us from Dan to Beersheba.—And now, my lords, let our warrant of mercy to Lord Glenvarloch be presently expedited, and he put to his freedom; and as his estate is likely to go so sleeveless a gate, we will consider what means of favour we can show him.—My lords, I wish you an appetite to an early supper—for our labours have approached that term.—Baby Charles and Steenie, you will remain till our couchee.—My Lord Bishop, you will be pleased to stay to bless our meat.—Geordie Heriot, a word with you apart."

His Majesty then drew the citizen into a corner, while the counsellors, those excepted who had been commanded to remain, made their obeisance, and withdrew. "Geordie," said the King, "my good and trusty servant"—Here he busied his fingers much with the points and ribands of his dress—"Ye see that we have granted, from our own natural sense of right and justice, that which yon long-backed fallow, Moniplies I think they ca' him, proffered to purchase from us with a mighty bribe; whilk we refused, as being a crowned King, who wad neither sell our justice nor our mercy for pecuniary consideration. Now, what think ye should be the upshot of this?"

"My Lord Glenvarloch's freedom, and his restoration to your Majesty's favour," said Heriot.

"I ken that," said the King, peevishly. "Ye are very dull to-day. I mean, what do you think this fellow Monplies should think about the matter?"

"Surely that your Majesty is a most good and gracious sovereign," answered Heriot.

"We had need to be good and gracious bairns," said the King, still more peevishly. "that have idiots about us that cannot understand what we mean at unless we speak it out in braid Lowlands. See this child Monplies, sir, and tell him what we have done for Lord Glenvarloch, in whom he takes such part, out of our own gracious motion, though we refused to do it on any proffer of private advantage. Now, you may put it till him, as if of your own mind, whether it will be a gracious or a dutiful part in him, to press us for present payment of the two or three hundred miserable pounds for which we were obliged to opignorate our jewels? Indeed, many men may think ye wad do the part of a good citizen, if you took it on yourself to refuse him payment, seeing he hath had what he professed to esteem full satisfaction, and considering, moreover, that it is evident he hath no pressing need of the money, whereof we have much necessity."

George Heriot sighed internally. "O my Master," thought he—"my dear Master, is it then fated you are never to indulge any kingly or noble sentiment, without its being sullied by some afterthought of interested selfishness?"

The King troubled himself not about what he thought, but taking him by the collar, said, "Ye ken my meaning now, Jingle-awa wi' ye. You are a wise man—manage it your ain gate—but forget not our present straits." The citizen made his obeisance, and withdrew.

"And now, bairns," said the King, "what do you look upon each other for—and what have you got to ask of your dear dad and gossip?"

"Only," said the Prince, "that it would please your Majesty to command the lurking-place at the prison to be presently built up—the groans of a captive should not be brought in evidence against him."

"What! build up my buzz, Baby Charles? And yet, better deaf than hear all tales of oneself. So let them build it up, hard and fast, without delay, the rather that my back is sair with sitting in it for a whole hour.—And now let us see what the cooks have been doing for us, bonny bairns."

CHAPTER XXXIV.

To this brave man the knight repairs
For counsel in his law affairs;
And found him mounted to his pew
With books and money placed for show.
Like nest eggs to make clients lay,
And for his false opinion pay—Hudibras.

Our readers may recollect a certain smooth-tongued, lank-haired, buckram-suited, Scottish scrivener, who, in the first part of this history, appeared in the character of a protegee of George Heriot. It is to his house we are about to remove, but times have changed with him. The petty booth hath become a chamber of importance—the buckram suit is changed into black velvet; and although the wearer retains his puritanical humility and politeness to clients of consequence, he can now look others broad in the face, and treat them with a full allowance of superior opulence, and the insolence arising from it. It was but a short period that had achieved these alterations, nor was the party himself as yet entirely accustomed to them, but the change was becoming less embarrassing to him with every day's practice. Among other acquisitions of wealth, you may see one of Davy Ramsay's best timepieces on the table, and his eye is frequently observing its revolutions, while a boy, whom he employs as a scribe, is occasionally sent out to compare its progress with the clock of Saint Dunstan.

The scrivener himself seemed considerably agitated. He took from a strong-box a bundle of parchments, and read passages of them with great attention; then began to soliloquize—"There is no law which law can suggest—no back-door of evasion—if the lands of Glenvarloch are not redeemed before it rings noon, Lord Dalgarno has them a pennyworth. Strange, that he should have been last able to set his patron at defiance, and achieve himself the fair estate, with the prospect of what so long flattered the powerful Buckingham.—No, not Andrew Skurlewitter nick him as neatly! He hath been my patron—true—not more than Buckingham was his; and he can be so no more, for he departs presently for Scotland. I am glad of it—I hate him and I fear him. He knows too many of my secrets—I know too many of his. But, no—no—no—I never attempt it, there are no means of over-matching him. Well, Willie, what o'clock?"

"Ele'en hours just chappit, sir."

"Go to your desk without, child," said the scrivener. "What to do next—I shall lose the old fair business, and, what is worse, his son's society. Old Heriot looks too close into business to permit me more than the paltry and ordinary. The Whitefriars business was profitable, but it has become unsafe ever since—pah!—what brought it in my head just now? I can hardly hold my tongue if men should see me in this way!—Willie," (he aloud to the boy,) "a cup of distilled water—now I could face the devil."

He spoke the last words aloud, and closed the door of the apartment, which was suddenly opened by Richie Monplies, followed by two gentlemen, attended by two porters bearing money-bags. "Ye can face the devil, Maister Skurlewitter," said Richie, "ye will be the less likely to turn round on a rack or twa o' siller, which I have got a freedom to bring you. Sathanas and Master near akin." The porters, at the same time, set their load on the floor.

"I—I—stammered the surprised scrivener—cannot guess what you mean, sir."

"Only that I have brought you the redemption money on the part of Lord Glenvarloch, in discharge of a certain mortgage over his family inheritance. And here, in good time, comes Master Reginald Lowestoffe, and another honourable gentleman, the Temple, to be witnesses to the transaction."

"I—I incline to think," said the scrivener, "the term is expired."

"You will pardon us, Master Scrivener," said Lowestoffe. "You will not baffle us—it was a quarter of noon by every clock in the city."

"I must have time, gentlemen," said Andrew, "examine the gold by tale and weight."

"Do so at your leisure, Master Scrivener," replied Lowestoffe again. "We have already seen the contents of each sack told and weighed, and we have put our seals on them. There they stand in a row, twenty in number, each containing three hundred yellow-hammers—we are witnesses to the tender."

"Gentlemen," said the scrivener, "this sum now belongs to a mighty lord. I pray you, sir, your haste, and let me send for Lord Dalgarno—rather I will run for him myself."

So saying, he took up his hat; but Lowestoffe called out, "Friend Monplies, keep the door fast, as thou be'st a man! he seeks but to put off the time. In plain terms, Andrew, you may send for the lord if you will, who is the mightiest lord of my acquaintance, but from hence you stir not till you have answered our proposition, by rejecting or accepting the redemption-money fairly tendered—there it lies—take it or leave it as you will. I have skill enough to know that the law is mightier than any lord in Britain have learned so much at the Temple, if I have learned nothing else. And see that you trifle not with lest it make your long ears an inch shorter, Master Skurlewitter."

"Nay, gentlemen, if you threaten me," said the scrivener, "I cannot resist compulsion."

"No threats—no threats at all, my little Andrew," said Lowestoffe; "a little friendly advice" forget not, honest Andrew, I have seen you in Alton."

Without answering a single word, the scrivener set down, and drew in proper form a full receipt for the money proffered.

"I take it on your report, Master Lowestoffe," he said; "I hope you will remember I have insisted either upon weight or tale—I have been civil—if there is deficiency, I shall come to loss."

"Fillip his nose with a gold piece, Richus," quoth the templer. "Take up the papers, and now wend ye merrily to dine thou wot'st where."

"If I might choose," said Richus, "it should not be at yonder roguish ordinary; but as it is your pleasure, gentlemen, the treat shall be given wheresoever ye will have it."

"At the ordinary," said the one Templar.

"At Beauceux's," said the other; "it is the only place in London for neat wines, humble drawers, spice dishes, and"—

"And high charges," quoth Richus Monoplia. "But, as I said before, gentlemen, ye have a right command me in this thing, having so frankly reneged me your service in this small matter of business, without other stipulation than that of a slight inquiet."

The latter part of this discourse passed in the street here immediately afterwards, they met Lord Dalgarno. He appeared in haste, touched his hat slightly.

Master Lowestoffe, who returned his reverence with the same negligence, and walked slowly on with his companion, while Lord Dalgarno stopped Richus Monoplia with a commanding sign, which the strict of education compelled Monoplia, though ignorant, to obey.

"Whom do you now follow, arrah?" demanded a noble.

"Whomsoever goeth before me, my lord," answered Monoplia.

"No sauciness, you knave—I desire to know if ye will serve Nigel Ohfaunt?" said Dalgarno.

"I am friend to the noble Lord Glenvarloch," answered Monoplia with dignity.

"True," replied Lord Dalgarno, "that noble lord is sunk to seek friends among lacquers—Nevertheless—bark thou hither—nevertheless, if he be of the same mind as when we last met, thou mayst show us, that, on to-morrow at four afternoon I shall go northward by Enfield Chase. I will be a wanderer, attended, as I design to meet my truth through street. It is my purpose to ride on any place through forest, and to linger awhile in Camlet Wood—he owns the place, and if he be such a fellow as I naturally will think it fitter for some purpose than the rest. He is, I understand, at this point shortly to go. If he fail to do at the place now stated, he must seek me in Scotland, where he will find the possession of his father's estate and lands."

"Humph!" muttered Richus; "there go two words that bargain."

He even meditated a joke on the means which he was conscious he possessed of baffling Lord Dalgarno's expectations, but there was something of keen and dangerous excitement in the eyes of the young gentlemen, which prompted his discretion for once to let his wit, and he only answered—

"God grant your lordship may well brook your conquest—when you get it. I shall do your errand to my lord—what is to say," he added internally, "he shall never hear a word of it from Richus. I am not the lad to put him in such hazard."

Lord Dalgarno looked at him sharply for a moment, as if to penetrate the meaning of the dry ironical tone, which, in spite of Richus's awe, tingled through his answer, and then waved his hand, in signal that he passed on. He himself walked slowly till the two were out of sight, then turned back with hasty steps to the door of the scrivener, which he had passed in his progress through the street, and was admitted.

Lord Dalgarno found the man of law with the money bags still standing before him, and it escaped his penetrating glance that Skurlewatter was concerned and alarmed at his approach.

"How now, man," he said; "what hast thou not a word of oily compliment to me on my happy marriage?—not a word of most philosophical consolation on my disgrace at Court?—Or has my men, as a witto! and discarded favourite, the property of the Gorgon's head, the turbate Paladine arms, as Majesty might say?"

"My lord, I am glad—my lord, I am sorry"—answered the trembling scrivener, who, aware of the vivacity of Lord Dalgarno's temper, dreaded the consequences of the communication he had to make to him.

"Glad and sorry?" answered Lord Dalgarno. "That is blowing hot and cold with a witness. Mark ye, you picture of petty larceny personified—if you are sorry I am a cuckold, remember I am only mine own, you knave—there is too little blood in her cheeks to have sent her astray elsewhere. Well, I will bear mine antlered honours as I may—gold shall gild them; and for my disgrace, revenge shall sweeten it. Ay, revenge—and there strikes the happy hour?"

The hour of noon was accordingly heard to peal from Saint Dunstan's. "Well banged, brave hammer!" said Lord Dalgarno in triumph. "The estate and lands of Glenvarloch are crushed beneath these clanging blows. If my steel to-morrow prove but as true as your iron maces to-day, the poor landless lord will little miss what your peal hath cut him out from—The papers—the papers, thou varlet! I am to-morrow Northward, ho! At four afternoon, I am bound to be at Camlet Moat, in the Enfield Chase. To-night most of my retinue set forward. The papers!—Come, dispatch."

"My lord, the—the papers of the Glenvarloch mortgage—I—I have them not."

"Have them not?" echoed Lord Dalgarno. "Hast thou sent them to my lodging, thou varlet? Did I not say I was coming hither?—What mean you by pointing to that money? What villainy have you done for it? It is too large to be come honestly by."

"Your lordship knows best," answered the scrivener, in great perturbation. "The gold is your own. It is—it is—"

"Not the redemption money of the Glenvarloch estate?" said Dalgarno. "Dare not say it is, or I will, upon the spot, divorce your pettifoggish soul from your carnion carcass." So saying, he seized the scrivener by the collar and shook him so vehemently, that he tore it from the cassock.

"My lord, I must call for help," said the trembling craft, who felt at that moment all the bitterness of the mortal agony—"It was the law's act, not mine. What could I do?"

"Dost ask?—why, thou travelling drabbist of damnation, were all thy oaths, tricks, and lies spent? or do you hold yourself too good to utter them in my service? Thou shouldst have had, cozened, out-sworn truth itself, rather than stood betwixt me and my revenge! But mark me," he continued; "I know more of your pranks than would hang thee. A line from me to the Attorney-General, and thou art sped."

"What would you have me to do, my lord?" said the scrivener. "All that art and law can accomplish, I will try."

"Ah, are you converted? do so, or pity of your life!" said the lord; "and remember I never told my word—Then keep that accursed gold," he continued. "Or, stay, I will not trust you—send me this gold home presently to my lodging. I will still forward to Scotland, and it shall go hard but that I hold out Glenvarloch Castle against the owner, by means of the ammunition he has himself furnished. Thou art ready to serve me?" The scrivener professed the most implicit obedience.

"Then remember, the hour was passed ere payment was tendered—and ere thou hast witness of trusty memory to prove that point."

"Tush, my lord, I will do more," said Andrew, reviving—"I will prove that Lord Glenvarloch's friends threatened, swaggered, and drew swords on me.—Did your lordship think I was ungrateful enough to have suffered them to prejudice your lordship, save that they had bare swords at my throat?"

"Enough said," replied Dalgarno; "you are per-fact—mind that you continue so, as you would avoid my fury. I leave my page below—get porters, and let them follow me instantly with the gold."

So saying, Lord Dalgarno left the scrivener's habitation.

Skurliewhitter, having despatched his boy to get porters of trust for transporting the money, remained alone and in dismay, meditating by what means he could shake himself free of the vindictive and ferocious nobleman, who possessed at once a dangerous knowledge of his character, and the power of exposing him, where exposure would be ruin. He had indeed acquiesced in the plan, rapidly sketched, for obtaining possession of the ransomed estate, but his experience foresaw that this would be impossible; while, on the other hand, he could not anticipate the various consequences of Lord Dalgarno's resentment, without fears, from which his sordid soul recoiled. To be in the power, and subject both to the humours and the extortions of a spendthrift young lord, just when his industry had shaped out the means of fortune,—it was the most cruel trick which fate could have played the incipient usurer.

While the scrivener was in this fit of anxious anticipation, one knocked at the door of the apartment; and, being desired to enter, appeared in the coarse riding-cloak of uncut Wiltshire cloth, fastened by a broad leather belt and brass buckle, which was then generally worn by graziers and countrymen. Skurliewhitter, believing he saw in his visitor a country client who might prove profitable, had opened his mouth to request him to be seated, when the stranger, throwing back his frieze hood which he had drawn over his face, showed the scrivener features well imprinted in his recollection, but which he never saw without a disposition to swoon.

"Is it you?" he said, faintly, as the stranger replaced the hood which concealed his features.

"Who else should it be?" said his visitor.

"Then son of parchment, got betwixt the inkhorn
And the stuff'd process-bag—that mayest call
The pen thy father, and the ink thy mother,
The wax thy brother, and the sand thy sister,
And the good pillory thy cousin allied—Kneel, and do reverence unto me, thy better!"

"Not yet down to the country," said the scrivener, "after every warning? Do not think your grazier's cloak will bear you out, captain—no, nor your scraps of stage-plays."

"Why, what would you have me to do?" said the captain—"Would you have me starve? If I am to fly, you must eke my wings with a few feathers. You can spare them, I think."

"You had means already—you have had ten pieces—What is become of them?"

"Gone," answered Captain Colepepper—"Gone, no matter where—I had a mind to bite, and I was bitten, that's all—I think my hand shook at the thought of to-day's work, for I trowled the doctors like a very baby."

"And you have lost all, then?—Well, take this and be gone," said the scrivener.

"What, two poogmelts! Marry, plague of your bounty!—But remember, you are as deep in as I."

"Not so, by Heaven!" answered the scrivener; "I only thought of easing the old man of some papers and a trifle of his gold, and you took his life."

"Were he living," answered Colepepper, "he would rather have lost it than his money.—But that is not the question, Master Skurliewhitter—you undid the private bolts of the window when you visited him about some affairs on the day ere he died—so satisfy yourself, that, if I am taken, I will not swing alone. Pity Jack Hempfield is dead, it spoils the old catch,

"And three merry men, and three merry men,
And three merry men are we,
As ever did sing three parts in a string,
All under the triple tree."

"For God's sake, speak lower," said the scrivener; "in this place or time to make your midnight catches heard?—But how much will serve your turn? I tell you I am but ill provided."

and his companion were not indisposed to a little merriment at the expense of the raw and pedantic Scot; besides the chance of easing him of a few pence, of which he appeared to have acquired considerable command. But not even a succession of measures of sparkling sack, in which the little brilliant ornaments circulated like motes in the sun's rays, had the same effect on Richie's sense of decorum. He retained the gravity of a judge, even while he drank like a hero, partly from his own natural inclination to good order, partly in the way of good fellowship towards his guests. When the wine began to make some impression on their heads, Master Lowestoffe, tired, perhaps, of the humours of Richie, who began to become more stoically contradictory and dogmatical than even in the earlier part of the entertainment, proposed to his friend to break up their debauch and join the domestics.

The drawer was called accordingly, and Richie discharged the reckoning of the party, with a generous muneration to the attendants, which was received with cap and knee, and many assurances of—"Kind-welcome, gentlemen."

"I grieve we should part so soon, gentlemen," said Richie to his companions,—“and I would you had asked another quart ere you went, or stayed to take some slight matter of supper, and a glass of Rhenish. Thank you, however, for having graced my poor collection thus far; and I commend you to fortune, in your own courses, for the ordinary neither was, is, nor will be, an element of mine."

"Fare thee well, then," said Lowestoffe, "most pient and sententious Master Moniplies. May you soon have another mortgage to redeem, and may I be there to witness it; and may you play the good fellow as heartily as you have done this day."

"Nay, gentlemen, it is merely of your grace to say so—but, if you would but hear me speak a few words of admonition respecting this wicked ordinary"—

"Reserve the lesson, most honourable Richie," said Lowestoffe, "until I have lost all my money,"—saying, at the same time, a purse indifferently well provided, "and then the lecture is likely to have some effect."

"And keep my share of it, Richie," said the other exemplar, showing an almost empty purse, in his turn, "till this be full again, and then I will promise to hear you with some patience."

"Ay, ay, gallants," said Richie, "the full and the empty gang a' ae gate, and that is a gray one—but the new one will come."

"Nay, it is come already," said Lowestoffe; "they have set out the hazard table. Since you will peremptorily not go with us, why, farewell, Richie."

"And farewell, gentlemen," said Richie, and left the house, into which they had returned.

Moniplies was not many steps from the door, when a person, whom, lost in his reflections on gaming, ornaments, and the manners of the age, he had not observed, and who had been as negligent on his part, ran full against him; and, when Richie desired to know whether he meant "ony incivility," replied by a curse on Scotland, and all that belonged to it. A less sound reflection on his country would, at any time, have provoked Richie, but more especially when he had a double quart of Canary and better in his pate. He was about to give a very rough answer, and to second his word by action, when a closer view of his antagonist changed his purpose.

"You are the vera lad in the world," said Richie, "whom I most wished to meet."

"And you," answered the stranger, "or any of our beggarly countrymen, are the last sight I should ever wish to see. You Scots are ever fair and false, and an honest man cannot thrive within eyeshot of you."

"As to our poverty, friend," replied Richie, "that is as Heaven pleases; but touching our falset, I'll prove to you that a Scotsman bears as leal and true a heart to his friend as ever beat in English doublet."

"I care not whether he does or not," said the gallant. "Let me go—why keep you hold of my cloak? Let me go, or I will thrust you into the kennel."

"I believe I could forgie ye, for you did me a good turn once, in plucking me out of it," said the Scot.

"Beshrew my fingers, then, if they did so," replied the stranger. "I would your whole country lay there, along with you; and Heaven's curse blight the hand that helped to raise them!—Why do you stop my way?" he added fiercely.

"Because it is a bad one, Master Jenkin," said Richie. "Nay, never start about it, man—you see you are known. Alack-a-day! that an honest man's son should live to start at hearing himself called by his own name!" Jenkin struck his brow violently with his clenched fist.

"Come, come," said Richie, "this passion availeth nothing. Tell me what gate go you?"

"To the devil!" answered Jin Vin.

"That is a black gate, if you speak according to the letter," answered Richie; "but if metaphorically, there are worse places in this great city than the Devil Tavern; and I care not if I go thither with you, and bestow a pottle of burnt sack on you—it will correct the crudities of my stomach, and form a gentle preparative for the leg of a cold pullet."

"I pray you, in good fashion, to let me go," said Jenkin. "You may mean me kindly, and I wish you to have no wrong at my hand; but I am in the humour to be dangerous to myself, or any one."

"I will abide the risk," said the Scot, "if you will but come with me; and here is a place convenient, a howff nearer than the Devil, whilk is but an ill-omened drouthy name for a tavern. This other of the Saint Andrew is a quiet place, where I have ta'en my whetter now and then when I lodged in the neighbourhood of the Temple with Lord Glenvarloch.—What the deil's the matter wi' the man, garr'd him gie sic a spang as that, and almaist brought himself and me on the causeway?"

"Do not name that false Scot's name to me," said Jin Vin, "if you would not have me go mad!—I was happy before I saw him—he has been the cause of all the ill that has befallen me—he has made a knave and a madman of me!"

"If you are a knave," said Richie, "you have met an officer—if you are daft, you have met a keeper; but a gentle officer and a kind keeper. Look you, my gude friend, there has been twenty things said about this same lord, in which there is no more truth than in the leasings of Mahound. The warst they can say of him is, that he is not always so amenable to good advice as I would pray him, you, and every young man, to be. Come wi' me—just come ye wi' me; and, if a little spell of siller and a great deal of excellent counsel can relieve your occasions, all I can say is, you have had the luck to meet one capable of giving you both, and maist willing to bestow them."

The pertinacity of the Scot prevailed over the sullenness of Vincent, who was indeed in a state of agitation and incapacity to think for himself, which led him to yield the more readily to the suggestions of another. He suffered himself to be dragged into the small tavern which Richie recommended, and where they soon found themselves seated in a snug niche, with a reeking pottle of burnt sack, and a paper of sugar betwixt them. Pipes and tobacco were also provided, but were only used by Richie, who had adopted the custom of late, as adding considerably to the gravity and importance of his manner, and affording, as it were, a bland and pleasant accompaniment to the words of wisdom which flowed from his tongue. After they had filled their glasses and drunk them in silence, Richie repeated the question, whether his guest was going when they met so fortunately.

"I told you," said Jenkin, "I was going to destruction—I mean to the gaming-house. I am resolved to hazard these two or three pieces, to get as much as will pay for a passage with Captain Sharker, whose ship lies at Gravesend, bound for America—and so Eastward, ho!—I met one devil in the way already, who would have tempted me from my purpose, but I spurned him from me—you may be another for what I know.—What degree of damnation do you propose for me," he added wildly, "and what is the price of it?"

"I would have you to know," answered Richie "that I deal in no such commodities, whether as buyer or seller. But if you will tell me honestly the cause of your distress, I will do what is in my power to help you out of it,—not being, however, prodigal of promises, until I know the case; as a learned physician only gives advice when he has observed the diagnostics."

"No one has any thing to do with my affairs," said the poor lad; and folding his arms on the table, he laid his head upon them, with the sullen dejection of the overburdened lama, when it throws itself down to die in desperation.

Richie Moniplies, like most folk who have a good opinion of themselves, was fond of the task of consolation, which at once displayed his superiority, (for the consoler is necessarily, for the time at least, superior to the afflicted person,) and indulged his love of talking. He inflicted on the poor penitent a harangue of pitiless length, stuffed full of the usual topics of the mutability of human affairs—the eminent advantages of patience under affliction—the folly of grieving for what hath no remedy—the necessity of taking more care for the future, and some gentle rebukes on account of the past, which acid he threw in to assist in subduing the patient's obstinacy, as Hannibal used vinegar in cutting his way through rocks. It was not in human nature to endure this flood of commonplace eloquence in silence; and Jin Vin, whether desirous of stopping the flow of words crammed thus into his ear, "against the stomach of his sense," or whether confiding in Richie's protestations of friendship, which the wretched, says Fielding, are ever so ready to believe, or whether merely to give his sorrows vent in words, raised his head, and turning his red and swollen eyes to Richie—

"Cocksbones, man, only hold thy tongue, and thou shalt know all about it,—and then all I ask of thee is to shake hands and part.—This Margaret Ramsay,—you have seen her, man?"

"Once," said Richie, "once, at Master George Heriot's, in Lombard Street—I was in the room when they dined."

"Ay, you helped to shift their trenchers, I remember," said Jin Vin. "Well, that same pretty girl—and I will uphold her the prettiest betwixt Paul's and the Bar—she is to be wedded to your Lord Glenvarloch, with a pestilence on him!"

"That is impossible," said Richie; "it is raving nonsense, man—they make April gouks of you cockneys every month in the year—The Lord Glenvarloch marry the daughter of a Lonnon mechanic! I would as soon believe the great Prester John would marry the daughter of a Jew packman."

"Hark ye, brother," said Jin Vin, "I will allow no one to speak disregardingly of the city, for all I am in trouble."

"I crave your pardon, man—I meant no offence," said Richie; "but as to the marriage, it is a thing simply impossible."

"It is a thing that will take place, though, for the Duke and the Prince, and all of them, have a finger in it; and especially the old fool of a King, that makes her out to be some great woman in her own country, as all the Scots pretend to be, you know."

"Master Vincent, but that you are under affliction," said the consoler, offended on his part, "I would hear no national reflections."

The afflicted youth apologized in his turn, but asserted, "it was true that the King said Peg-a-Ramsay was some far-off sort of noblewoman; and that he had taken a great interest in the match, and had run about like an old gander, cackling about Peggie ever since he had seen her in hose and doublet—and no wonder," added poor Vin, with a deep sigh.

"This may be all true," said Richie, "though it sounds strange in my ears; but, man, you should not speak evil of dignities—Curse not the King, Jenkin; not even in thy bedchamber—stone walls have ears—no one has a right to know that better than I."

"I do not curse the foolish old man," said Jenkin; "but I would have them carry things a peg lower.—If they were to see on a plain field thirty thousand such pikes as I have seen in the artillery gardens, it would not be their long-haired courtiers wading them. I trow."*

"Hout tout, man," said Richie, "mind y' Stewarts come frae, and never think they want spears or claymores either; but in matters, whilk are perilous to speak on, I more, what is your concern in all this match?"

"What is it?" said Jenkin; "why, have I on Peg-a-Ramsay to be my true love, from I came to her old father's shop? and have I ried her pattens and her chopines for three y' borne her prayer-book to church, and brung a cushion for her to kneel down upon, and did I say me nay?"

"I see no cause she had," said Richie, "of such small services were all that ye profit man! there are few—very few, either of fo' wise men, ken how to guide a woman."

"Why, did I not serve her at the risk of dom, and very nigh at the risk of my neck? not—no, it was not her neither, but that beldam whom she caused to work upon, suade me like a fool to turn myself into a v to help my lord, and a plague to him, down land? and instead of going peaceably down ship at Gravesend, did not he rant and b show his pistols, and make me land him a wick, where he played some swaggering pra helped both him and me into the Tower?"

"Aha!" said Richie, throwing more than wisdom into his looks; "so you were the gr eted waterman that rowed Lord Glenvarloch the river?"

"The more fool I, that did not souse him Thames," said Jenkin; "and I was the I would not confess one word of who or wha though they threatened to make me hug the Exeter's daughter."†

"Wha is she, man?" said Richie; "she's an ill-fashioned piece, if you're so much afraid and she come of such high kin."

"I mean the rack—the rack, man," said Jenkin. "Where were you bred that never heard Duke of Exeter's daughter? But all the duchesses in England could have got nothing me—so the truth came out some other way was set free.—Home I ran, thinking myself the cleverest and happiest fellows in the war she—she—she wanted to pay me with money my true service! and she spoke so sweetly coldly at the same time, I wished myself in the cat dungeon of the Tower—I wished they had me to death before I heard this Scottishman chouse me out of my sweetheart!"

"But are ye sure ye have lost her?" said Jenkin. "it sounds strange in my ears that my Lord varloch should marry the daughter of a v though there are uncouth marriages made in. I'll allow that."

"Why, I tell you this lord was no sooner the Tower, than he and Master George Heriot to make proposals for her, with the King's and what not; and fine fair-day prospects of favour for this lord, for he hath not an land."

"Well, and what said the auld watchman?" said Richie; "was he not, as might weel be ready to loup out of his skin-case for very joy?"

"He multiplied six figures progressively, ported the product—then gave his consent."

"And what did you do?"

"I rushed into the streets," said the young man, "with a burning heart and a blood-shot eye, where did I first find myself, but with that Mother Suddlechop—and what did she propose but to take the road?"

* Clarendon remarks, that the importance of the exercise of the citizens was severely felt by the cavaliers civil war, notwithstanding the ridicule that had been upon it by the dramatic poets of the day. "Lowestoffe and Ringwood!" said Jenkin; "they are both brave gallants—they will be sure company.
Know you where they are to be found?"

"Ay, marry do I," replied Richie. "They are shut

"They are gentlemen of trust and honour," said Jenkin, "and if they advise it, I will try the advent-up, and while, in his turn, he filled the cups, "but I feel my heart something lighter since I have thought

"Thus it is to have counsellors, Master Jenkin," said Richie; "and truly I hope to hear you say that your heart is as light as a lark's, and that before you are many days sadder. Never smile and shake your head, but mind what I tell you—and bide here in the meanwhile, till I go to seek these gallants. I warrant you, cart-ropes would not hold them back from such a ploy as I shall propose to them."

CHAPTER XXXVI.

The things have bound the true man—Now, could they and I rob the thieves, and go merrily to London.

Henry IV. Part I.

THE sun was high upon the glades of Ruffeld
Chase, and the deer, with which it then abounded, were seen sporting in picturesque groups among the ancient oaks of the forest, when a cavalier and a lady, on foot, although in riding apparel, sauntered slowly up one of the long alleys which were cut through the park for the convenience of the hunters. Their only attendant was a page, who, riding a Spanish jennet, which seemed to bear a heavy cloak-bag, followed them at a respectful distance. The female, attired in all the fantastic finery of the period, with more than the usual quantity of bagges, flounces, and trimmings, and holding her fan of ostrich feathers in one hand, and her riding-mask of black velvet in the other, seemed anxious, by all the little coquetry practised on such occasions, to secure the notice of her companion, who sometimes heard her prattle without seeming to attend to it, and at other times interrupted his train of graver reflections, to reply to her.

"Nay, but, my lord—my lord, you walk so fast, you will leave me behind you.—Nay, I will have hold of your arm, but how to manage with my mask and my fan? Why would you not let me bring my waiting-gentlewoman to follow us, and hold my things? But no, I will put my fan in my girdle, oh!—and now that I have a hand to hold you with, you shall not run away from me."

"Come on, then," answered the gallant, "and let us walk apart, since you would not be persuaded to stay with your gentlewoman, as you call her, and with the rest of the baggage.—You may perhaps see that, though, you will not like to see."

She took hold of his arm accordingly; but as he continued to walk at the same pace, she shortly let go her hold, exclaiming that he had hurt her hand.
The cavalier stopped, and looked at the pretty hand and arm which she showed him, with exclamations against his cruelty. "I dare say," she said, baring her wrist and a part of her arm, "it is all black and blue to the very elbow."

"I dare say you are a silly little fool," said the cavalier, carelessly twisting the injured arm; "it is only a pretty incense which sets off the blue veins.

"Nay, my lord, now it is you are silly," answered the dame; "but I am glad I can make you speak and laugh on any terms this morning. I am sure, if I did insist on following you into the forest, it was all for the sake of diverting you. I am better company than your page, I trow. And now, tell me, these pretty things with horns, be they not deer?"

"Even such they be, Nelly," answered her neglectful attendant.

"And what can the great folk do with so many of them, forsooth?"

"They send them to the city, Nell, where woe men make venison pasties of their flesh, and wear their horns for trophies," answered Lord Dalgarno, whom our reader has already recognised.

"Nay, now you laugh at me, my lord," answered his companion; "but I know all about venison, what ever you may think. I always tasted it once a year when we dined with Mr. Deputy," she continued, and, by, as a consequence of her degradation stole across a most bewildered with vanity and folly, "though he would not speak to me now if we met together in the narrowest lane in the West."

"I warrant he would not," said Lord Dalgarno, "because thou, Nell, wouldst dash him with a single look; for I trust thou hast more given than to throw away words on such a fellow as he."

"Who, I?" said Dame Nelly. "Nay, I scorn the proud prince too much for that. Do you know, he made all the folk in the Ward stand up in hand to him, my poor old John Christie and all." Here her recollection began to overflow at her eyes.

"A plague on your whimpering," said Dalgarno, somewhat harshly. "Nay, never look pale for the matter, Nell. I am not angry with you, you simple fool. But what would you have me think when you are eternally looking back upon your dungeon you dar by the river, which smelt of pitch and old cheese worse than a Welshman does of onions, and all this when I am taking you down to a castle as fine as is in Fairy Land?"

"Shall we be there to-night, my lord?" said Nelly, drying her tears.

"To-night, Nelly?—no, nor the night fortnight."

"Now, the Lord be with us, and keep us!—But shall we not go by sea, my lord?"—I thought everybody came from Scotland by sea. I am sure Lord Glenvarloch and Rache Manphre came by sea."

"There is a wide difference between coming up and going down, Nelly," answered Lord Dalgarno.

"And so there is, for certain," said his simple companion. "But yet I think I heard people speaking of going down to Scotland by sea, as well as coming up. Are you well avised of the way?—Do you think it possible we can go by land, my sweet lord?"

"It is but trying, my sweet lady," said Lord Dalgarno. "Men say England and Scotland are in the same island, so one would hope there may be some road betwixt them by land."

"I shall never be able to ride so far," said the lady.

"We will have your saddle stuffed softer," said the lord. "I tell you that you shall now your eye slough, and change from the caterpillar of a paltry lane into the butterfly of a prince's garden. You shall have as many trees as there are hours in the day—as many handmaidens as there are days in the week—as many menials as there are weeks in the year—and you shall ride a hunting and hawking with a lord, instead of waiting upon an old shop-chandler, who could do nothing but hawk and spit."

"Ay, but you will make me your lady?" said Dame Nelly.

"Ay, surely—what else?" replied the lord—"My lady love."

"Ay, but I mean your lady-wife," said Nelly.

"Truly, Nell, in that I cannot promise to oblige you. A lady wife," continued Dalgarno, "is a very different thing from a lady love."

"I heard from Miss Suddeloch, when you lodged my wife once I left poor old John Christie, that Lord Glenvarloch is to marry David Ramsay the clock-maker's daughter?"

"There is much betwixt the cup and the saucer; I wear something about me may breed that hopeful alliance before the day is out," answered Lord Dalgarno.

"Well, but my father was as good a Davy Ramsay, and as well to pass as a lord, and, therefore, why should you be? You have done me harm enough, I trow, should you not do me this justice?"

"For two good reasons, Nelly. For I had on you, and the King passed a will answered Lord Dalgarno.

"As, my lord," said Nelly, "but in England, and we go to Scotland."

"Thy argument is better than thou art," said Lord Dalgarno. "I have heard I see out the matrimonial tie may be as happy a country by the gentle hand of nature of law, whereas in England a burst by an act of Parliament. Well, I hark into that matter, and whether or not, we will at least do our best to try."

"Shall we indeed, my honey-sweet, be I will think less about John Christie, for again I warrant you, for he is well if would be glad to think he had something of him as I used to do, poor loving old a kind man though he was a score of years, and I hope and pray he will never let cross his home at threshold again."

Here the dame was once more much in way to a passion of tears, but Lord Dalgarno put down the emotion, by saying with a smile: "I am weary of these April passions, and I think you will do well to take for some more pressing occasion, what turn of fortune may in a few months of them than you can render."

"Goodness, my lord! what manner of pressing?" John Christie (the kind he kept no secrets from me, and I hope will not hide your coming from me."

"But down beside me on this bank, bleman, I am bound to remain but space, and if you can be but silent, I spend a part of it in considering how far present occasion, follow the reason which you recommended to me."

The place at which he stopped was no more than a mound, partly surrounded from which it derived the name of Cup. A few brown stones there were which in late of many others that had been on different hillocks in the forest for the three vestiges, just sufficient to show further times the hand of man had been runs of the shade of a once illustrious gotten finally the Mandevilles, Earls whom Enfield Chase and the extensive parent had belonged in elder days. As prospect led the eye at various points, and seemingly interminable alleys, with this point as at a common centre, drew other as they receded and had themselves by Lord Dalgarno as the rendezvous, but, which, through the medium of the he had offered to his injured friend, I lord.

"He will surely come?" he said to his officer who was not wont to be his fault—bold enough in the Park—Perhaps you not have carried my message? But no—know—one of them would prize them above their life. Look to the paltry, I then let him not loose, and cast thy down every avenue to mark if any one ingham has undergone my challenge, minion leads the King a paltry coming to answer me. If I can baffle the or slay him—if I can spoil him of his life, I shall go down to Scotland with a glad over past misadventure. I know trymen—they never quarrel with any from either gold or martial glory, much more of both gold and laurels."

As thus reflected, and called to mind the disgrace he had suffered, as well as the censure he incurred for having Lord Glenvarloch, his countenance under the influence of his consenting emotions, terror of Nelly, who, sitting unmoved at his side looking anxiously in his face, beheld the hand, the mouth become compressed, the eye dim, and the whole countenance express the deadly resolution of one who awaits an instant and decisive encounter with a mortal enemy, in the presence of the place the scenery so different from that to which alone she had been accustomed, and sombre as which crept so suddenly over the countenance of her seducer, his command of silence upon her and the apparent strangeness of conduct in doing away so much time without obvious cause, when a journey of such length lay before him, brought strange thoughts into her mind.

She had read of women, seduced from their original duties by seducers allied to the hellish sin, nay, by the Father of Evil himself, who, after giving his victim into some desert remote from a kind, exchanged the pleasing shape in which clad her affections, for all his natural horrors, and thus was away as it crowded itself her weak and bewildered imagination, yet she have lived to see it realized allegorically if not literally, but for the accident which presently followed, page whose eyes were remarkably acute, as called out to his master pointing with his hand at the same time down one of the alleys, that two men were advancing in that direction. Lord Glenvarloch started up, and shading his eyes with his hand, gazed rapidly down the alley, when, at the instant, he received a shot which, grazing his forehead right through his brow, and laid him a corpse at the feet of his father across the lap, of the unfortunate victim of his profligacy. The countenance, whose varied expression she had been watching the last five minutes, was convulsed for an instant, and then suffered into rigidity for ever.

Ruffians rushed from the brake from which the shot had been fired, ere the smoke was dispersed with many unprovoked, sword on the page, as on the female upon whom even he strove by most violent threats to impose silence; whilst the dog began to undo the burden from the page's horse. At instant rescue prevented their availing themselves of the advantage they had obtained.

They easily be supposed that Richard Glenvarloch secured the assistance of the two long-eared enough to join in any thing which presented a with Jin Vin to act as their guide. He was not only mounted and well armed under the pretext they would reach Camelot Most before the day, and apprehend them in the fact. The fact was that according to the custom of the country, but contrary to that of the English, the Englishmen of those days, they meant to ensure by previous murder. An accident also happened to delay them a little while on the road. In going through one of the glades of the forest they found a man dismounted and sitting under a tree, with such bitterness of spirit that Lowestoffe could not forbear asking if he was hurt. In answer, he said he was an unhappy man in pursuit of a villain, who had been carried off by a villain, and he raised his countenance, the eyes of Richard, to great astonishment, encountered the visage of John Christie.

"O the Almighty's sake, help me, Master Monk," he said, "I have learned my wife is but a short while, with that black villain Lord Dalgarney." "Have him forward by all means," said Lowestoffe, "a second Orpheus seeking his Eurydice"—"a him forward we will save Lord Dalgarney's, and ease him of his mistress—Have him with you it but for the variety of the adventure. I his lordship a grudge for robbing me. We have motives good."

It is dangerous to calculate closely in matters of life and death. In all probability the minutes or two which was lost in mounting John Christie behind one of their party, might have saved Lord Dalgarney from his fate. Thus his criminal amour became the indirect cause of his losing his life, and thus "our pleasant vice are made the whips to scourge us."

The riders arrived on the field at full gallop the moment after the shot was fired, and Richard, who had his own reasons for attaching himself to Christy, who was hesitating to enter the park from the side of the saddle, pushed against him with such violence as to overthrow him, his own horse at the same time stumbling and dismounting his rider, who was none of the first equestrians. The undaunted Richard immediately arose, however, and grappled with the ruffian with such good will that, though a strong fellow, and though a coward now rendered desperate, Monksho got him under, wrestled a long while from his hand, dealt him a desperate stab with his own weapon, and lay on his feet, and, as the wounded man struggled to follow his example, he struck him upon the head with the butt-end of a musket-barrel, which last blow proved fatal.

"Bravo, Richie!" cried Lowestoffe, who had himself engaged at sword-point with one of the ruffians, and soon put him to flight. "Bravo! why, man, there lies the fellow, struck down like an ox, and Inquiry's throat cut like a calf."

I know not why you should upbraid me with my up-bringing, Master Lowestoffe, answered Richard, with great composure; "but I can tell you, the shame is not a bad place for training one to this work."

The other Templar now shouted loudly to them,—"If ye be ours, come hither—here lies Lord Dalgarney, murdered!"

Lowestoffe and Richard ran to the spot, and the page took the opportunity, finding himself now neglected on all hands to ride off in a different direction; and neither he, nor the considerable sum with which he had been burdened, were ever heard of from that moment.

The third ruffian had not waited the attack of the Templar and Jin Vin, the latter of whom had put down old Christie from behind him that he might ride the lighter, and the whole five now stood gazing with horror on the bloody corpse of the young nobleman, and the wild wailing of the female, who tore her hair and shrieked in the most disconsolate manner, until her agony was at once checked, or rather relieved, a new discovery, by the sudden and unexpected appearance of her husband, who, fixing on her a cold and severe look, said, in a tone suited to his manner—"A woman! thou takest on sadly for the loss of thy paramour."

Then, looking on the bloody corpse of him from whom he had received so deep an injury, he repeated the solemn words of Scripture,—"Vengeance is mine, saith the Lord, and I will repay it."—"I, whom thou hast injured, will be first to render thee the dearest offices due to the dead."

So saying, he covered the dead lady with his cloak, and then looking on it for a moment, seemed to reflect on what he had next to perform. As the eye of the injured man slowly passed from the body of the seducer to the partner and victim of his crime, who had sunk down to his feet, which she clasped without venturing to look up, his features, naturally coarse and saturnine assumed a dignity of expression which overpowered the young Templar, and recalled the officious forwardness of Richard Monksho, who was at first eager to have thrust in his advice and opinion. "Kneel not to me woman," he said, "but kneel to the God thou hast offended, more than thou couldst offend such another worm as thyself. How often have I told thee, when thou wert at the gayest and the lightest, that pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall? Vanity brought folly, and folly brought sin, and sin hath brought death, thy original companion. Thou must needs leave duty, and decency, and domestic love, to revel it gaily with the wild and with the wicked, and thou thou wast, like a crushed worm, writhing beneath the lifeless body of the paramour. Thou hast done me much wrong—dishonoured me among friends—driven credit from my house, and peace from my friends—But thou wert my first and only love, and I will not see thee an unter castaway, if it lies with me to prevent it.—Gentlemen, I render ye such thanks as a broken-hearted man can give.—Richard, commend me to your honourable master. I added gall to the bitterness of his affliction, but I was deluded.—Rise up, woman, and follow me."

He raised her up by the arm, while, with streaming eyes, and bitter sobs, she endeavoured to express her penitence. She kept her hands spread over her face, yet suffered him to lead her away; and it was only as they turned around a brake which concealed the scene they had left, that she turned back, and casting one wild and hurried glance towards the corpse of Dalgarno, uttered a shriek, and, clinging to her husband's arm, exclaimed wildly,— "Save me—save me! They have murdered him."

Lowestoffe was much moved by what he had witnessed; but he was ashamed, as a town-gallant, of his own unfashionable emotion, and did a force to his feelings when he exclaimed,—
"Ay, let them go—the kind-hearted, believing, forgiving husband—the liberal, accommodating spouse. O what a generous creature is your true London husband!—Horns hath he, but, tame as a fatted ox, he goeth not. I should like to see her when she hath exchanged her mask and riding-beaver for her peaked hat and muffler. We will visit them at Paul's Wharf, coz—it will be a convenient acquaintance."

"You had better think of catching the gipsy thief, Lutin," said Richie Moniplies; "for, by my faith, he is off with his master's baggage and the siller."

A keeper, with his assistants, and several other persons, had now come to the spot, and made hue and cry after Lutin, but in vain. To their custody the Templars surrendered the dead bodies, and after going through some formal investigation, they returned, with Richard and Vincent, to London, where they received great applause for their gallantry.—Vincent's errors were easily expiated, in consideration of his having been the means of breaking up this band of villains; and there is some reason to think, that what would have diminished the credit of the action in other instances, rather added to it in the actual circumstances, namely, that they came too late to save Lord Dalgarno.

George Heriot, who suspected how matters stood with Vincent, requested and obtained permission from his master to send the poor young fellow on an important piece of business to Paris. We are unable to trace his fate farther, but believe it was prosperous, and that he entered into an advageous partnership with his fellow-apprentice, upon old David Ramsay retiring from business, in consequence of his daughter's marriage. That eminent antiquarian, Dr. Dryasdust, is possessed of an antique watch, with a silver dial-plate, the mainspring being a piece of catgut instead of a chain, which bears the names of Vincent and Tunstall, Memory-Monitors.

Master Lowestoffe failed not to vindicate his character as a man of gayety, by inquiring after John Christie and Dame Nelly; but greatly to his surprise, (indeed to his loss, for he had wagered ten pieces that he would domesticate himself in the family,) he found the good-will, as it was called, of the shop, was sold, the stock auctioned, and the late proprietor and his wife gone, no one knew whither. The prevailing belief was, that they had emigrated to one of the new settlements in America.

Lady Dalgarno received the news of her unworthy husband's death with a variety of emotions, among which, horror that he should have been cut off in the middle career of his profligacy, was the most prominent. The incident greatly deepened her melancholy, and injured her health, already shaken by previous circumstances. Repossessed of her own fortune by her husband's death, she was anxious to do justice to Lord Glenvarloch, by treating for the recovery of the mortgage. But the scrivener, having taken fright at the late events, had left the city and absconded, so that it was impossible to discover into whose hands the papers had now passed. Richard Moniplies was silent, for his own reasons; the Templars, who had witnessed the transaction, kept the secret at his request, and it was universally believed that the scrivener had carried off the writing with him. We may here observe, that soon to those of Skurliewhitter freed London for the presence of Dame Suddlechop, who in career in the Rasp-haus, (viz. Bridewell,) of dam.

The stout old Lord Huntinglen, with a carriage and unmoistened eye, accompanied a funeral procession of his only son to its last abode, perhaps the single tear which fell at length from his eye, was given less to the fate of the son than to the extinction of the last male of his race.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

Jacques. There is, sure, another flood toward, couples are coming in the ark!—Here comes a pair of strange beasts.—As You Like It.

THE fashion of such narratives as the changes like other earthly things. Time to the tale-teller was obliged to wind up his circumstantial description of the wedding, both throwing the stocking, as the grand catastrophe which, through so many circumstances of difficulty he had at length happily conducted, and heroine. Not a circumstance was there from the manly ardour of the bridegroom, a modest blush of the bride, to the parson's plice, and the silk tabinet mantua of the bride. But such descriptions are now discarded, for the reason, I suppose, that public marriages are no longer fashionable, and that, instead of calling together friends to a feast and a dance, the happy couple in a solitary post-chaise, as secretly as if they were to go to Gretna-Green, or to do worse. I am ungrateful for a change which saves an author the trouble of attempting in vain to give a new colour to the common-place description of such matters; notwithstanding, I find myself forced upon it in the present instance, as circumstances sometimes compel a stranger to make use of an old road which has been for some time shut up. The experienced may have already remarked, that the last chapter was employed in sweeping out of the way all the necessary and less interesting characters, that might clear the floor for a blithe bridal.

In truth, it would be unpardonable to pass slightly what so deeply interested our principal personage, King James. That learned and mourned monarch made no great figure in the annals of Europe; but then, to make amends, he was prodigiously busy, when he could find a fair opportunity of intermeddling with the private affairs of his subjects, and the approaching marriage of Lord Glenvarloch was matter of great interest to him. He had been much struck (that is, for him, who was not accessible to such emotions) with the beauty and the embarrassment of the pretty Peg-a-Ramsay, when he first saw her, and he gloried greatly in the acuteness which he had displayed in detecting her disguise, and in carrying through the whole inquiry which took place in consequence.

He laboured for several weeks, while the court was in progress, with his own royal eyes, so much worn out, he declared, a pair of her best barnacles, in searching through old books and documents, for the purpose of establishing the pretensions to a noble, though remote descent, thereby remove the only objection which any one could conceive against the match. In his own opinion, at least, he was eminently successful; for, when Mungo Malagrowth one day, in the presence of the king, took upon him to grieve bitterly for the lack of pedigree, the monarch cut him short, saying—"Ye may save your grief for your ain next occasion, Sir Mungo; for, by our royal saul, we will warrant her father, Davy Ramsay, to be a gentleman of good descents, whose great gudesire came of the ancient stock of the House of Dalwolsey, than what any other men never did, and better never will, draw for King and country. get the Prince and Buckingham despatched on an expedition to Newmarket, in order that he might find an opportunity in their absence of indulging himself in his own gossiping, coshering habits, which were distasteful to Charles, whose temper inclined to formality, and with which even the favourite, of late had not thought it worth while to seem to sympathize. When the levee was dismissed, Sir Mungo Malagrowth seized upon the worthy citizen in the court-yard of the Palace, and detained him, in spite of all his efforts, for the purpose of subjecting him to the following scrutiny:—

"This is a sair job on you, Master George—the King must have had little consideration—this will cost you a bonny penny, this wedding-dinner?"

"It will not break me, Sir Mungo," answered Heriot; "the King hath a right to see the table which his bounty hath supplied for years, well covered for a single day."

"Vera true, vera true—we'll have a' to pay, I doubt, less or mair—a sort of penny-wedding it will prove, where all men contribute to the young folk's maintenance, that they may not have just four bare legs in a bed together. What do you purpose to give, Master George?—we begin with the city when money is in question."†

"Only a trifle, Sir Mungo—I give my god-daughter the marriage-ring; it is a curious jewel—I bought it in Italy; it belonged to Cosmo de Medici. The bride will not need my help—she has an estate which belonged to her maternal grandfather."

"The auld soap-boiler," said Sir Mungo; "it will need some of his suds to scour the blot out of the Glenvarloch shield—I have heard that estate was no great things."

"It is as good as some posts at Court, Sir Mungo, which are coveted by persons of high quality," replied George Heriot.

"Court favour, said ye? Court favour, Master Heriot?" replied Sir Mungo, choosing then to use his malady of misapprehension; "Moonshine in water, poor thing, if that is all she is to be tochered with—I am truly solicitous about them."

"I will let you into a secret," said the citizen, "which will relieve your tender anxiety. The dowager Lady Dalgarno gives a competent fortune to the bride, and settles the rest of her estate upon her nephew the bridegroom."

"Ay, say ye sae?" said Sir Mungo, "just to show her regard to her husband that is in the tomb—lucky that her nephew did not send him there; it was a strange story that death of poor Lord Dalgarno—some folk think the poor gentleman had much wrong. Little good comes of marrying the daughter of the house you are at feud with; indeed, it was less poor Dalgarno's fault, than theirs that forced the match on him; but I am glad the young folk are to have something to live on, come how it like, whether by charity or inheritance. But if the Lady Dalgarno were to sell all she has, even to her very wylie-coat, she canna gie them back the fair Castle of Glenvarloch—that is lost and gane—lost and gane."

"It is but too true," said George Heriot; "we cannot discover what has become of the villain Andrew Skurlewhitter, or what Lord Dalgarno has done with the mortgage."

"Assigned it away to some one, that his wife might not get it after he was gane; it would have disturbed him in his grave, to think Glenvarloch should get that land back again," said Sir Mungo; "depend on it, he will have ta'en sure measures to keep that noble lordship out of her grips or her nevoy's either."

"Indeed it is but too probable, Sir Mungo," said Master Heriot; "but as I am obliged to go and look after many things in consequence of this ceremony, I must leave you to comfort yourself with the reflection."

"The bride-day, you say, is to be on the thirtieth of the instant month?" said Sir Mungo, hollaing

† The penny-wedding of the Scots, now disused even among the lowest ranks, was a peculiar species of merry-making, at which, if the wedded pair were popular, the guests who convened, contributed considerable sums under pretence of paying for the bridal festivity, but in reality to set the married folk afloat in the world.

after the citizen; "I will be with you in the hour of cause."

"The King invites the guests," said George Heriot, without turning back.

"The base-born, ill-bred mechanic!" soliloquized Sir Mungo, "if it were not the odd score of pounds he lent me last week, I would teach him how to bear himself to a man of quality! But I will be at the bridal banquet in spite of him."

Sir Mungo contrived to get invited, or commanded, to attend on the bridal accordingly, at which there were but few persons present; for James, on such occasions, preferred a snug privacy, which gave him liberty to lay aside the encumbrance, as he felt it to be, of his regal dignity. The company was very small, and indeed there were at least two persons absent whose presence might have been expected. The first of these was the Lady Dalgarno, the state of whose health, as well as the recent death of her husband, precluded her attendance on the ceremony. The other absentee was Richie Monplies, whose conduct for some time past had been extremely mysterious. Regulating his attendance on Lord Glenvarloch entirely according to his own will and pleasure, he had, ever since the rencounter in Enfield Chase, appeared regularly at his bed-side in the morning, to assist him to dress, and at his wardrobe in the evening. The rest of the day he disposed of at his own pleasure, without control from his lord, who had now a complete establishment of attendants. Yet he was somewhat curious to know how the fellow disposed of so much of his time; but on this subject Richie showed no desire to be communicative.

On the morning of the bridal-day, Richie was particularly attentive in doing all a valet-de-chambre could, so as to set off to advantage the very handsome figure of his master; and when he had arranged his dress with the utmost exactness, and put to his long curled locks what he called "the finishing touch of the redding-kain," he gravely knelt down, kissed his hand, and bade him farewell, saying that he humbly craved leave to discharge himself of his lordship's service.

"Why, what humour is this?" said Lord Glenvarloch; "if you mean to discharge yourself of my service, Richie, I suppose you intend to enter my wife's?"

"I wish her good ladyship that shall soon be, and your good lordship, the blessings of as good a servant as myself, in heaven's good time," said Richie; "but fate hath so ordained it, that I can henceforth only be your servant in the way of friendly courtesy."

"Well, Richie," said the young lord, "if you are tired of service, we will seek some better provision for you; but you will wait on me to the church, and partake of the bridal dinner?"

"Under favour, my lord," answered Richie, "I must remind you of our covenant, having presently some pressing business of mine own, which will detain me during the ceremony; but I will not fail to prie Master George's good cheer, in respect he has made very costly fare, which it would be unthankful not to partake of."

"Do as you list," answered Lord Glenvarloch; and having bestowed a passing thought on the whimsical and pragmatical disposition of his follower, he dismissed the subject for others better suited to the day.

The reader must fancy the scattered flowers which strewed the path of the happy couple to church—the loud music which accompanied the procession—the marriage service performed by a Bishop—the King, who met them at Saint Paul's, giving away the bride—to the great relief of her father, who had this time, during the ceremony, to calculate the vast quotient to be laid on the pinion of pippin in a triumph which he was then putting together.

When the ceremony was finished, the company were transported in the royal carriages to George Heriot's, where a splendid collation was provided for the marriage-guests in the Foljambe apartments. The King no sooner found himself in this snug retreat, than, casting from him his sword and belt with such haste as if they burnt his fingers, and flinging his plumed hat on the table, as who should say, Lie there, authority! he swallowed a hearty cup of wine to the happiness of the married couple, and began to amble about the room, mumping, laughing, and cracking jests, neither the wittiest nor the most hearty, but accompanied and applauded by shouts of his own mirth, in order to encourage that of the company. Whilst his Majesty was in the midst of this gay humour, and a call to the banquet was anxiously expected, a servant whispered Master Heriot from the apartment. When he re-entered, he walked to the King, and, in his turn, whispered something at which James started.

"He is not wanting his siller?" said the King, shortly and sharply.

"By no means, my liege," answered Heriot; "is a subject he states himself as quite independent about, so long as it can pleasure your Majesty."

"Body of us, man!" said the King. "It is a speech of a true man and a loving subject, and we will grace him accordingly—what though he be a carle—a twopenny cat may look at a king's man! have him pundit fore.—Monplies—should have called the child Monypennies, and said warrant you English think we have no name in Scotland."

"It is an ancient and honourable stock, the Monplies," said Sir Mungo Malagrowth; "but alas, there are scarce few of the name."

"The family seems to increase among your townsmen, Sir Mungo," said Master Lowestoffe; "Lord Glenvarloch had invited to be present at his Majesty's happy accession brought so many of you here."

"Right, sir, right," said Sir Mungo, nodding at George Heriot; "there have served themselves been the better of that great blessing—the English nation."

As he spoke, the door flew open, and in came the astonishment of Lord Glenvarloch, by the young man Richie Monplies, now sumptuously and gorgeously attired in a superb brocade, and leading in his hand the tall, thin, withered, and distorted form of Martha Trapbois, arrayed in a plain dress of black velvet, which suited so well with the pallid and severe melancholy of her countenance, that the King himself exclaimed, in great perturbation, "What the devil has the fallow brought here? Body of our regal selves! it is a corpse that has run off with the mort cloth!"

"May I supplicate your Majesty to be gracious to her?" said Richie; "being that she is, in most of this morning's work, my ain wedded wife, Mrs. Monplies by name."

"Saul of our body, man! but she looks woeful grim," answered King James. "Art thou that has not been in her time maid of honour to Mary, our kinswoman, of red hot memory?"

"I am sure, an it like your Majesty, that she brought me fifty thousand pounds of good siller better; and that has enabled me to please your Majesty, and other folk."

"Ye need have said naething about that," said the King; "we ken our obligations in the matter, and we are glad this rudas spouse of yours hath bestowed her treasure on one who knows it to the profit of his King and country.—But the devil did ye come by her, man?"

"In the auld Scottish fashion, my liege. She was the captive of my bow and my spear," answered Richie. "There was a convention that she should wait on me when I avenged her father's death, and took possession."

"It is the daughter of Old Trapbois, who has misused her long," said Lowestoffe.—"When could you mew her up so closely, friend Richie?"

"Master Richard, if it be your will," answered Richie; "for Master Richard Monplies, if yet better. For mewing of her up, I found her a goodly in all honour and safety, under the roof of an old countryman of my own—and for secrecy, a point of prudence, when wantons like ye are abroad, Master Lowestoffe."

There was a laugh at Richie's magnanimous on the part of every one but his bride, who gave a signal of impatience, and said, with her usual severity and sternness,—"Peace—peace. I pray you, peace. Let us do that which we came for." So saying, she took out a bundle of parchments, and delivering them to Lord Glenvarloch, she said aloud,—"I take this royal presence, and all here, to witness, that I restore the ransomed lordship of Glenvarloch to the right owner, as free as ever it was held by any of his ancestors."

"I witnessed the redemption of the mortgage," said Lowestoffe; "but I little dreamt by whom it had been redeemed."

"No need ye should," said Richie; "there would have been small wisdom in crying roast-meat."

"Peace," said his bride, "once more—This paper," she continued, delivering another to Lord Glenvarloch, "is also your property—take it, but spare me no question how it came into my custody."

The King had bustled forward beside Lord Glenvarloch, and fixing an eager eye on the writing, exclaimed, "Body of our own, it is our royal signet-ring for the money which was so long out of sight!—How came you by it, Mistress Bride?"

"It is a secret," said Martha, dryly.

"A secret which my tongue shall never utter," said Julia, resolutely,—"unless the King commands me to my allegiance."

"I do—I do command you," said James, trembling and stammering with the impatient curiosity of gossip, while Sir Mungo, with more malicious anxiety to get at the bottom of the mystery, stooped so long thus far forward like a bent fishing-rod, and his thin gray locks from his ear, and curved his hand behind it to collect every vibration of the expected intelligence. Martha in the meantime frowned most ominously on Richie who went on undauntedly to inform the King, "that his deceased father-in-law, a good careful man in the main, had a touch of worldly wisdom about him, that at times married an uprightness of his walk, he liked to dabble among his neighbour's gear, and some of it would at times stick to his fingers in the handling."

"For shame, man, for shame!" said Martha; "since the infamy of the deed must be told, be it at least briefly—Yes, my lord," she added, addressing Glenvarloch, "the piece of gold was not the only bit which brought the miserable old man to your chamber that dreadful night; his object, and he accomplished it, was to purloin the paper. The wretched scrivener was with him that morning, and I doubt not, urged the living old man to this, any, to offer another bar to the ransom of your son. If there was a yet more powerful agent at the bottom of the conspiracy, God forgive it to him at this moment, for he is now where the crime must answer!"

"Amen?" said Lord Glenvarloch, and it was said by all present.

"For my father," continued she, with her stern brow twitched by an involuntary and convulsive movement, "his guilt and folly cost him his life; and my belief is constant, that the wretch, who assailed him that morning to purloin the paper, opened the window for the entrance of the murder."

Every body was silent for an instant; the King was first to speak, commanding search instantly to be made for the guilty scrivener. "A letter," he concluded, "collige membra—sepel absolute—infilid suspensio arbor!"

Lowestoffe answered, with due respect, that the scrivener had absconded at the time of Lord Dalgar-no's murder, and had not been heard of since.

"Let him be sought for," said the King. "And now let us change the discourse—these stories make one's very blood grow,* and are altogether unfit for bridal festivity. Hymen, O Hymeneus!" added he, snapping his fingers, "Lord Glenvarloch, what say you to Mistress Moniphie, this bonny bride, that has brought you back your father's estate on your bridal day?"

"Let him say nothing, my legs," said Martha; "that will best suit his feelings and mine."

"There is redemption money, at the least, to be repaid," said Lord Glenvarloch; "in that I cannot remain debtor."

"We will speak of it hereafter," said Martha; "my debtor you cannot be." And she shut her mouth as if determined to say nothing more on the subject.

Sir Mungo, however, resolved not to part with the topic, and availing himself of the freedom of the moment, said to Richie—"A queer story that of your father-in-law, honest man; methinks your bride thanked you little for ripping it up."

"I make it a rule, Sir Mungo," replied Richie, "always to speak any evil I know about my family myself, having observed, that if I do not, it is sure to be told by other folks."

"But, Richie," said Sir Mungo, "it seems to me that this bride of yours is like to be master and mistress in the conjugal state."

"If she stands by words, Sir Mungo," answered Richie; "I thank Heaven I can be as deaf as any one; and if she comes to deeds, I have two hands to pick her with."

"Well said Richie, again," said the King; "you have gotten it on both halves, Sir Mungo.—Truth, Mistress Bride, for a rule, your Goodman has a pretty turn of wit."

"There are fools, sire," replied she, "who have wit, and fools who have courage—aye, and fools who have learning, and are great fools notwithstanding. I chose this man because he was my protector when I was desolate, and neither for his wit nor his wisdom. He is truly honest, and has a heart and hand that make amends for some folly. Since I was condemned to seek a protector through the world, which is to me a wilderness, I may thank God that I have come by no worms."

"And that is sad assembly said," replied the King, "that, by my soul, I'll try whether I cannot make him better. Kneel down, Richie—somebody lend me a rapier—yours, Mr. Langstaff; (that's a brave name for a lawyer,)—ye need not flash it out that gets Templar fashion, as if ye were about to pink a beard?"

He took the drawn sword, and with averted eyes, for it was a sight he loved not to look on, endeavoured to lay it on Richie's shoulder, but nearly stuck it into his eye. Richie starting back, attempted to rise, but was held down by Lowestoffe, while Sir Mungo, guiding the royal weapon, the honour-bestowing blow was given and received; "Surge, carnifex—Rise up, Sir Richard Moniphie, of Castle Collap!—And my lords and ladies, let us all to our dinner, for the cock-a-leekie is cooling."

PEVERIL OF THE PEAK.

“If my readers should at any time remark that I am particularly dull, they may be assured there is a sign under it.”—British Essayist.

RODUCTION TO PEVERIL OF THE PEAK.

valued my own reputation, as it is said I ought in private done, I might have now drawn a line, and remained (who knows?) perhaps for some years after death, the author of Waverley." I was not, however, more of this sort of immortality, which might have lasted fifty or thirty years, than Falstaff of the embowelling promised him after the field of Shrewsbury, by his Prince of Wales. "Embowel'd? If you embowel me I may powder and eat me to-morrow!"

Occupation as a romancer were taken from me, I felt I was at a late hour in life to find me out another; when I expect to acquire those new tricks, which are provided not to be learned by those dogs who are getting les, I had yet to learn from the public, that my intrusion was disagreeable; and while I was endured with some felt I had all the reputation which I greatly coveted. I was well stored, both with historical, local, and notices, and I had become almost as licensed a plague as the well remembered beggar of the ward, whom quish by their favour, perhaps for no better reason they had been in the habit of giving him alms, as a business of their daily promenade. The general fact is, all men grow old, all men must wear out; but many wisdom, however aware of the general fact, are not admit in their own case any special instances of deed, they can hardly be expected themselves to dis- effects of the Archbishop of Granada's apoplexy, unwilling to pass over in their composition, as in- mere carelessness or bad luck, what others may con- sider as mortal decay. I had no choice save that I lay aside the pen, the use of which at my time become a habit, or to continue its vagaries, until the it let me plainly understand they would no more of which I was not unlikely to meet with, and which I tried to take without waiting for a repetition. This reader may plainly understand me, I was determin- when the publication of a new Waverley novel should subject of some attention in the literary world.

entail circumstance decided my choice of a subject for work. It was now several years since my im- mager brother, Thomas Scott, already mentioned in had resided for two or three seasons in the Isle of having access to the registers of that singular terri- ried many of them, which he subjected to my per- papers were put into my hands while my brother its of making some literary use of them, I do not her what; but he never came to any decision on that row tired of the task of transcription. The papers, ere lost in the course of a military man's life. The em, that is, of the most remarkable, remained en- he memory of the author.

esting and romantic story of William Christian ex- erted my fancy. I found the same individual, as well r, particularly noticed in some memorials of the is- and by the Earl of Derby, and published in Dr. Peck's Curiosa. This gentleman was the son of Edward, vernor of the island; and William himself was one of its two Dempsters, or supreme judges. Both son embraced the party of the Islanders, and con- feudal rights claimed by the Earl of Derby as King t. When the Earl had suffered death at Bolton-le- tun Christian placed himself at the head of the s if they might be so called, and found the means of unication with a fleet sent by the Parliament— as surrendered to the Parliament by the insurgent The high spirited Countess and her son were arrest- into prison, where they were long detained, and ntly treated. When the restoration took place, the y by title the Queen dowager of the Island, seized in Dhône, or Fair-haired William, as William Chris- med, and caused him to be tried and executed, ac- he laws of the island, for having dethroned his liege d imprisoned her and her family. Romancers, and romancer, will generally allow that the fate of nd the contrast of his character with that of the l, but vindictive Countess of Derby, famous du- al wars for her valiant defence of Latham House, e essence of an interesting tale. I have, however, ether on the death of William Christian, or on the which Charles II. viewed that stretch of feudal the heavy fine which he imposed upon the Derby that extent of jurisdiction of which the Countess pty. Far less have I given any opinion on the jus- of that action, which is to this day judged of by of the island as they happen to be connected with or perhaps as they may look back with the eyes of the Cavaliers or Roundheads of those contentious not conceive that I have done injury to the memory em, or any of his descendants in his person; at e I have most willingly given his representative an of stating in this edition of the Novel what he esary for the vindication of his ancestor, and the find the exposition in the Notices, for which Mr. sires admiration." I could do no less, considering the polite and gentlemanlike manner in which he stated feelings concerning his ancestry, to which a Scotsman can hardly be supposed to be indifferent.

In another respect, Mr. Christian with justice complains, that Edward Christian, described in the romance as the brother of the gentleman executed in consequence of the Countess's arbitrary act of authority, is portrayed as a wretch of unbounded depravity, having only ingenuity and courage to rescue him from abhorrence, as well as hatred. Any personal allusion was en- tirely undesigned on the part of the author. The Edward Chris- tian of the tale is a mere creature of the imagination. Com- mentators have naturally enough identified him with a brother of William Christian, named Edward, who died in prison after being confined seven or eight years in Peel Castle, in the year 1650. Of him I had no access to know any thing; and as I was not aware that such a person had existed, I could hardly be said to have traduced his character. It is sufficient for my justifica- tion, that there lived at the period of my story a person named Edward Christian, "with whom connected or by whom begot," I am a perfect stranger, but who we know to have been engaged in such actions as may imply his having been guilty of any thing bad. The fact is, that upon the 5th June, 1650, Thomas Blood, (the famous crown stealer,) Edward Christian, Arthur O'Brien, and others, were found guilty of being concerned in a conspi- racy for taking away the life and character of the celebrated Duke of Buckingham; but that this Edward was the same with the brother of William Christian, is impossible, since that brother died in 1650; nor would I have used his christened name of Edward, had I supposed there was a chance of its being con- nected with any existing family. These genealogical matters are fully illustrated in the notes to the Appendix.

I ought to have mentioned in the former editions of this ro- mance, that Charlotte de la Tremouille, Countess of Derby, re- presented as a Catholic, was, in fact, a French Protestant. For misrepresenting the noble dame in this manner, I have only Lu- cio's excuse—"I spoke according to the trick." In a story where the greater part is avowedly fiction, the author is at liberty to introduce such variations from actual fact as his plot requires, or which are calculated to enhance it; in which predicament the religion of the Countess of Derby, during the Popish Plot, ap- peared to fall. If I have over-estimated a romancer's privileges and immunities, I am afraid this is not the only, nor most impor- tant, case in which I have done so. To speak big words, the heroic Countess has far less grounds for an action of scandal, than the memory of Virgil might be liable to for his posthu- mous scandal of Dido.

The character of Fenella, which, from its peculiarity, made a favourable impression on the public, was far from being original. The fine sketch of Mignon, in Wilhelm Meister's Lehrjahre, a celebrated work from the pen of Goethe, gave the idea of such a being. But the copy will be found greatly different from my great prototype; nor can I be accused of borrowing any thing, save the general idea, from an author, the honour of his own country, and an example to the authors of other kingdoms, to whom all must be proud to own an obligation.

Family tradition supplied me with two circumstances, which are somewhat analogous to that in question. The first is an ac- count of a lawsuit, taken from a Scottish report of adjudged cases, quoted in note to Chapter V. p. 29.

The other—of which the editor has no reason to doubt, having often heard it from those who were witnesses of the fact—re- lates to the power of a female in keeping a secret, (sarcasti- cally said to be impossible,) even when that secret refers to the exercise of her tongue.

In the middle of the eighteenth century, a female wanderer came to the door of Mr. Robert Scott, grandfather of the pre- sent author, an opulent farmer in Roxburghshire, and made signs that she desired shelter for the night, which, according to the custom of the times, was readily granted. The next day the country was covered with snow, and the departure of the wan- derer was rendered impossible. She remained for many days, her maintenance adding little to the expense of a consider- able household; and by the time that the weather grew milder, she had learned to hold intercourse by signs with the household around her, and could intimate to them that she was desirous of staying where she was, and working at the wheel and other em- ployment, to compensate for her food. This was a compact not unfrequent at that time, and the dumb woman entered upon her thrift, and proved a useful member of the patriarchal household. She was a good spinner, knitter, carder, and so forth, but her excellence lay in attending to the feeding and bringing up the domestic poultry. Her mode of whistling to call them together was so peculiarly elfish and shrill, that it was thought, by those who heard it, more like that of a fairy than a human being.

In this manner she lived three or four years, nor was there the slightest idea entertained in the family that she was other than the mute and deprived person she had always appeared. But in a moment of surprise, she dropped the mask which she had worn so long.

It chanced upon a Sunday that the whole inhabitants of the household were at church except dumb Lizzie, whose infirmity was supposed to render her incapable of profiting by divine service, and who therefore stayed at home to take charge of the house. It happened that, as she was sitting in the kitchen a mischievous forced assent to this notable system of submission and loving kindness.

This is perhaps the most convenient place for stating, that, in the subsequent surrender of the Island to the troops of the Parliament, the only stipulation made by the Islanders was, "that they might enjoy their lands and liberties as they formerly had." In what manner this stipulation was performed, my notes do not enable me to state. The restoration of Charles II., propitious in other respects, inflicted on the Isle of Man the revival of its feudal government; and the affair of the tenures continued to be a theme of perpetual content and unavailing complaint, until finally adjusted in 1703, through the mediation of the excellent Bishop Wilson, in a legislative compromise known by the name of the Act of Settlement, whereby the people obtained a full recognition of their ancient rights, on condition of doubling the actual quit rents, and consenting to alienation fines, first exacted by the Earl James in 1613.*

In 1649, William Dhu-ne was appointed Receiver General; and in the same year we find his elder brother, John, (assistant Deemster to his father Ewan,) committed to Peel Castle on one of these occasions, which strongly marks the character of the person and the times, and affords also a glimpse at the feeling of the people, and at the condition of the devoted family of Christian. The inquisitive will find it in a note.† Other readers will pass on.

The circumstances are familiarly known, to the reader of English history, of the march of the Earl of Derby, in 1651, with a corps from the Isle of Man for the service of the King; his joining the royal army on the eve of the battle of Worcester; his flight and imprisonment at Chester, after that signal defeat; and his trial and execution at Bolton in Lancashire by the officers of the Parliament, on the 15th October of that year.

Immediately afterwards, Colonel Duckenfield, who commanded at Chester on behalf of the Parliament, proceeded with an armament of ten ships, and a considerable military force, for the reduction of the Isle of Man.

William Christian was condemned and executed in 1662, for acts connected with its surrender, twelve years before, which are still involved in obscurity, and it will be most acceptable to the general reader that we should pass over the intermediate period, and leave the facts regarding this individual, all of them extraordinary, and some of peculiar interest, to be developed by the record of the trial, and documents derived from other sources.

A mandate by Charles, 5th Earl of Derby, dated at Lathom, in September, 1662, after decanting on the heinous sin of rebellion, "aggravated by its being instrumental in the death of the Lord; and stating that he is himself concerned to revenge a father's blood," orders William Christian to be proceeded against forthwith, for all his illegal actions, at, before, or after, the year 1651, (a pretty sweeping range.) The indictment charges him with "being the head of an insurrection against the Countess of Derby in 1651, assuming the power unto himself, and depriving her Ladyship, his Lordship, and heirs, thereof."

A series of depositions appear on record from the 3d to the 19th October, and a reference by the previous depositories of justice of that day, to the twenty-four Keys.‡ Whether upon the examination taken in writ before, you find Mr. W. Christian of Ronaldsway, within compass of the statute of the year 1422, that is, to receive a sentence without quest, or to be tried in the ordinary course of law." This body designated on the record "so many of the Keys as were then present," were in number seventeen; but not being yet sufficiently select to approve of

* Report of 1791. App. A. No. 71.

† A person named Charles Vaughan is thought to lodge an information, that being in England, he fell into company with a young man named Christian, who said he had lately left the Isle of Man, and was in search of a brother, who was clerk to a Parliament Officer; that in answer to some questions, he said, "The Earl did use the inhabitants of that Isle very hardly; had extracted great fines from the inhabitants; had changed the ancient tenures, and forced them to take leases." That he had taken away one hundred pounds a-year from his father, and had kept his uncle in prison four or five years. But if ever the Earl came to England, he had used the inhabitants so hardly, that he was sure they would never offer him to land in that island again." An order is given to imprison John Christian (probably the reputed head of the family, his father being advanced in years) in Peel Castle, until he entered into bonds to be of good behaviour, and not to depart the Isle without leave. — (Insular Records.) The young man in question is said to have been the son of William Christian of Knockrushen.

‡ Some readers may desire an outline of this period. The lordship of the Island was given to Lord Fairfax, who deputed commissioners to regulate its affairs: one of them (Chaloner) published an account of the Island in 1656. He puts down William Christian as Receiver-General in 1653. We find his name as Governor, from 1656 to 1658. (Suchetverill, p. 101.) in which year he was succeeded by Chaloner himself. Among the anomalies of those times, it would seem that he had retained the office of Receiver while officiating as Governor; and episcopacy having been abolished, and the receipts of the see added to those of the exchequer, he had large accounts to settle, for which Chaloner sequestered his estates in his absence, and imprisoned and held to bail his brother John, for aiding what he calls his escape; his son George returned from England, by permission of Lord Fairfax, to settle his father's accounts. Chaloner informs us, that the revenues of the suppressed see were not appropriated to the private use of Lord Fairfax, who, "for the better encouragement and support of the ministers of the Gospel, and for the promoting of learning, hath conferred all this revenue upon the ministers, and also for maintaining free schools, i. e. at Castletown, Peel, Douglas, and Ramsay." Chaloner pays a liberal tribute to the talents of the clergy, and the learning and piety of the late bishops.

§ See the remark in Christian's dying speech, that the late Earl had been executed eight days before the insurrection.

¶ The court for criminal trials was composed of the governor and council (including the deemsters) and the keys, who also, with the lord, composed the three branches of the legislative body; and it was the practice in cases of doubt to refer points of customary law to the deemsters and keys.

sentence without trial, made their return, To be tried by our law

On the 26th November, it is recorded, that the Crown Attorney General having proceeded to the jail "with a guard of soldiers, to require him (Christian) to the bar to stand trial, he refused, and denied to come, and abide the admirable courtesy to invite, instead of bringing him there. Whereupon the Governor demanded the law of Master Norris, who then sat in judgment. Deemster John having not appeared, and Mr. Edward Christian,† and assistant, having also forborne to sit in this Court, said Deemster Norris craved the advice and assistance of twenty-four Keys; and the said Deemster and Keys of the law therein, to wit, that he is at the mercy of the law for life and goods.

It will be observed, that seven of the Keys were absent, on what account we shall presently see. All very cleverly arranged by the following recorded vote December— "That of the twenty-four Keys are remain, twenty, in reference to my Honourable Lord's order in 1651," enumerating seven names, not of the seven mentioned, and naming seven others who "are sworn" places." The nomenclature is farther improved by transcribing the eighth individual of the first seven team to the council, and his place with another proper person. These facts lawfully noted with some minuteness of detail for two reasons; though nearly equalled by some of the subsequent proceedings they would not be credited on common authority: and they render all comment unnecessary, and prepare the way for any judgment, however extraordinary, to be expected such a trial.

Then come the proceedings of the 20th December— "The Keys now assembled, to the Deemsters," and ten Keys now assembled, "to be answered in point of law. Any malefactor, &c. being indicted, &c. and denying the law of his country in that course, (notwithstanding argument or plea he may offer for himself,) and threatened to forfeit body and goods, &c. whether he may obtain the same benefit, &c. &c. to which, on the 21st they answered in the negative. It was found practical the 21st, to bring the prisoner to the bar, to hear his defence, and to be tried, that thereupon his life was forfeited," which sentence was executed on the 22nd 1663.

That he made "an excellent speech," at the place of execution, is recorded, where we should little expect to find the Paroloud Register; the accuracy of that which is preserved as such in the family of a clergyman, not yet have been printed on or before 1776,§) rests chiefly on evidence; and on its accordance, in some material facts suppressed or distorted in the Records, but which the proceedings of the Privy Council. It is therein, without abbreviation, and the material points of evidence voluminous depositions on both trials§§ are extracted in a note.

* The grandson of Ewan. It appears by the proceedings of the court, 1663, that he did, when the court refused to sit, demand William Christian's plea of the Act of indemnity, and proceeded to examine their legal proceedings, and did not sit, and came to England to shew his Majesty, and implore him.

† The Commissioners of 1791 are in doubt regarding the manner in which the keys were first elected, and whether they had perhaps not fallen under their observation.

‡ Hugh Cannel was now added as a second Deemster.

§ One of the copies in my possession is stated to be transcribed from the printed speech, the other as stated in the text.

§§ Both trials: the first is for the same purposes as the English trial, with this most essential difference, that evidence is taken by the prisoner, and it thus becomes what it is frequently called a petty jury in England.

This testimony will of course be received with due respect, confronted with the only defence known, that of his dying speech, to establish that Christian had placed himself at the disposal of the law, and by a secret oath, to withstand the law of his country until she had yielded or condescended to their grievances, during the Earl's residence, we find any notion, "the troop that was in the Isle and their free will that he had represented her Ladyship to have deceived him, by into negotiations with the Parliament, contrary to her promise, in which he was such a case; that Christian and he declared that she was about to sell them for twopence or threepence that he told his associates, that he had entered into correspondence with Major Fox and the Parliament, and received their authority to country; that in consequence of this insurrection her Ladyship commissioners to treat with others "on the part of the common articles of agreement were concluded (see the speech) which was apparent; that on the appearance of Duckenfield's ships for Ramsay Bay, one of the insurgents boarded them off Douglas, giving intelligence of the condition of the country," the troops marched under the governor, Sir Philip Musgrave, for Ram when the shipping had anchored, a deputation of three persons, John Christian, Ewan Curphey, and William Standish, were sent to negotiate for the surrender of the Island (where William Christian appears). The destruction of the articles of agreement, and the records regarding the relative strength of the forces without the means of determining the degree of merit or demerit ascribed to these negotiators, or the precise authority under which acted; but the grievances to be redressed, are cleared from every by the all-sufficient testimony of the terms demanded by the victors, "that they might enjoy their lands and liberties as they had; and that it was demanded whether they asked any thing else was demanded that this eximant heard of." of Loyal Fort near Ramsay, (commanded by a Major Duckenfield was made prisoner,) and of Peel Castle, appear on record; in could be found regarding the surrender of Castle Rushen, Countess of Derby's subsequent imprisonment. How unjust the accusation is, very v of you that hear me this day but can witness; and that the rising of the people, in which afterwards I came to be engaged, did not at all, or in the least degree, intend the prejudice or ruin of that family; the chief whereof being, as you recollect, member, dead eight days, or thereabout, before that action hap-~~ped~~. "It was his Majesty's most gracious Act of Indemnity gave the confidence and assurance of my safety; on which, and appeal I made to his sacred Majesty and Privy Council, on the unjustness of the proceedings had against me, I did rely, being his Majesty's subject here, and a denizen of island both by birth and fortune. And in regard I have dis- sed the power of my Lord Derby's Act of Indemnity, which you ested on the highest semblance of truth, we should inevitably have had an attempt to prove it in the proceedings of this moot trial. In presence of authentic details, the tradition may be adverted to, that ladyship, on learning the proceedings at Ramsey, hastened to embark in a vessel she had prepared, but was intercepted before she could reach it. The same uncertainty exists with regard to any negotiations her part, with the officers of the Parliament, as affirmed by the insur- ments; the Earl's first letter, after his capture and before his trial, says, Truly, as matters go, it will be best for you to make conditions for yourself, children, and friends, in the manner as we have proposed, or you can farther agree with Col. Duckenfield; who being so much a gentleman born, will doubtless, for his own honour, deal fairly with u." He seems also to have hoped at that time that it might influence own fate; and the eloquent and affecting letter written immediately fore his execution, repeats the same admonitions to treat. Roll, pp. 61 and 64.

"This fact, as might be expected, is not to be traced on the record of trial.

"The apprehension was but too correct.

now look upon, and his Majesty's Act cast out as being of no force. I have with greater violence been persecuted; yet nevertheless I do declare, that no subject whatever can or ought to take upon them acts of indemnity but his sacred Majesty only, with the confirmation of Parliament.

"It is very fit I should say something as to my education and religion. I think I need not inform you, for you all know, I was brought up a son of the Church of England, which was at that time in her splendour and glory; and to my endless comfort I have ever since continued a faithful member, witness several of my actions in the late times of liberty. And as for government, I never was against monarchy, which now, to my soul's great satisfaction, I have lived to see is settled and established. I am well assured that men of upright life and conversation may have the favourable countenance of our gracious King, under whose happy government, God of his infinite mercy long continue these his kingdoms and dominions. And now I do most heartily thank my good God that I have had so much liberty and time to disburden myself of several things that have laid heavy upon me all the time of my imprisonment, in which I have not had time or liberty to speak or write any of my thoughts; and from my soul I wish all animosity may after my death be quite laid aside, and my death by none be called in question, for I do freely forgive all that have had any hand in my persecution; and may our good God preserve you all in peace and quiet the remainder of your days!"

"Be ye all of you his Majesty's liege people, loyal and faithful to his sacred Majesty; and, according to your oath of faith and fealty to my Honourable Lord of Derby, do you likewise, in all just and lawful ways, observe his commands; and know that you must one day give an account of all your deeds. And now the blessing of Almighty God be with you all, and preserve you from violent death, and keep you in peace of conscience all your days."

"I will now hasten, for my flesh is willing to be dissolved, and my spirit to be with God, who hath given me full assurance of his mercy and pardon for all my sins, of which his unspeakable goodness and loving kindness my poor soul is exceedingly satisfied."

Note: Here he fell upon his knees, and passed some time in prayer; then rising exceedingly cheerful, he addressed the soldiers appointed for his execution, saying—"Now for you, who are appointed by lot my executioners, I do freely forgive you." He requested them and all present to pray for him, adding, "There is but a thin veil betwixt me and death; once more I request your prayers, for now I take my last farewell."

The soldiers wished to bind him to the spot on which he stood. He said "Trouble not yourselves or me; for I that dare face death in whatever form he comes, will not start at your fire and bullets; nor can the power you have deprive me of my courage." At his desire a piece of white paper was given him, which with the utmost composure he pinned to his breast, to direct them where to aim; and after a short prayer addressed the soldiers thus—"Hit this, and you do your own and my work." And presently after, stretching forth his arms, which was the signal he gave them, he was shot through the heart and fell.

Edward Christian, the nephew, and George, the son of the deceased, lost no time in appealing to his Majesty in Council against this judicial murder; and George was furnished with an order "to pass and repass," &c. "and bring with him such records and persons as he should desire, to make out the truth of his complaint." Edward returned with him to the Island for that purpose; for we find him, in April 1663, compelled, in the true spirit of the day, to give bond "that he would at all times appear and answer to such charges as might be preferred against him, and not depart the Isle without license." George was prevented, by various contrivances, from serving the King's order; but on presenting a second petition, the Governor, Deemster, and Members of Council, were brought up to London by a Sergeant-at-arms; and these six persons, together with the Earl of Derby, being compelled to appear, a full hearing took place before the King in person, the Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice, Lord Chief Baron, and other Members of Council; judgment was extended on the 5th of August, and that judgment was on the 11th of the same month ordered "to be printed in folio, in such manner as Acts of Parliament are usually printed, and his Majesty's Arms prefixed."

This authentic document designates the persons brought up as "Members of the pretended Court of Justice;" declares "that the general Act of Pardon and Amnesty, did extend to the Isle of Man, and ought to have been taken notice of by the Judges in that Island, although it had not been pleaded; that the Court refused to admit the deceased William Christian's plea of the Act of Indemnity," &c. "Full restitution is ordered to be made to his heirs of all his estates, real and personal." Three other persons "who were by the same Court of Justice imprisoned, and their estates seized and confiscated without any legal trial," are ordered, together with the Christians, "to be restored to all their estates, real and personal, and to be fully repaired in all the charges and expenses, which they have been at since their first imprisonment, as well in the prosecution of this business, as in their journey hither, or in any other way thereunto relating." The mode of raising funds for the purposes of this restitution is equally peculiar and instructive; these "sums of money are ordered to be furnished by the Deemsters, Members, and Assistants of the said Court of Justice," who are directed "to raise and make due payment thereof to the parties."

"And to the end that the blood that has been unjustly spilt may in some sort be expiated," &c., the Deemsters are ordered to be committed to the King's Bench to be proceeded against, &c. &c. and receive condign punishment. [It is believed that this part of the order was afterwards relaxed or rendered nugatory.] The three Members of Council were released on giving security to appear, if required, and to make the restitution ordered. "And in regard that Edward Christian, being one of the Deemsters or Judges in the Isle of Man, did, when the Court refused to admit of the deceased W. Christian's plea of the Act of Indemnity, make his protestation against their illegal proceedings, and did withdraw himself, and come to England to solicit his Majesty and implore his justice, it is ordered that the Earl of Derby do forthwith, by commission, &c., restore and appoint him as Deemster, so to remain and continue, &c. [which order was disobeyed.] And lastly, that Henry Nowell, Deputy Governor, whose fault hath been the not complying with, and yielding due obedience to, the order of his Majesty and this Board sent unto the the Island. [O most lame and impotent conclusion!] be permitted to return to the Isle, and enforce the present Order of the King in Council."

Of the Earl of Derby, no farther mention occurs in this document. The sacrifices made by this noble family in support of the royal cause, drew a large share of indulgence over the exceptionable parts of their conduct; but the mortification necessarily consequent on this appeal, the incessant complaints of the people, and the difficulty subsequently experienced by them in obtaining access to a superior tribunal, receive a curious illustration in an order of the King in council, dated 20th August, 1670, on a petition of the Earl of Derby, "that the clerk of the council in waiting receive no petition, appeal, or complaint, against the lord or government of the Isle of Man, without having first good security from the complainant to answer costs, damages, and charges."

The historical notices of this kingdom of Lilliput are curious and instructive with reference to other times and different circumstances, and they have seemed to require little comment or antiquarian remark; but to condense what may be collected with regard to Edward Christian, the accomplished villain of Peveril, the insinuations of his accuser constitute in themselves an abundant defence. When so little can be imputed by such an adversary, the character must indeed be invulnerable. Tradition ascribes to him nothing but what is amiable, patriotic, honourable, and good, in all the relations of public and private life. He died, after an imprisonment of seven or eight years, the victim of incorrigible obstinacy, according to one, of ruthless tyranny, according to another vocabulary; but resembling the character of the Novel in nothing but unconquerable courage.

Treachery and ingratitude have been heaped on the memory of William Christian with sufficient profusion. Regarding the first of these crimes, if all that has been affirmed or insinuated in the mock trial, rested on a less questionable basis, posterity would scarcely pronounce an unanimous verdict of moral and political guilt, against an association to subvert such a government as is described by its own author. The peculiar favours for which he or his family were ungrateful, are not to be discovered in these proceedings; except, indeed, in the form of "chastisements of the Almighty—blessings in disguise." But if credit be given to the dying words of William Christian, his efforts were strictly limited to a redress of grievances,—a purpose always criminal in the eye of the oppressor. If he had lived and died on a larger scene, his memory would probably have survived among the patriots and the heroes. In some of the manuscript narratives he is designated as a martyr for the rights and liberties of his countrymen; who add, in their homely manner, that he was condemned without trial, and murdered without remorse.

We have purposely abstained from all attempt to enlist the passions in favour of the sufferings of a people, or in detestation of oppressions, which ought, perhaps, to be ascribed as much to the character of the times as to that of individuals. The naked facts of the case (unaided by the wild and plaintive notes in which the maidens of the isle were wont to bewail "the heart-rending death of fair-haired William") are sufficient of themselves to awaken the sympathy of every generous mind; and it were a more worthy exercise of that despotic power over the imagination, so eminently possessed by the Great Unknown, to embalm the remembrance of two such men in his immortal pages, than to load their memories with crimes, such as no human being ever committed.

I AM enabled to add the translation of the lament over the fair-haired William Christian. It is originally composed in the Manx language, and consists of a series of imprecations of evil upon the enemies of Christian, and prophecies to the same purpose:—

On the Death and Murder of Receiver-General William Christian of Ronaldsway, who was shot near Hango Hill, January 2, 1662.

In so shifting a scene, who would confidence place
In family power, youth, or in personal grace?
No character's proof against enmity foul;
And thy fate, William Dhône, sickens our soul.

2.
You are Derby's receiver of patriot zeal,
Replete with good sense, and reputed genteel,
Your justice applauded by the young and the old;
And thy fate, &c.

* Tradition, in accordance with the dirge of William Dhône, says that the order to stop proceedings and suspend the sentence arrived on the day preceding that of his execution.

† Earl James, although studious of kingcraft, assigns good reasons for having never pretended to assume that title, and among others, "Nor doth it please a king that any of his subjects should too much love that name, were it but to act in a play."—Peck, 426.

§ The literal translation given to me by a young lady

2.
A kind, able patron both to church and to state—
What roused their resentment but talents so great?
No character's proof against enmity foul;
And thy fate, &c.

4.
Thy pardon, 'tis rumour'd, came over the seas,
Nor late, but conceal'd by a villain in gain;
'Twas fear forced the jury to a sentence so foul.
And thy fate, &c.

5.
Triumphant stood Colcott, he wish'd some men,
When the pride of the Christians lay waiting in pain;
To malice a victim, though steady and bold;
And thy fate, &c.

6.
With adultery stain'd, and polluted with gore,
He Ronaldsway eyed, as Loghscolly before,
'Twas the land sought the culprit, as Ahab before;
And thy fate, &c.

7.
Proceed to the once famed abode of the Manx,
Call the Calcotts aloud, till you torture your hags.
Their short triumph's ended, extinct is the woe.
And thy fate, &c.

8.
For years could Robert lay crippled in bed,
Nor knew the world peace while he held up his head;
The neighbourhood's scourge in iniquity bold;
And thy fate, &c.

9.
Not one's heard to grieve, seek the country all the Nor lament for the name that Demacan once knew
The poor rather load it with curses untold;
And thy fate, &c.

Ballaclogh and the Criggans mark strongly there,
Not a soul of the name's there to welcome you;
In the power of the strangers is centred the woe;
And thy fate, &c.

11.
The opulent Scarlett on which the sea flows,
Is piecemeal disposed of to whom the Lord knows;
It is here without bread or defence from the soil;
And thy fate, &c.

12.
They assert then in vain, that the law sought thy end,
For all aiding the massacre never did good;
Like the rooted-up golding deprived of its gold,
They languish'd, were blasted, grew wither'd and old.

13.
When the shoots of a tree so corrupted remain,
Like the brier or thistle, they goad us with pain;
Deep, dark, undermining, they mimic the mole;
And thy fate, &c.

14.
Round the infamous wretches who spilt Caesar's blood,
Dead spectres and conscience in sad array stood,
Not a man of the gang reach'd life's utmost goal;
And thy fate, &c.

15.
Perdition, too, seized them who caused thee to die,
To decay fell their houses, their lands and their wife;
Disappear'd like the vapour when morn's tinged air;
And thy fate, &c.

16.
From grief all corroding, to hope I'll repair,
That a branch of the Christians will soon grace the
With royal instructions his foes to console;
And thy fate, &c.

17.
With a book for my pillow, I dreamt as I lay,
That a branch of the Christians would hold Ronald His conquests his topic with friends o'er a bowl;
And thy fate, &c.

18.
And now for a wish in concluding my song,—
May th' Almighty withhold me from doing what's wrong,
Protect every mortal from enmity foul,
For thy fate, William Dhône, sickens our soul!†

† A person named in the next stanza is said to have interposed sent from England for William Christian, found, it is a foot of an old woman's stocking. The tradition is highly impud, it would not have failed to be charged as a high aggravated subsequent proceedings of the Privy Council.

To the end the world may the better take notice of his Majesty's royal intention, to observe the Act of Indemnity and General Pardon inviolably for the publique good and satisfaction of his subjects—it was this day ordered that a copy of the order of this Board of the 5th inst. touching the illegal proceedings in the Isle of Mann against William Christian, and putting him to death contrary to the said act of General Pardon, be sent unto his Majesty's printer, who is commanded forth-

CAPTAIN CLUTTERBUCK, RESIDING AT FAIRY LODGE, NEAR KENNAKAR.

NOTE NUMBER AND NAME

To your last letter I might have answered, with the remark - "Mind your own business, sister mine!" For though my recovery from infamy has been with things of antipathy yet I have not ghosts or spectres to be commemorated thereon and truly your account of the conversation you hold with our great parent, at the crypt or most intimate recess of the publishers at Edinburgh, had upon me much the effect of the apparition of Horatio's situation on the brow of the Baron -

I am further bound that the manuscript consisted of a story five chapters to the length of perhaps three hundred and thirty pages in each volume or thereabouts. This I should say was to me from which this book came, and having not myself to perform the writing share, I began in October of 1924 or in June that I might get a volume well into the year's harvest.

Again it seems to me a marked circumstance that whereas my many apartment of life (conceivable a shop was thought) a place of sufficient eminence for your endeavor our domestic quarrel was planned to afford some of the scenes of my own judgments were possible as it were and without the charge of interruption. I must also remark that the business, form and dress of the House as you well term the apartment of our present seemed to me more severely dressed than was expected of you on the former occasion. (If this be so after the Heaven forbid I should glory or set up any claim of superiority over the other demerits of our common phase from perished marks of his profession—[see private work] I am well satisfied that the house was bestowed and on my person but my cloth that the confidence did not escape James the student was (utterly) but the Port of Liberty was the Captain. Order of the night—A woman never to be forgotten a tiny turn but especially to be remembered when the shadow is seen half way

But I beseech you that I am keeping you all these while in the prison, and wearying you with long incarcerations, when you might have me prisoner in another way. So you will it shall be done for as the Queen is wont to say of our military - "The day tells a story as well as the trumpet" where he has ever got up to the starting point - I leave her. God to comfort

I had shunned the prospect of the narrative which I had regarded about a week before, and that with no small reason, for the hope of our parent is however so small and so crushed that I was obliged to get strong supporters. Feeling my eyes a little relaxed towards the close of the second volume I looked back in my easy chair and began to conceive trifling approval of the opinions which have been put forward against our father and mother might not be considered as applying in an especial manner to the parents I had just read. None are ignorant enough, and I to myself to recede from the march of a whole history - enlightened enough to prevent all rheumatism. The old gentleman hath broken a lance with some troops.

As these thoughts passed through my mind I fell into a kind of swoon which is not uncommon with me after dinner when I am a complete blank or have no one with me but my cat. I was awake, however, for I remember seeing to the effect of the fire a representation of a mile with the towers of a cathedral in the background somewhere I remember passing for a distance later on the empty expanse of the wilderness depicted by the picture and the man who is mentioned in The Heart of Man Lovina whose portrait, painted in wax on parchment hangs above my cradle. Farther I remember smiling the flowers in the form of carved oak and copper and are on the outside which have beneath them the flowers

The Age of Reason is a collection of essays by Thomas Paine, published in 1793. It is a work of political philosophy that argues for the separation of church and state, and for the rights of the individual. The book is a landmark work of the Enlightenment, and it has been influential in the development of modern political thought.

The following information was obtained from the records of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, Department of Justice, and the Central Intelligence Agency, Office of Security, regarding the activities of the Central Intelligence Agency, Office of Security, during the period from January 1, 1960, to December 31, 1960.

No light temptation, unquestionably; but this is a one, to hob-or-nob with the lords of the literary of Althorpe and Hodnet, in Madeira negus, browed by ical Dibdin—to share those profound debates which ice in all that could possibly give him displeasure. He partly appeased, but still bent on mean eye of suspicion, he "Rising in the North Country."

Author. What wouldst thou have, Francis Norton?
Thou art my youngest son and heir;
Something lies brooding at thy heart—
Whate'er it be, to me declare.

Just. Craving, then, your paternal forgiveness for my ction, I only sighed at the possibility of your venturing amongst a body of critics, to whom, in the capacity of antiquaries, the investigation of truth is an especial duty, o may therefore visit with the more severe censure those ons, which it is so often your pleasure to make from the true history.

r. I understand you. You mean to say these learned will have but little toleration for a romance, or a fictirative, founded upon history?

Just. Why, sir, I do rather apprehend, that their respect foundation will be such, that they may be apt to quarthe inconsistent nature of the superstructure; just as lassical traveller pours forth expressions of sorrow and indignation, when, in travelling through Greece, he chanced to see a Turkish kiosk rising on the ruins of an ancient temple.

Author. But since we cannot rebuild the temple, a kiosk may be a pretty thing, may it not? Not quite correct in architecture, strictly and classically criticised; but presenting something uncommon to the eye, and something fantastic to the imagination, on which the spectator gazes with pleasure of the same description which arises from the perusal of an Eastern tale.

Dryasdust. I am unable to dispute with you in metaphor, sir; but I must say, in discharge of my conscience, that you stand much censured for adulterating the pure sources of historical knowledge. You approach them, when say, like the drunken yeoman, who, once upon a time, polluted the crystal spring which supplied the thirst of his family, with a score of sugar loaves and a hoghead of rum; and thereby converted a simple and wholesome beverage into a stupifying, brutifying, and intoxicating fluid; sweeter, indeed, to the taste, than the natural lymph, but, for that very reason, more seductively dangerous.

Author. I allow your metaphor, Doctor; but yet, though good punch cannot supply the want of spring-water, it is, when modestly used, no malum in se; and I should have thought it a shabby thing of the parson of the parish, had he helped to drink out the well on Saturday night, and preached against the honest hospitable yeoman on Sunday morning. I should have answered him, that the very flavour of the liquor should have put him at once upon his guard; and that, if he had taken a drop over much, he ought to blame his own imprudence more than the hospitality of his entertainer.

Dryasdust. I profess I do not exactly see how this applies.

Author. No; you are one of those numerous disputants, who will never follow their metaphor a step farther than it goes their own way. I will explain. A poor fellow, like myself, weary with ransacking his own barren and bounded imagination, looks out for some general subject in the huge and boundless field of history, which holds forth examples of every kind —lights on some personage, or some combination of circumstances, or some striking trait of manners, which he thinks may be advantageously used as the basis of a fictitious narrative —bedizens it with such colouring as his skill suggests—ornaments it with such romantic circumstances as may heighten the general effect—invests it with such shades of character, as will best contrast with each other—and thinks, perhaps, he has done some service to the public, if he can present to them a lively fictitious picture, for which the original anecdote or circumstance which he made free to press into his service, only furnished a slight sketch. Now I cannot perceive any harm in this. The stores of history are accessible to every one; and are no more exhausted or impoverished by the hints thus borrowed from them, than the fountain is drained by the water which we substract for domestic purposes. And in reply to the sober charge of falsehood, against a narrative announced positively to be fictitious, one can only answer, by Prior's exclamation,

"Odzooks, must one swear to the truth of a song?"

Dryasdust. Nay; but I fear me that you are here eluding the charge. Men do not seriously accuse you of misrepresenting history; although I assure you I have seen some grave treatises, in which it was thought necessary to contradict your assertions.

Author. That certainly was to point a discharge of artillery against a wreath of morning mist.

Dryasdust. But besides, and especially, it is said that you are in danger of causing history to be neglected—readers being contented with such frothy and superficial knowledge as they acquire from your works, to the effect of inducing them to neglect the severer and more accurate sources of information.

Author. I deny the consequence. On the contrary, I rather hope that I have turned the attention of the public on various points, which have received elucidation from writers of more learning and research, in consequence of my novels having attached some interest to them. I might give instances, but I hate vanity—I hate vanity. The history of the divining rod is well known—it is a slight valueless twig in itself, but indicates, by its motion, where veins of precious metal are concealed below the earth, which afterwards enrich the adventurers by whom they are laboriously and carefully wrought. I claim no more merit for my historical hints; but this is something.

Dryasdust. We severer antiquaries, sir, may grant that this is true; to wit, that your works may occasionally have put men of solid judgment upon researches which they would not perhaps have otherwise thought of undertaking. But this will leave you still accountable for misleading the young, the indolent, and the giddy, by thrusting into their hands, works, which,
while they have so much the appearance of conveying information, as may prove perhaps a salve to their consciences for employing their leisure in the perusal, yet leave their giddy brains contented with the crude, uncertain, and often false statements, which your novels abound with.

Author. It would be very unbecoming in me, reverend sir, to accuse a gentleman of your cloth of cant; but, pray, is there not something like it in the pathos with which you enforce these dangers? I aver, on the contrary, that by introducing the busy and the youthful to "truths severe in fairy fiction dressed,"† I am doing a real service to the more ingenious and the more apt among them; for the love of knowledge wants but a beginning—the least spark will give fire when the train is properly prepared; and having been interested in fictitious adventures, ascribed to an historical period and characters, the

† The Doctor has denied the author's title to shelter himself under this quotation; but the author continues to think himself entitled to all the shelter, which, threadbare as it is, it may yet be able to afford him.
The truth severe applies not to the narrative itself, but to the moral it conveys, in which the author has not been thought deficient. The "fairy fiction" is the conduct of the story which the tale is invented to elucidate.

reader begins next to be anxious to learn what the facts really were, and how far the novelist has justly represented them.

But even where the mind of the more careless reader remains satisfied with the light perusal he has afforded to a tale of fiction, he will still lay down the book with a degree of knowledge, not perhaps of the most accurate kind, but such as he might not otherwise have acquired. Nor is this limited to minds of a low and incursive description, but, on the contrary, comprehends many persons otherwise of high talents, who, nevertheless, either from lack of time, or of perseverance, are willing to sit down contented with the slight information which is acquired in such a manner. The great Duke of Marlborough, for example, having quoted, in conversation, some fact of English history rather inaccurately, was requested to name his authority. "Shakespeare's Historical Plays," answered the conqueror of Blenheim; "the only English history I ever read in my life." And a hasty recollection will convince any of us how much better we are acquainted with those parts of English history which that immortal bard has dramatized, than with any other portion of British story.

Dryadus. And you, worthy sir, are ambitious to render a similar service to posterity?

Author. May the saints forefend I should be guilty of such unfounded vanity! I only show what has been done when there were giants in the land. We pigmies of the present day, may at least, however, do something, and it is well to keep a pattern before our eyes, though that pattern be inevitable.

Dryadus. Well, sir, with me you must have your own course, and for reasons well known to you, it is impossible for me to reply to you in argument. But I doubt if all you have said will reconcile the public to the anachronisms of your present volumes. Here you have a Countess of Derby fetched out of her cold grave, and saddled with a set of adventures dated twenty years after her death, besides being given up as a Catholic, when she was in fact a zealous Huguenot.

Author. She may see me for damages, as in the case Dido versus Virgil.

Dryadus. A woe-worth shall I find your volumes less correct than usual. Your Puritan is almost unrecognizable to your Chamberlains.

Author. I agree in the charge, but although I still affect hypocrisy and enthusiasm as fit food for ridicule, yet I am sensible of the difference of bridling these qualities in abhorrence, without using colouring which gives offence to the sincerely worthy and religious. The few lawful which we are taught are not restrained by any many tones of feeling which are too respectful to be muted, though we do not altogether sympathize with them.

Dryadus. Not to mention my worthy or that you may think the subject exhausted.

Author. The devil take the men of this generation, who are too busy with the worst construction on their neighbour's conduct, to say, and flinging a hasty sort of advice towards his head, he rapped the door, and ran hastily down the stairs, and rang for my servant who I demanded what had become of the dog, and that any such had been admitted—I poured tea and decenter, and he—he had the assurance to say such remarks were sometimes made when I was in company than my own. I do not know what to say in this doubtful matter, but will certainly intimate your placing this dialogue, with my present letter, at the PERVEIL OF THE FEAR. I am,

DEAR SIR,

Very much your faithful and obedient servant,

JAMES BURN

PEVERIL OF THE PEAK.

CHAPTER I.

"When civil dudgeon first grew high,
And men fell out they knew not why;
When foul words, jealousies, and fears,
Set folk together by the ears—

BUTLER.

LIAM, the Conqueror of England, was, or supposed himself to be, the father of a certain William I, who attended him to the battle of Hastings, ere distinguished himself. The liberal-minded king, who assumed in his charters the veritable name of Gulielmus Bastardus, was not likely to let the illegitimacy be any bar to the course of his favour, when the laws of England were issued from the mouth of the Norman victor, and the lands of the Saxons were at his unlimited disposal. William I obtained a liberal grant of property and lands in Derbyshire, and became the erector of a stothic fortress, which, hanging over the mouth of Devil's Cavern, so well known to tourists, gave the name of Castleton to the adjacent village. In this feudal Baron, who chose his nest upon principles on which an eagle selects her eyry, and in such a fashion as if he had intended it, as human said of the Martello towers, for the sole sake of puzzling posterity, there was, or conceived himself to be, descended (for their pedigree was hypothetical) an opulent family of knightly lineage in the same county of Derby. The great fief of Castleton, with its adjacent wastes and forests, and all the wonders which they contain, had been granted in King John's stormy days, by one William I, and had been granted anew to the Lord Ferrers that day. Yet this William's descendants, no longer possessed of what they alleged to be their original property, were long distinguished by the proud title of Peverils of the Peak, which served to mark their high descent, and lofty positions.

In Charles the Second's time, the representative of the ancient family was Sir Geoffrey Peveril, a man who had many of the ordinary attributes of an old-fashioned country gentleman, and very few individual qualities to distinguish him from the general portrait of the worthy class of mankind. He was proud of his advantages, angry at small disappointments, incapable of forming any resolution or opinion independent of his own prejudices—he was proud of his wealth, lavish in his housekeeping, convivial with his kindred and acquaintances, who would allow of his superiority in rank—contentious and quarrelsome with all that crossed his pretensions—kind to the poor except when they plundered his game—a royalist in his political opinions, and one who detested the Roundhead, a poacher, and a Presbyterian. In religion Sir Geoffrey was a high-churchman, of so strong a strain that many thought he still nourished the same old Roman Catholic tenets, which his father had only renounced in his father's time, and he had a dispensation for conforming in outward observances to the Protestant faith. There was at that time such a scandal amongst the Puritans, and the conceit which Sir Geoffrey Peveril certainly appeared to possess amongst the Catholic gentlemen of Derbyshire and Cheshire, seemed to give countenance to the rumour.

It was Sir Geoffrey, who might have passed to the grave without farther distinction than a brass in the chancel, had he not lived in times which called forth the most inactive spirits into exertion, as a potent influence the sluggish waters of the deadest stream.

When the Civil Wars broke out, Peveril of the Peak was proud from pedigree, and brave by constitution, raised a regiment for the King, and showed upon several occasions more capacity for command than men had heretofore given him credit for.

Even in the midst of the civil turmoil, he fell in love with, and married, a beautiful and amiable young lady of the noble house of Stanley; and from that time had the more merit in his loyalty, as it divorced him from her society, unless at very brief intervals, when his duty permitted an occasional visit to his home. Scorning to be allured from his military duty by domestic inducements, Peveril of the Peak fought on for several rough years of civil war, and performed his part with sufficient gallantry, until his regiment was surprised and cut to pieces by Poyntz, Cromwell's enterprising and successful general of cavalry. The defeated Cavalier escaped from the field of battle, and, like a true descendant of William the Conqueror, disdaining submission, threw himself into his own castellated mansion, which was attacked and defended in a siege of that irregular kind which caused the destruction of so many baronial residences during the course of those unhappy wars. Martindale Castle, after having suffered severely from the cannon which Cromwell himself brought against it, was at length surrendered when in the last extremity. Sir Geoffrey himself became a prisoner, and while his liberty was only restored upon a promise of remaining a peaceful subject to the Commonwealth in future, his former delinquencies, as they were termed by the ruling party, were severely punished by fine and sequestration.

But neither his forced promise, nor the fear of farther unpleasant consequences to his person or property, could prevent Peveril of the Peak from joining the gallant Earl of Derby the night before the fatal engagement in Wiggan-lane, where the Earl's forces were dispersed. Sir Geoffrey having had his share in that action, escaped with the relics of the royalists after the defeat, to join Charles II. He witnessed also the final defeat of Worcester, where he was a second time made prisoner; and, as in the opinion of Cromwell and the language of the times, he was regarded as an obstinate malignant, he was in great danger of having shared with the Earl of Derby his execution at Bolton-le-Moor, having partaken with him the dangers of two actions. But Sir Geoffrey's life was preserved by the interest of a friend, who possessed influence in the councils of Oliver. This was a Mr. Bridgenorth, a gentleman of middling quality, whose father had been successful in some commercial adventure during the peaceful reign of James I.; and who had bequeathed his son a considerable sum of money, in addition to the moderate patrimony which he inherited from his father.

The substantial, though small-sized brick building of Moultrassie Hall, was but two miles distant from Martindale Castle, and the young Bridgenorth attended the same school with the heir of the Peverils. A sort of companionship, if not intimacy, took place betwixt them, which continued during their youthful sports—the rather that Bridgenorth, though he did not at heart admit Sir Geoffrey's claims of superiority to the extent which the other's vanity would have exacted, paid deference in a reasonable degree to the representative of a family so much more ancient and important than his own, without conceiving that he in any respect degraded himself by doing so.

Mr. Bridgenorth did not, however, carry his complaisance so far as to embrace Sir Geoffrey's side during the Civil War. On the contrary, as an active Justice of the Peace, he rendered much assistance in arraying the militia in the cause of the Parliament, and for some time held a military commission in that service. This was partly owing to his religious principles, for he was a zealous Presbyterian, partly to his political ideas, which, without being absolutely democratical, favoured the popular side of the great national question. Besides, he was a moneyed man, and to a certain extent had a shrewd eye to his worldly interest. He understood how to improve the opportunities which civil war afforded, of advancing his fortune, by a dexterous use of his capital; and he was not at a loss to perceive that these were likely to be obtained by joining the Parliament; while the King's cause, as it was managed, held out nothing to the wealthy but a course of exaction and compulsory loans. For these reasons, Bridgenorth became a decided Roundhead, and all friendly communication betwixt his neighbour and him was abruptly broken asunder. This was done with the less acrimony, that during the Civil War, Sir Geoffrey was almost constantly in the field, following the vacillating and unhappy fortunes of his master; while Major Bridgenorth, who soon renounced active military service, resided chiefly in London, and only occasionally visited the Hall.

Upon these visits, it was with great pleasure he received the intelligence, that Lady Peveril had shown much kindness to Mrs. Bridgenorth, and had actually given her and her family shelter in Martindale Castle, when Moultrassie Hall was threatened with pillage by a body of Prince Rupert's ill-disciplined Cavaliers. This acquaintance had been matured by frequent walks together, which the vicinity of their places of residence suffered the Lady Peveril to have with Mrs. Bridgenorth, who deemed herself much honoured in being thus admitted into the society of so distinguished a lady. Major Bridgenorth heard of this growing intimacy with great pleasure, and he determined to repay the obligation, as far as he could without much hurt to himself, by interfering with all his influence, in behalf of her unfortunate husband. It was chiefly owing to Major Bridgenorth's mediation, that Sir Geoffrey's life was saved after the battle of Worcester. He obtained him permission to compound for his estate on easier terms than many who had been less obstinate in malignancy; and, finally, when, in order to raise the money to the composition, the Knight was obliged to sell a considerable portion of his patrimony, Major Bridgenorth became the purchaser, and that at a larger price than had been paid to any Cavalier under such circumstances, by a member of the Committee for Sequestrations. It is true, the prudent committeeman did not, by any means, lose sight of his own interest in the transaction, for the price was, after all, very moderate, and the property lay adjacent to Moultrassie Hall, the value of which was at least trebled by the acquisition. But then it was also true, that the unfortunate owner must have submitted to much worse conditions, had the committeeman used, as others did, the full advantages which his situation gave him; and Bridgenorth took credit to himself, and received it from others, for having, on this occasion, fairly sacrificed his interest to his liberality.

Sir Geoffrey Peveril was of the same opinion, and the rather that Mr. Bridgenorth seemed to bear his exaltation with great moderation, and was disposed to show him personally the same deference in his present sunshine of prosperity, which he had exhibited formerly in their early acquaintance. It is but justice to Major Bridgenorth to observe, that in this conduct he paid respect as much to the misfortunes as to the pretensions of his far-descended neighbour, and that, with the frank generosity of a blunt Englishman, he conceded points of ceremony, about which he himself was indifferent, merely because he saw that his doing so gave pleasure to Sir Geoffrey.

Peveril of the Peak did justice to his neighbour's delicacy, in consideration of which he forgot many things. He forgot that Major Bridgenorth was already in possession of a fair third of his estate, and had various pecuniary claims affecting the remainder, to the extent of one-third more. He endeavoured even to forget, what it was still more difficult not to remember, the altered situation in which they and their mansions now stood to each other.

Before the Civil War, the superb battlemented turrets of Martindale Castle looked down on a brick-built Hall, as it stole out from the green tations, just as an oak in Martindale Chase have looked beside one of the stunted and young beech-trees with which Bridgenorth had ceded his avenue; but after the siege which was commemorated, the enlarged and augmented was as much predominant in the landscape as shattered and blackened ruins of the Castle, of only one wing was left habitable, as the young beech, in all its vigour of shoot and bud, would be to the same aged oak stripped of its boughs, rifted by lightning, one half laid in shivers on ground, and the other remaining a black, ungraceful trunk, rent and splintered, and without either life or leaves. Sir Geoffrey could not be that the situation and prospects of the two hours were exchanged as disadvantageously for self as the appearance of their mansions; and though the authority of the man in office and Parliament, the sequestrator, and the committee had been only exerted for the protection of the lier and the malignant, they would have been actual if applied to procure his utter ruin; and he was become a client, while his neighbour was turned into a patron.

There were two considerations, besides the severity of the case and the constant advice of his wife, which enabled Peveril of the Peak to endure some patience, this state of degradation. The first was, that the politics of Major Bridgenorth were on many points, to assimilate themselves to his own. As a Presbyterian, he was not an utter enemy to monarchy, and had been considerably shocked at the unexpected trial and execution of the King; as a civilian and a man of property, he feared the domination of the military; and though he would not see Charles restored by force of arms, yet he arrived at the conclusion, that to bring back the royal family on such terms of composition might ensure the protection of those popular liberties and privileges for which the Long Parliament had at first contended, would be the surest and most desirable termination to the mutations in state which had agitated Britain. Indeed, the Major's ideas on this point approached so nearly those of his neighbour, that he had well-nigh suffered Sir Geoffrey to have a finger in almost all the conspiracies of the Royalists, to involve him in the unfortunate rising of Penruddock and Groves in the year 1655, which many of the Presbyterian interest, as well as the Cavalier party, were engaged. And though habitual prudence eventually kept him out of and other dangers, Major Bridgenorth was content during the last years of Cromwell's domination, the interregnum which succeeded, as a disinterested person to the Commonwealth, and a favourer of Charles Stewart.

But besides this approximation to the same political opinions, another bond of intimacy united the families of the Castle and the Hall. Major Bridgenorth, fortunate, and eminently so, in all his transactions, was visited by severe and repeated misfortunes in his family, and became, in this particular, an object of compassion to his poorer and more decayed neighbour. Betwixt the break-out of the Civil War and the Restoration, he successively a family of no less than six children, apparently through a delicacy of constitution, cut off the little prattlers at the early age when they must wind themselves around the heart of their parents.

In the beginning of the year 1653, Major Bridgenorth was childless; ere it ended, he had a daughter, indeed, but her birth was purchased by the death of an affectionate wife, whose constitution had been exhausted by maternal grief, and by the anxious and harrowing reflection, that from her the children had lost derived that delicacy of health, which rendered them unable to undergo the tear and wear of existence. The same voice which told Bridgenorth that he had no father of a living child, (it was the friendly voice of Lady Peveril,) communicated to him the melan-

e that he was no longer a husband. The Major Bridgenorth were strong and deep, hasty and vehement; and his grief assumed a sullen stupor, from which neither the monstrosities of Sir Geoffrey, who did not visit his neighbour at this distressing convention though he knew he must meet the an pastor, nor the ghostly exhortations of person, were able to rouse the unfortunate detaining the reader's attention longer painful theme, it is enough to say that the Peveril did undertake the duties of a mother orphan; and perhaps it was owing, in a sure, to her judicious treatment of the infant its feeble hold of life was preserved, since every spark might probably have been altogether, had it, like the Major's former child, gone the over-care and over-nursing of a dered nervously cautious and anxious by successive losses. The lady was the more ready to this charge, that she herself had lost two dren; and that she attributed the preservation third, now a fine healthy child of three to Julian's being subjected to rather a disuse of diet and treatment than was then practised. She resolved to follow the same with the little orphan, which she had observed the case of her own boy; and it was equally

By a more sparing use of medicine, by admission of fresh air, by a firm, yet cautious to encourage rather than to supersede the of nature, the puny infant, under the careful nurse, gradually improved in strength and health.

He, like most men of his frank and good-disposition, was naturally fond of children, much compassionated the sorrows of his, that he entirely forgot his being a Presbyterian until it became necessary that the infant christened by a teacher of that persuasion. It was a trying case—the father seemed incapable of direction; and that the threshold of the Castle should be violated by the heretical dissenting clergyman, was matter of horror to the orthodox owner. He had seen the famous Peverils, with a Bible in one hand and a pistol in the other, ride in triumph through the court-door of Martindale was surrendered; and the bitter-sweet hour had entered like iron into his soul.

Yet such was Lady Peveril's influence over the prejudices of her husband, that he was induced to condescend to the ceremony taking place in a remote garden-house, which was not properly within the precincts of the Castle-wall. The lady even dared to be present while the ceremony was performed by the reverend Master Solsgrace, who had once preached a sermon of three hours length before the House of Commons, upon a thanksgiving occasion after the relief of Exeter. Sir Geoffrey Peveril took care to be absent the whole day from the Castle, and it was only from the great interest which he took in the washing, perfuming, and as it were purification of the summer-house, that it could have been guessed he knew any thing of what had taken place in it.

But, whatever prejudices the good Knight might entertain against his neighbour's form of religion, they did not in any way influence his feelings towards him as a sufferer under severe affliction. The mode in which he showed his sympathy was rather singular, but exactly suited the character of both, and the terms on which they stood with each other.

Morning after morning the good Baronet made Moultrasie Hall the termination of his walk or ride, and said a single word of kindness as he passed. Sometimes he entered the old parlour where the proprietor sat in solitary wretchedness and despondency—but more frequently, (for Sir Geoffrey did not pretend to great talents of conversation,) he paused on the terrace, and stopping or halting his horse by the latticed window, said aloud to the melancholy inmate, "How is it with you, Master Bridgenorth?" (the Knight would never acknowledge his neighbour's military rank of Major;) "I just looked in to bid you keep a good heart, man, and to tell you that Julian is well, and little Alice is well, and all are well at Martindale Castle."

A deep sigh, sometimes coupled with "I thank you, Sir Geoffrey; my grateful duty waits on Lady Peveril," was generally Bridgenorth's only answer. But the news was received on the one part with the kindness which was designed upon the other; it gradually became less painful and more interesting; the lattice window was never closed, nor was the leathern easy-chair which stood next to it, ever empty, when the usual hour of the Baronet's momentary visit approached. At length the expectation of that passing minute became the pivot upon which the thoughts of poor Bridgenorth turned during all the rest of the day. Most men have known the influence of such brief but ruling moments at some period of their lives. The moment when a lover passes the window of his mistress—the moment when the epicure hears the dinner-bell, is that into which is crowded the whole interest of the day—the hours which precede it are spent in anticipation; the hours which follow, in reflection on what has passed; and fancy dwelling on each brief circumstance, gives to seconds the duration of minutes, to minutes that of hours. Thus seated in his lonely chair, Bridgenorth could catch at a distance the stately step of Sir Geoffrey, or the heavy tramp of his war-horse, Black Hastings, which had borne him in many an action; he could hear the hum of "The King shall enjoy his own again," or the habitual whistle of "Cuckolds and Roundheads," die into the reverential silence, as the Knight approached the mansion of affliction; and then came the strong hale voice of the huntsman-soldier with its usual greeting.

By degrees the communication became something more protracted, as Major Bridgenorth's grief, like all human feelings, lost its overwhelming violence, and permitted him to attend, in some degree, to what passed around him, to discharge various duties which pressed upon him, and to give a share of attention to the situation of the country, distracted as it was by the contending factions whose strife only terminated in the Restoration. Still, however, though slowly recovering from the effects of the shock which he had sustained, Major Bridgenorth felt himself as yet unable to make up his mind to the effort necessary to see his infant; and though separated by so short a distance from the being in whose existence he was more interested than in any thing the world afforded, he only made himself acquainted with the windows of the apartment where little Alice was lodged, and was often observed to watch them from the terrace, as they brightened in the evening under the influence of the setting sun. In truth, though a strong-minded man in most respects, he was unable to lay aside the gloomy impression that this remaining pledge of affection was soon to be conveyed to that grave which had already devoured all besides that was dear to him; and he awaited in miserable suspense the moment when he should hear that symptoms of the fatal malady had begun to show themselves.

The voice of Peveril continued to be that of a comforter, until the month of April, 1660, when it suddenly assumed a new and different tone. "The King shall enjoy his own again," far from ceasing, as the hasty tread of Black Hastings came up the avenue, bore burden to the clatter of his hoofs on the paved courtyard, as Sir Geoffrey sprang from his great war-saddle, now once more garnished with pistols of two feet in length, and, armed with steel-cap, back and breast, and a truncheon in his hand, he rushed into the apartment of the astonished Major, with his eyes sparkling, and his cheek inflamed, while he called out, "Up! up, neighbour! No time now to mope in the chimney-corner! Where is your buff-coat and broadsword, man? Take the true side once in your life, and mend past mistakes. The King is all lenity, man—all royal nature and mercy. I will get your full pardon."

"What means all this?" said Bridgenorth—"Is all well with you—all well at Martindale Castle, Sir Geoffrey?"

"Well as you could wish them, Alice and Julian and all. But I have news worth twenty of that—Monk has declared at London against those stinking scoundrels the Rump. Fairfax is up in Yorkshire—for the King—for the King, man! Churchmen, Presbyterians, and all, are in buff and bandolier for King Charles. I have a letter from Fairfax to secure Derby and Chesterfield, with all the men I can make. D—n him, fine that I should take orders from him! But never mind that—all are friends now, and you and I, good neighbour, will charge abreast, as good neighbours should. See there! read—read—read—and then boot and saddle in an instant.

Hey for cavaliers—ho for cavaliers,
Pray for cavaliers,
Dub-a-dub, dub-a-dub,
Have at old Be-lzebub,
Oliver shakes in his bier!"

After thundering forth this elegant effusion of loyal enthusiasm, the sturdy Cavalier's heart became too full. He threw himself on a seat, and exclaiming, "Did ever I think to live to see this happy day!" he wept to his own surprise, as much as to that of Bridgenorth.

Upon considering the crisis in which the country was placed, it appeared to Major Bridgenorth, as it had done to Fairfax, and other leaders of the Presbyterian party, that their frank embracing of the royal interest was the wisest and most patriotic measure which they could adopt in the circumstances, when all ranks and classes of men were seeking refuge from the uncertainty and varied oppression attending the repeated contests between the factions of Westminster Hall and of Wallingford House. Accordingly, he joined with Sir Geoffrey, with less enthusiasm indeed, but with equal sincerity, taking such measures as seemed proper to secure their part of the country on the King's behalf, which was done as effectually and peaceably as in other parts of England. The neighbours were both at Chesterfield, when news arrived that the King had landed in England; and Sir Geoffrey instantly announced his purpose of waiting upon his Majesty, even before his return to the castle of Martindale.

"Who knows, neighbour," he said, "whether Sir Geoffrey Peveril will ever return to Martindale? Titles must be going amongst them yonder, and I have deserved something among the rest.—Lord Peveril would sound well—or stay, Earl of Martindale—no, not of Martindale—Earl of the Peak.—Meanwhile, trust your affairs to me—I will see you secured—I would you had been no Presbyterian, neighbour-knighthood,—I mean a knight-bachelor, not a knight baronet,—would have served your turn well."

"I leave those things to my betters, Sir Geoffrey," said the Major, "and desire nothing so earnestly to find all well at Martindale when I return."

"You will—you will find them all well," said the Baronet; "Julian, Alice, Lady Peveril, and all them—Bear my commendations to them, and bid them all, neighbour, Lady Peveril and all—yourself kiss a Countess when I come back; all will go well with you now you are turned honest man."

"I always meant to be so, Sir Geoffrey," said Bridgenorth, calmly.

"Well, well, well—no offence meant," said the Knight, "all is well now—so you to Martindale Hall, and I to Whitehall. Said I well, ah! Sir, mine host, a stoup of Canary to the King's health ere we get to horse—I forgot, neighbour—your no healths."

"I wish the King's health as sincerely as if I had a gallon to it," replied the Major; "and I wish, Sir Geoffrey, all success on your journey, and a safe return."

CHAPTER II.

Why then, we will have bellowing of beeves,
Broaching of barrels, brandishing of spigots;
Blood shall flow freely, but it shall be gore
Of herds and flocks, and venison and poultry.
Join'd to the brave heart's-blood of John-a-Barbarous.

WHATEVER rewards Charles might have descended to bestow in acknowledgment of the services and loyalty of Peveril of the Peak, he was in his disposal equal to the pleasure which Providence had reserved for Bridgenorth on his return to Derbyshire. The exertion to which he had been summoned, had had the usual effect of restoring to a certain extent the activity and energy of his character, and he felt it would be unbecoming to relapse into the state of lethargic melancholy from which it had roused him. Time also had its usual effect in mitigating the subjects of his regret; and when he had passed one day at the Hall, in regretting that he could not expect the indirect news of his daughter's health which Sir Geoffrey used to communicate in his daily call, he reflected that it would be in every respect becoming that he should pay a personal visit to Martindale Castle, carry thither the remembrance of the knight to his lady, assure her of his health and satisfy himself respecting that of his daughter. He armed himself for the worst—he called to his reflection the thin cheeks, faded eye, wasted hand, and lid lip, which had marked the decaying health of his former infant.

"I shall see," he said, "these signs of mortality once more—I shall once more see a beloved being whom I have given birth, gliding to the grave which ought to enclose me long before her. No matter is unmanly so long to shrink from that which shall be—God's will be done!"

He went accordingly, on the subsequent morning to Martindale Castle, and gave the lady the welcome assurances of her husband's safety, and of his love and preferment.

"For the first, may Almighty God be praised," said the Lady Peveril; "and be the other as our gracious and restored sovereign may will it. We are great enough for our means, and have means sufficient for contentment, though not for splendour. And now I see, good Master Bridgenorth, the fallacy of putting faith in idle presentiments of evil. So I had Sir Geoffrey's repeated attempts in favour of the Stuarts led him into new misfortunes, that the other morning, I saw him once more dress in his fatal armour, and heard the sound of his trumpet which had been so long silent, it seemed to me as if I saw his shroud, and heard his death-knell. I say this to you, good neighbour, the rather because I fear your own mind has been harassed with imaginations of impending calamity, which it may be God to avert in your case as it has done in door of the apartment opened as she spoke, so lovely children entered. The eldest, Julian, a fine boy betwixt four and five years old, in his hand, with an air of dignified support and grace, a little girl of eighteen months, who rolled along, keeping herself with difficulty by the assistance of her elder, stronger, and more companion.

Bridgenorth cast a hasty and fearful glance upon the countenance of his daughter, and, even in that moment, perceived, with exquisite delight, that his fears were unfounded. He caught her in his arms, pressed her to his heart, and the child, though at first startled at the vehemence of his caresses, presently, prompted by nature, smiled in reply to them. He held her at some distance from him, and looked at her more attentively; he satisfied himself of the complexion of the young cherub he had in his arms; it was not the hectic tinge of disease, but the glow of ruddy health; and that, though her little hands were slight, it was firm and springy.

"I do not think that it could have been thus," he said, looking to Lady Peveril, who had sat observing him with great pleasure; "but praise be to God for the first instance, and next, thanks to you, madam, you have been his instrument."

"An infant must lose his playfellow now, I suppose?" said the lady; "but the Hall is not distant, and I will give him a little charge often. Dame Martha, the housekeeper at Moultrassie, has sense, and is careful. I will show her the rules I have observed with little Alice,

"I forbid my girl should ever come to Moultrassie," said Major Bridgenorth, hastily; "it has been the grave of her race. The air of the lowlands is not suited to them—or there is perhaps a fatal influence connected with the mansion. I will seek for her another place of abode."

"But you shall not, under your favour be it said," Major Bridgenorth, answered the lady. "If she do so, we must suppose that you are under my qualities as a nurse. If she goes not to her mother's house, she shall not quit mine. I will take the little lady as a pledge of her safety and my own; and since you are afraid of the damp of the grounds, I hope you will come here frequently to see her."

It was a proposal which went to the heart of Major Bridgenorth. It was precisely the point which he had longed to arrive at, but which he had no chance of attaining.

It was well known, that those whose families are ruined by such a fatal disease as existed in his, it may be said, superstitious respecting its effects, and ascribe to place, circumstance, and hereditary care, much more perhaps than these can really contribute to avert the fatality of constitutional distemper. Lady Peveril was aware that it was peculiarly the impression of her neighbour; the depression of his spirits, the excess of his nervous feverishness of his apprehensions, the restlessness and gloom of the solitude in which he dwelt, were really calculated to produce the evil which he so much dreaded. She pitied him, she felt for him; he was grateful for former protection received from her hands—she had become interested in the child. What female fails to feel such interest in the creature she has tended? And to sum the matter up, the dame had a share of human vanity; being a sort of Lady Bountiful in her way, (for her character was not then confined to the old and foolish,) she was proud of the skill by which she averted the probable attacks of hereditary malady, and her share in the family of Bridgenorth. It needed no other reasons, in other cases, that so many reasons might be assigned for an act of neighbourly kindness; but civil war had so lately torn the country, and broken all the usual ties of vicinage and neighbourhood, that it was unusual to see reserved among persons of different political views. Bridgenorth himself felt this; and while the tear of joy in his eye showed how gladly he would accept Lady Peveril's proposal, he could not help stating the obvious inconveniences attendant upon her scheme, though it was in the tone of one who would gladly hear them overruled. "Madam," he said, "your kindness makes me the happiest and most thankful of men; but can it be consistent with your own convenience? Sir Geoffrey has his opinions on many points, which have differed, and probably do still differ, from mine. He is high-born, and I of middling parentage only. He uses the Church Service, and I the Catechism of the Assembly of Divines at Westminster."

"I hope you will find prescribed in neither of them," said the Lady Peveril, "that I may not be a mother to your motherless child. I trust, Master Bridgenorth, the joyful Restoration of his Majesty, a work wrought by the direct hand of Providence, may be the means of closing and healing all civil and religious dissensions among us, and that, instead of showing the superior purity of our faith, by persecuting those who think otherwise from ourselves on doctrinal points, we shall endeavour to show its real Christian tendency, by emulating each other in actions of good-will towards man, as the best way of showing our love to God."

"Your Ladyship speaks what your own kind heart dictates," answered Bridgenorth, who had his own share of the narrow-mindedness of the time; "and sure am I, that if all who call themselves loyalists and cavaliers, thought like you—and like my friend Sir Geoffrey,"—(this he added after a moment's pause, being perhaps rather complimentary than sincere)—"we, who thought it our duty in time past to take arms for freedom of conscience, and against arbitrary power, might now sit down in peace and contentment. But I wot not how it may fall. You have sharp and hot spirits amongst you; I will not say our power was always moderately used, and revenge is sweet to the race of fallen Adam."

"Come, Master Bridgenorth," said the Lady Peveril, gayly, "these evil omens do but point out conclusions, which, unless they were so anticipated, are most unlikely to come to pass. You know what Shakspeare says:—

'To fly the boar before the boar pursues,
Were to incense the boar to follow us,
And make pursuit when he did mean no chase.

But I crave your pardon—it is so long since we have met, that I forgot you love no playbooks."

"With reverence to your ladyship," said Bridgenorth, "I were much to blame did I need the idle words of a Warwickshire stroller, to teach me my grateful duty to your ladyship on this occasion, which appoints me to be directed by you in all things which my conscience will permit."

"Since you allow me such influence, then," replied the Lady Peveril, "I shall be moderate in exercising it, in order that I may, in my domination at least, give you a favourable impression of the new order of things. So, if you will be a subject of mine for one day, neighbour, I am going, at my lord and husband's command, to issue out my warrants to invite the whole neighbourhood to a solemn feast at the Castle, on Thursday next; and I not only pray you to be personally present yourself, but to prevail on your worthy pastor, and such neighbours and friends, high and low, as may think in your own way, to meet with the rest of the neighbourhood, to rejoice on this joyful occasion of the King's Restoration, and thereby to show that we are to be henceforward a united people."

The parliamentary Major was considerably embarrassed by this proposal. He looked upwards and downwards and around, cast his eye first to the oak-carved ceiling, and anon fixed it upon the floor; then threw it around the room till it lighted on his child, the sight of whom suggested another and a better train of reflections than ceiling and floor had been able to supply.

"Madam," he said, "I have long been a stranger to festivity, perhaps from constitutional melancholy, perhaps from the depression which is natural to a desolate and deprived man, in whose ear mirth is marred, like a pleasant air when performed on a mis-ness instrument. But though neither my thoughts nor temperament are jovial or Marsial, it becomes me to be grateful to Heaven for the good he has sent me by the means of your ladyship. David, the man after God's own heart, did wash and eat bread when his beloved child was removed—mine is restored to me, and shall I not show gratitude under a blessing when he showed resignation under an affliction? Madam, I will wait on your gracious invitation with acceptance; and each of my friends with whom I may possess influence, and whose presence your ladyship may desire, shall accompany me to the festivity, that our Israel may be as one people.

Having spoken these words with an aspect which belonged more to a martyr than to a guest hidden to a festival, and having kissed, and solemnly blessed his little girl, Major Bridgenorth took his departure for Moultrie Hall.

CHAPTER III.

Heaven's neither want of appetite nor wealth,
For Heaven we be not content of meat or cloth.

Old Play.

Even upon ordinary occasions, and where means were ample, a great entertainment in those days was not such a sinecure as in modern times, when the lady who presides has but to intimate to her menials the day and hour when she wills it to take place. At that simple period, the lady was expected to enter deeply into the arrangement and provision of the whole affair, and from a little gallery, which communicated with her own private apartment, and looked down upon the kitchen, her shrill voice was to be heard, from time to time, like that of the warning spirit in a tempest, rising above the clash of pots and stew-pens—the creaking of spits—the clattering of marrow-bones and cleavers—the scolding of cooks—and all the other various kinds of din which form an accompaniment to dressing a large dinner.

But all this toil and anxiety was more than doubled in the case of the approaching feast at Martindale Castle, where the presiding Genius of the festivity was scarce provided with adequate means to carry her hospitable purpose into effect. The tyrannical conduct of husbands, in such cases, is universal, and I scarce know one householder of my acquaintance who has not, on some ill-omened and most inconvenient evening, announced suddenly to his innocent helpmate, that he had invited to the great discomposure of the lady, and the discredit, perhaps, of her domestic arrangements.

"Some where Major Bark.
To drop in at six o'clock."

Feveril of the Peak was still more thoughtless; for he had directed his lady to invite the whole honest men of the neighbourhood to make good cheer at Martindale Castle, in honour of the blessed Restoration of his most sacred Majesty, without precisely explaining where the provisions were to come from. The deer-park had lain waste ever since the war; the dovecot could do little to furnish forth such an entertainment; the fish-ponds, it is true, were well provided, (which the neighbouring Presbyterians noted as a suspicious circumstance,) and game was to be had for the shooting, upon the extensive heaths and hills of Dechylure. But these were only the secondary parts of a banquet; and the house-steward and bailiff, Lady Feveril's only coadjutors and counsellors, could not agree how the butcher-meat—the most substantial part, or, as it were, the main body of the entertainment—was to be supplied. The house-steward threatened the sacrifice of a fine yoke of young bullocks, which the bailiff, who pleaded the necessity of their agricultural services, tenaciously resisted; and Lady Feveril's good and dutiful nature did not prevent her from making some impatient reflections on the want of consideration of her absent Knight, who had thus thoughtlessly placed her in so embarrassing a situation.

These reflections were scarcely just, if a man is only responsible for such resolutions as he adopts when he is fully master of himself. Sir Geoffrey's loyalty, like that of many others in his age, had, by dint of hopes and fears, vicissitudes of struggles and sufferings, all arising out of a moving cause, and turning, as it were, on a pivot, acquired the character of an intense and passionate passion; and the singular and change of fortune, by which his highest hopes were not only gratified, but far exceeded, was some time a kind of intoxication, which seemed to pervade the whole of his life. Geoffrey had seen Charles and his brothers been received by the merry monarch as a joyful, and at the same time frank, urban he conciliated all who approached him. His services and merits had been fully acknowledged, and recompense had been hinted at, as a promise. Was it for Feveril of the Peak to be able of his spirit to consider how to find beef and mutton to feast his guests?

Luckily however for the embarrassed and excited some one who had composed of ancient to foresee this difficulty. Just as he was up her mind, very reluctantly, to become Major Bridgenorth for the same necessary of husband's commands into effect, and with a bitterly regretting the departure from her of her usual economy the steward, who had not been absolutely sober since the King's landing at Dover, burst in, almost snapping his fingers, and showing signs of delight than was quite consistent with the of my lady's large parlour.

"What means this, Whitaker?" said the somewhat peevish, for she was interrupted comment of a letter to her neighbour's unpleasant business of the proposed letter to be always thus with you?—Are you drunk?"

"A vision of good omen I trust," said the man with a triumphant flourish of the hand, "than Pharaoh's, though, like him, it be a little late."

"I prithee be plain, man," said the lady, "some one who can speak to purpose."

"Why, mids my life, madam," said the man, "mids errand can speak for itself. Do you see them low? Do you not hear them bleat? Of fat oxen and half a score prime wethers, cattle is yet allied for this bout, let them when they will, and Gatherdill may have his Mains ploughed to the boot."

The lady without farther questioning her domestic, rose and went to the window, and certainly beheld the oxen and sheep which lay near to Whitaker's exultation. "Whence come you, and what is your purpose?"

"Let them construe that who can," said Whitaker. "The fellow who drove them was a countryman and I said they came from the help to furnish the ladyship's entertainments. The man would not stay to drink—I am sorry would not say to drink. I crave your ladyship's pardon for not keeping him by the care to drink—no my fault."

"That I have sworn it was not," said the lady. "Nay, mids my life, I assure you it was not," said the steward, "for rather than the should lose credit, I drank his health myself, though I had not my morning draught. I tell you the steward is my lady, by the way."

"It was a great commission, I suppose," said the lady; "but Whitaker, suppose you should have joy on occasion as drinking and eating little less than a little more, would it not as well, thank you?"

"I crave your ladyship's pardon," said Whitaker with much reverence. "I hope I know my place as your ladyship's poor servant; and I know not become a drunk and swear like a sailor ship—that is like his honour, Sir Geoffrey, I say. But I pray you, I am not to drink and eat after my duty. How are men to know Feveril of the Peak's steward, and I may say, butler too, who have had the keys of the cellar ever since and was shot dead on the north-west turret, with a Jack in his hand. I say, how is an old Cavalier he knows from these crotchety Roundheads nothing but fast and pray, if we are not to end swear according to our degree?"

Lady was silent, for she well knew speech is nothing, and after a moment's pause, got to muttering to the steward that she would like the persons, whose names were marked in a paper, which she delivered to him, invited to preaching banquet.

Later, instead of receiving the list with the appearance of a modern Major Domo, carried the robes of one of the windows, and adjusted spectacles, began to read it to himself. The names being those of distinguished Cavalier families in the neighbourhood, he muttered over in a disapprobation, pointed and pshawed at that of North, yet acquiesced with the observation, he is a good neighbour, so it may pass for

But when he read the name and surname of such Solengrook, the Presbyterian parson, Whittaker altogether forsook him, and he do be would as soon throw himself into Fidon, as consent that the intrusive old parson, who had usurped the pulpit of a sound orthodox, should ever darken the gates of Marston-Path. By any message or mediation of his into crop-eared hypocrites, cried he, with a oath, "have had their turn of the good weather, it is on our side of the hedge now, and we will old scores, as sure as my name is Richard Lee!"

"I presume on your long services, Whittaker, your master's absence, or you had not dared thus," said the lady.

Unwonted agitation of her voice attracted the eye of the refractory steward, notwithstanding present state of elevation, but he no longer gave his eye glanced, and her cheek reddened, than a tinsy was at once subdued.

"Intrusion on me," he said, "but I have made my duty in good earnest, and that is an unwelcome word to me. I crave your pardon, my lady."

Spoke Dick Whittaker disputed your honourable ends, but only that second draught of double ale we put a double stroke of malt to it, as your la-well knows, ever since the happy Restoration, sure I have a fanatic as I do the cloven foot of a but then your honourable ladyship hath a to invite Satan himself, cloven foot and all, to Castle Castle, and so send me to hell's gate with a of invitation, and so your will shall be done.

Invitations were sent round accordingly in all arms, and one of the bullocks was sent down to meet whole at the market place of a little village, Affordale Moulton, which stood round the castle, the command both of the Castle and Hall which it took its double name, at about an equal from both, so that suppose a him drawn, his one master house to the other to be the battle, the village would have occupied the struggle. As the said village, since the late transfer of a part of Peveril's property, belonged to Geoffrey and to Bridgenorth, in nearly equal parts, the lady judged it not proper to dispute the right to either, to add some hogsheds of beer to the profusion.

In the meanwhile, she could not but suspect the of being the unknown friend who had relieved her of the dilemma arising from the want of privacy, and she esteemed herself happy when a visit him, on the day preceding the proposed entertainment, gave her, as she thought, an opportunity of doing her gratitude.

CHAPTER IV.

See, and I will not pledge—I'm one of those who think great wine ought to be kept in the cellar, and not in the kitchen. If you doubt my word, I'll drink to you, and see if I will shake you.—OLD FOGY.

There was a serious gravity of expression in the motion with which Major Bridgenorth replied to the oath supposed to be unbecomingly one of the crew of the Peak.

so the thanks tendered to him by Lady Peveril, for the supply of provisions which had reached her Castle an opportunity. He seemed first not to be aware what she alluded to, and when she explained the circumstance, he protested so seriously that he had no share in the benefit conferred, that Lady Peveril was compelled to believe him, the rather that, being a man of a plain downright character, offering no refined delicacy of sentiment, and practising almost a quaker like severity of expression, it would have been much contrary to his general character to have made such a disavowal, unless it were founded in truth.

"My present visit to you, madam," said he, "had almost some reference to the festivity of to-morrow." Lady Peveril listened but as her visitor seemed to find some difficulty in expressing himself, she was compelled to ask an explanation. "Madam," said he, "you are not perhaps entirely ignorant that the more tender-conscience among us have scruples at certain practices, as general amongst your circle at times of ~~convivial~~ that you may be said to rest upon them as articles of faith, or at least greatly to resent their omission."

"I trust, Master Bridgenorth," said the Lady Peveril, not fully comprehending the drift of his discourse, "that we shall, as your entertainment, carefully avoid all allusions or reproaches founded on past misunderstandings."

"We would expect no less, madam, from your candour and courtesy," said Bridgenorth; "but I perceive you do not fully understand me. To be plain, then, I allude to the fashion of drinking healths, and pledging each other in draughts of strong liquor, which most among us consider as a superfluous and sinful prodding of each other to debauchery, and the excessive use of strong drink, and which, besides, as decried, as learned divines have supposed, from the custom of the heathen Pagans, who made libations and invoked idols when they drank, may be justly said to have something in it heathenish, and allied to demon worship."

The lady had already hastily considered all the errors which were likely to introduce discord into the proposed festivity, but this very ridiculous, yet fatal discrepancy, betwixt the manners of the parties on convivial occasions, had entirely escaped her. She endeavoured to soothe the objecting party, whose words were but like one who had fixed an opinion by which he was determined to abide.

"I grant," she said, "my good neighbour, that this custom is at least idle, and may be prejudicial if it leads to excess in the use of liquor which is apt enough to take place without such conversation. But I think, when it hath not this consequence, it is a thing indifferent, affords a unanimous mode of expressing our good wishes to our friends, and our loyal duty to our sovereign, and without meaning to put any force upon the inclination of those who believe otherwise, I cannot see how I can deny my guests and friends the privilege of drinking a health to the King, or to my husband, after the old English fashion."

"My lady," said the Major, "if the age of fashion were to command it Popery is one of the oldest English fashions that I have heard of. But as our happiness that we are not brought back to our fathers, and therefore we must set a value on being brought as we are, and not after their fashions. I had myself the honour to attend the late King, when, at the table of the 100 members of the Kingdom of Sweden, he did justice to the health of his Queen, Charles, thereby giving great offence, and putting in peril the whole purpose of that voyage, which it is not to be thought of wise men would have done but that he held such compliances a thing not more indifferent, but rather sinful and detestable."

"With all respect to Whittaker," said the Lady Peveril, "I continue of my own opinion, though Heaven knows, I am so frigid to riot or wanton, would soon accommodate myself to your scruples, and will discourage all other pledges, but surely those of the King and of Peveril of the Peak may be permitted?"

"I dare not," answered Bridgenorth, "lay even the ninety-ninth part of a grain of incense upon an altar erected to Satan."

"How is it," said the lady, "do you bring Satan into comparison with our master King Charles, and with my noble lord and husband?"

"Parkin mr., indeed," answered Bridgenorth, "I have no such thoughts—indeed they would all become mr. I do wish the King's health and Mr Geoffrey's devoutly, and I will pray for both. But I see not what good it should do their health if I should prejudice my own by quaffing pichers out of quart flasks."

"Since we cannot agree upon this matter," said Lady Peter, "we must find some resource by which to offend those of neither party. Suppose you winked at our friends drinking these pledges, and we should connive at your sitting still."

But would this composition satisfy Bridgenorth, who was of opinion, as he expressed himself, that it would be holding a candle to Baxterish. In fact, his temper, naturally stubborn, was at present rendered much more so by a previous conference with his preacher, who, though a very good man in the main, was particularly and liberally tenacious of the petty distinctions which his met adopted, and, while he thought with considerable apprehension on the accession of power which Popery, Prelacy, and Fervor of the Peak, were like to acquire by the late Revolution, became naturally anxious to put his flock on their guard, and prevent their being kidnapped by the wolf. He disliked extremely that Waver Bridgenorth, indisputably the head of the Pre-bytarian interest in that neighbourhood, should have given his only daughter to be, as he termed it, nursed by a Cap-pocritish woman; and he told him plainly that he liked not this going to feast in the high places with the uncircumcised in heart, and looked on the whole conviviality only as a making-merry in the house of Tiram.

Upon receiving this rebuke from his pastor, Bridgenorth began to suspect he might have been partly wrong in the readiness which in his first ardour of gratitude he had shown to enter into intimate intercourse with the Castle of Martindale; but he was too proud to show this to the preacher, and it was not till after a considerable debate between them, that it was mutually agreed their presence at the entertainment should depend upon the condition that no healths or pledges should be given in their presence. Bridgenorth therefore, as the delegate and representative of his party, was bound to stand firm against all entreaty, and the lady became greatly embarrassed. She now regretted sincerely that her well-intended invitation had ever been given, for she foresaw that its rejection was to awaken all former subjects of quarrel and perhaps to lead to new violence amongst people who had not many years since been engaged in civil war. To yield up the disputed point to the Presbyterians, would have been to offend the Cavalier party, and Sir Geoffrey in particular, in the most mortal degree, for they made it as firm a point of honour to give healths, and compel others to pledge them, as the Puritans made it a deep article of religion to refuse both. At length the lady changed the discourse, introduced that of Major Bridgenorth's child, caused it to be sent for, and put into his arms. The mother's stratagem took effect; for, though the parliamentary major stood firm, the father, as in the case of the Governor of Tilbury, was softened, and he agreed that his friends should accept a compromise. This was, that the Mayor himself, the reverend divine, and such of their friends as held strict Puritan tenets, should form a separate party in the Large Parlour, while the Hall should be occupied by the loyal Cavaliers; and that each party should regulate their potations after their own conscience, or after their own fashion.

Major Bridgenorth himself seemed greatly relieved after this important matter had been settled. He had held it matter of conscience to be stubborn in maintaining his own opinion, but was heartily glad when he escaped from the apparently inevitable necessity of affronting Lady Perrenil, by the refusal of her invitation. He remained longer than usual, and spoke and smiled more than was his custom. The first call on his return, was to announce to the gymnasium and his congregation the compromise of Sir had made, and this not as a matter of fact, but one upon which he had already spoken much was his authority among them, the zealous preacher longed in prominence a superior mind and to exclaim - "To your tents, O ye!" did not are the chance of being second-hand as would make it worth while to desert to a more acquiescence in their deluged stream.

Nevertheless, each party being put upon it by the consequences of Major Bindersham's so many points of doubt and delay commenced in earnest on that the Lady Peverel's person, perhaps, who was desirous of an effectual reconciliation between them, and reward for her good intentions the peace of factions, and had much reason to regret the usual project of bringing the Caplets and the girls of Ibbesham together on the same public society.

As it was now settled that the guests on two different parties, it became not only a dispute between themselves, which could be admitted within the Castle of Morinda and of various apprehension to Lady Percival. Rides north, lest if they were to appear on one as our and entrance a quarrel might ensue between them, and proceed to entertain them, they reached the place of entertainment. Believed she had discovered an admirable for preventing the possibility of such a result directing that the Cavaliers should be the principal entrance, while the Round entered the Castle through a great breach which had been made in the course of the siege and there had been since made a sort of breach the cattle down to their pasture. In the contrivance the Lady Percival imagined together avoided the various risks which came from two such parties encountering and disputing for precedence. Several other of less importance were adjusted at the and apparently as much to the satisfaction of the Presbyterian teacher that in a long time subject of the Marriage Ceremony he was able to explain to his hearers, that outward and used alone meant by that scriptural expression also a suitable frame of mind for enjoyment of festivity, and therefore he exhorted them that whatever might be the errors of the permanent, with whom they were to eat and drink upon the morrow, they ought this as soon to show any evil will against them they should therein become trouble to the land.

Honest Doctor Dummer, the special Vicar of Martindale cum Moulton, was the Cavalier on the same subject. He had the cure before the breaking out of the Revolution was in high favour with Sir Geoffrey, on account of his sound orthodoxy and deep but his exquisite skill in playing at bowls factions conversation over a pipe and October. For these a few accomplishments he had the honour to be recorded by old White amongst the roll of lewd, inconsecrate knaves of the Church of England dedicated to God and man, on account of the infamous art of playing at games of chance, and of occasionally joining in the meetings of these parties. When the ty began to lose ground, Doctor Dummer of courage, and, braving himself to the camp, upon several occasions when acting as Sir Geoffrey Peere's agent, that his presence included a stout and manly heart all was lost, and he himself, with many other vices, was deprived of his living, he made as he could, now working in the garret of in the University, who shared with him, and him, the slender means of livelihood which times had left them; and now oppressed and sequestered gentry, who read at once his character and sufferings. When restoration took place, Doctor Dummerar emerged from some one of his hiding-places, and hid himself in Martindale Castle, to enjoy the triumph inseparable from this happy change.

His appearance at the Castle in his full clerical and the warm reception which he received from the neighbouring gentry, added not a little to the which was gradually extending itself through the county which were so lately the uppermost. It is Doctor Dummerar framed (honest, worthy man) extravagant views of elevation or preferment; but the probability of his being replaced in the living, which he had been expelled under very flimsy pretences, inferred a severe blow to the Presbyterian, who could not be considered otherwise than an intruder. The interest of the two preachers, more, as well as the sentiments of their flocks, at direct variance; and here was another fatal blow in the way of Lady Peveril's scheme of a general and comprehensive healing ordinance.

Nevertheless, as we have already hinted, Doctor Dummerar behaved as handsomely upon the occasion as the Presbyterian incumbent had done. It is that in a sermon which he preached in the Castle to several of the most distinguished Cavaliers, besides a world of boys from the village, he went to see the novel circumstance of a parson in cassock and surplice, he went at great length to the foulness of the various crimes committed by the rebellious party during the late evil times, and he magnified the merciful and peaceful nature of the honourable lady of the Manor, who condescended to take upon, or receive into her house in the way of friendship and hospitality, men holding the principles which had led to the murder of the King—the slaying of his loyal subjects—and the plundering and breaking down of the Church of God. But when he ended all this handsomely up again, with the observation, that since it was the will of their gracious and restored Sovereign, and the pleasure of the world, that this contumacious and rebellious party should be, for a time, forborne by their faithful subjects, it would be highly proper that all the royal subjects should, for the present, eschew subjects of division or quarrel with these sons of Shimei; the lesson of patience he enforced by the comfortable assurance that they could not long abstain from those old rebellious practices; in which case, the rebels would stand excuplated before God and man, and be extirpating them from the face of the earth.

Close observers of the remarkable passages of our history from which we draw the events of our history have left it upon record, that these two several parties, much contrary, doubtless, to the intention of the worthy divines by whom they were delivered, had a greater effect in exasperating, than in composing the disputes betwixt the two factions. Under these evil auspices, and with corresponding forebodings on the mind of Lady Peveril, the day of festivity at last arrived.

Two different routes, and forming each a sort of procession, as if the adherents of each party were desirous of exhibiting its strength and numbers, the several factions approached Martindale Castle; so distinct did they appear in dress, aspect, and manners, that it seemed as if the revellers of a bridal party, and the sad attendants upon a funeral solemnity, were moving towards the same point from different quarters.

The puritanical party was by far the fewer in number for which two excellent reasons might be given. In the first place, they had enjoyed power for several years, and, of course, became unpopular among the common people, never at any time attached to those, being in the immediate possession of authority, often obliged to employ it in controlling their passions. Besides, the country people of England have, and still have, an animated attachment to field sports, and a natural unrestrained joviality of disposition, which rendered them impatient under the discipline of the fanatical preachers; while they were not less naturally discontented with the military despotism of Cromwell's Major-Generals. Secondly, the people were fickle as usual, and the return of the King had novelty in it, and was therefore popular. The side of the puritans was also deserted at this period by a numerous class of more thinking and prudential persons, who never forsook them till they became unfortunate. These sagacious personages were called in that age the Waiters upon Providence, and deemed it a high delinquency towards Heaven if they afforded countenance to any cause longer than it was favoured by fortune.

But, though thus forsaken by the fickle and the selfish, a solemn enthusiasm, a stern and determined depth of principle, a confidence in the sincerity of their own motives, and the manly English pride which inclined them to cling to their former opinions, like the traveller in the fable to his cloak, the more strongly that the tempest blew around them, detained in the ranks of the Puritans many, who, if no longer formidable from numbers, were still so from their character. They consisted chiefly of the middling gentry, with others whom industry or successful speculations in commerce or in mining had raised into eminence—the persons who feel most umbrage from the overshadowing aristocracy, and are usually the most vehement in defence of what they hold to be their rights. Their dress was in general studiously simple and unostentatious, or only remarkable by the contradictory affectation of extreme simplicity or carelessness. The dark colour of their cloaks, varying from absolute black to what was called sad-coloured,—their steeple-crowned hats, with their broad shadowy brims,—their long swords, suspended by a simple trap around the loins, without shoulder-belt, sword-knot, plate, buckles, or any of the other decorations with which the Cavaliers loved to adorn their trusty rapiers,—the shortness of their hair, which made their ears appear of disproportioned size,—above all, the stern and gloomy gravity of their looks, announced their belonging to that class of enthusiasts, who, resolute and undismayed, had cast down the former fabric of government, and who now regarded with somewhat more than suspicion, that which had been so unexpectedly substituted in its stead. There was gloom in their countenances; but it was not that of dejection, far less of despair. They looked like veterans after a defeat, which may have checked their career and wounded their pride, but has left their courage undiminished.

The melancholy, now became habitual, which overcast Major Bridgenorth's countenance, well qualified him to act as the chief of the group who now advanced from the village. When they reached the point by which they were first to turn aside into the wood which surrounded the Castle, they felt a momentary impression of degradation, as if they were yielding the high-road to their old and oft-defeated enemies the Cavaliers. When they began to ascend the winding path, which had been the daily passage of the cattle, the opening of the wooded glade gave them a view of the castle-ditch, half choked with the rubbish of the breach, and of the breach itself, which was made at the angle of a large square flanking-tower, one half of which had been battered into ruins, while the other fragment remained in a state strangely shattered and precarious, and seemed to be tottering above the huge aperture in the wall. A stern still smile was exchanged among the Puritans, as the sight reminded them of the victories of former days. Holdfast Clegg, a millwright of Derby, who had been himself active at the siege, pointed to the breach, and said, with a grim smile to Mr. Solagrace, "I little thought, that when my own hand helped to level the cannon which Oliver pointed against yon tower, we should have been obliged to climb like foxes up the very walls which we won by our bow and by our spear. Methought these malignants had then enough of shutting their gates and making high their horn against us."

"Be patient, my brother," said Solagrace; "be patient, and let not thy soul be disquieted. We enter not this high place dishonourably, seeing we ascend by the gate which the Lord opened to the godly."

The words of the pastor were like a spark to gunpowder. The countenances of the mournful retinue suddenly expanded, and, accepting what had fallen from him as an omen and a light from heaven how they were to interpret their present situation, they uplifted, with one consent, one of the triumphant songs in which the Israelites celebrated the victories which had been vouchsafed to them over the heathen inhabitants of the Promised Land :

"Let God arise, and then his foes
Shall turn themselves to flight,
His enemies for fear shall run,
And scatter out of sight ;

"And as wax melts before the fire,
And wind blows smoke away,
So in the presence of the Lord,
The wicked shall decay.

"God's army twenty thousand is,
Of angels bright and strong,
The Lord also in Sinai
Is present them among.

"Thou didst, O Lord, ascend on high,
And captive led'st them all,
Who, in times past, thy chosen flock
In bondage did enthral."

These sounds of devotional triumph reached the joyous band of the Cavaliers, who, decked in whatever pomp their repeated misfortunes and impoverishment had left them, were moving towards the same point, though by a different road, and were filling the principal avenue to the Castle, with tiptoe mirth and revelry. The two parties were strongly contrasted ; for, during that period of civil dissension, the manners of the different factions distinguished them as completely as separate uniforms might have done. If the Puritan was affectedly plain in his dress, and ridiculously precise in his manners, the Cavalier often carried his love of ornament into tawdry finery, and his contempt of hypocrisy into licentious profligacy. Gay gallant fellows, young and old, thronged together towards the ancient Castle, with general and joyous manifestation of those spirits, which, as they had been buoyant enough to support their owners during the worst of times, as they termed Oliver's usurpation, were now so inflated as to transport them nearly beyond the reach of sober reason. Feathers waved, lace glittered, spears jingled, steeds caracolled ; and here and there a petronel or pistol was fired off by some one, who found his own natural talents for making a noise inadequate to the dignity of the occasion. Boys,—for, as we said before, the rabble were with the uppermost party, as usual,—halloo'd and whooped, "Down with the Rump," and "Fie upon Oliver !" Musical instruments, of as many different fashions as were then in use, played all at once, and without any regard to each other's tune ; and the glee of the occasion, while it reconciled the pride of the high-born of the party to fraternize with the general rout, derived an additional zest from the conscious triumph, that their exultation was heard by their neighbours, the crestfallen Roundheads.

When the loud and sonorous swell of the psalm-tune, multiplied by all the echoes of the cliffs and ruinous halls, came full upon their ear, as if to warn them how little they were to reckon upon the depression of their adversaries, at first it was answered with a scornful laugh, raised to as much height as the scoffers' lungs would permit, in order that it might carry to the psalmodists the contempt of their auditors ; but this was a forced exertion of party spleen. There is something in melancholy feelings more natural to an imperfect and suffering state than in those of gayety, and when they are brought into collision the former seldom fail to triumph. If a funeral-train and wedding procession were to meet unexpectedly, it will readily be allowed that the mirth of the last will be speedily merged in the gloom of the other. But the Cavaliers, moreover, had sympathies of a different kind. The psalm-tune, which now came rolling on their ear, had been heard too often, and upon too many occasions, had preceded victory gained over the malignants, to permit them, even in their triumph, to hear it without emotion. There was a sort of pause, of which the party themselves seemed rather ashamed, until the silence was broken by the stout old Knight, Sir Jasper Cranbourne, whose gallantry was so much acknowledged, that he could afford, if we may use such an expression, to confess emotions, which whose courage was in any respect liable to any would have thought it more prudent to conceal.

"Adad," said the old Knight, "may I new claret again, if that is not the very tune with which the prick-eared villains began their onset at Wiltane, where they trowled us down like so many pins ! Faith, neighbours, to say truth, and shew devil, I did not like the sound of it above half."

"If I thought the roundheaded rogues did scorn of us," said Dick Wildblood of the Di would cudgel their psalmody out of their par throats with this very truncheon ;" a motion being seconded by old Roger Raine, the drunkster of the Peveril Arms in the village, might have brought on a general battle, but that Sir Jasper checked the feud.

"We'll have no ranting, Dick," said the old Knight to the young Franklin ; "adad, man, we'll have for three reasons ; first, because it would be a title to Lady Peveril ; then, because it is against King's peace ; and, lastly, Dick, because if we did the psalm-singing knaves, thou mightest come worst, my boy, as has chanced to thee before."

"Who, I ! Sir Jasper ?" answered Dick—"Is by the worst !—I'll be d—d if it ever happened to that accursed lane, where we had no more front, or rear, than if we had been so many men in a barrel."

"That was the reason, I fancy," answered Sir Jasper, "that you, to mend the matter, scrambled the hedge and stuck there, horse and man, all thee through it with my leading-staff ; and instead of charging to the front, you went right and away as fast as your feet could carry you."

This reminiscence produced a laugh at Dick's expense, who was known, or at least suspected, to have more tongue in his head than mettle in his hand. And this sort of rallying on the part of the Cavaliers having fortunately abated the resentment which had begun to awaken in the breasts of the royalists, the sudden ceasing of the sounds which they had disposed to interpret into those of premeditated attack.

This was owing to the arrival of the Puritan bottom of the large and wide breach, which had formerly made in the wall of the Castle by the torious cannon. The sight of its gaping and rubbish, and disjointed masses of building, up slowly winded a narrow and steep path, such made amongst ancient ruins by the rare path those who occasionally visit them, was calculated when contrasted with the gray and solid masses of the towers and curtains which yet stood up to remind them of their victory over the strong of their enemies, and how they had bound kings and princes with fetters of iron.

But feelings more suitable to the purpose of visit to Martindale Castle, were awakened in the souls even of these stern sectaries, when the Countess of the Castle, still in the very prime of beauty of womanhood, appeared at the top of the hill with her principal female attendants, to receive guests with the honour and courtesy becoming invitation. She had laid aside the black dress which had been her sole attire for several years, and arrayed with a splendour not unbecoming her descent and quality. Jewels, indeed, she had, but her long and dark hair was surmounted by a chaplet made of oak-leaves, interspersed with the former being the emblem of the King's protection in the Royal Oak, and the latter, of his Restoration. What rendered her presence still interesting to those who looked on her, was the presence of the two children whom she held in her hand ; one of whom was well known to them to be the child of their leader, Major Bridgenorth, had been restored to life and health by the maternal care of the Lady Peveril.

If even the inferior persons of the party felt the healing influence of her presence, thus accompanied poor Bridgenorth was almost overwhelmed with the strictness of his cast and manners permitted him not to sink on his knee, and kiss the hand which held his little orphan; but the deepness of his obedience—the faltering tremor of his voice—and the listening of his eye, showed a grateful respect for the lady whom he addressed—deeper and more reverential than could have been expressed even by Persian prostration. A few courteous and mild words, expressive of the pleasure she found in once more seeing her neighbours as her friends—a few kind inquiries, addressed to the principal individuals among her guests, concerning their families and connexions, completed her triumph over angry thoughts and dangerous recollections, and disposed men's bosoms to sympathize with the purposes of the meeting.

Even Solsgrace himself, although imagining himself bound by his office and duty to watch over and counteract the wiles of the "Amalekitish woman," did not escape the sympathetic infection; being so much struck with the marks of peace and good-will exhibited by Lady Peveril, that he immediately raised the psalm,

"O what a happy thing it is,
And joyful, for to see Brethren to dwell together in Friendship and unity!"

Accepting this salutation as a mark of courtesy received, the Lady Peveril marshalled in person this party of her guests to the apartment, where ample good cheer was provided for them; and had even the patience to remain while Master Nehemiah Solsgrace pronounced a benediction of portentous length, as an introduction to the banquet. Her presence was, in some measure a restraint on the worthy divine, whose prolixity lasted the longer, and was the more intricate and embarrassed, that he felt himself deterred from rounding it off by his usual alliterative titillation for deliverance from Popery, Prelacy, and Peveril of the Peak, which had become so habitual to him, that, after various attempts to conclude with some other form of words, he found himself at last obliged to pronounce the first words of his usual formula aloud, and mutter the rest in such a manner as not to be intelligible even by those who stood nearest to him.

The minister's silence was followed by all the various sounds which announce the onset of a hungry company on a well-furnished table; and at the same time gave the lady an opportunity to leave the apartment, and look to the accommodation of her other company. She felt, indeed, that it was high time to do so; and that the royalist guests might be disposed to misapprehend, or even to resent, the prior attentions which she had thought it prudent to offer to the Puritans.

These apprehensions were not altogether ill-founded. It was in vain that the steward had displayed the royal standard, with its proud motto of Tantum Valde Triumphans, on one of the great towers which flanked the main entrance of the Castle; while, from the other, floated the banner of Peveril of the Peak, under which many of those who now approached had fought during all the vicissitudes of civil war. It was in vain he repeated his clamorous "Welcome, noble Cavaliers! welcome, generous gentlemen!" There was a slight murmur amongst them, that their welcome ought to have come from the mouth of the Colonel's lady—not from that of a scullion. Sir Jasper Cranbourne, who had sense as well as spirit and courage, and who was aware of his fair cousin's motives, having been indeed consulted by her upon all the arrangements which she had adopted, saw matters were in such a state that no time ought to be lost in conducting the guests to the banquetting apartment, where a fortunate diversion from all these topics of rising discontent might be made, at the expense of the good cheer of all sorts, which the lady's care had so liberally provided.

The stratagem of the old soldier succeeded in its utmost extent. He assumed the great oaken-chair usually occupied by the steward at his audits; and Dr. Dummerar having pronounced a brief Latin benediction, (which was not the less esteemed by the hearers that none of them understood it,) Sir

Jasper exhorted the company to whet their appetites to the dinner by a brimming cup to his Majesty's health, filled as high and as deep as their goblets would permit. In a moment all was bustle, with the clang of wine-cups and of flagons. In another moment the guests were on their feet like so many statues, all hushed as death, but with eyes glancing with expectation, and hands outstretched, which displayed their loyal brimmers. The voice of Sir Jasper, clear, sonorous, and emphatic, as the sound of his war-trumpet, announced the health of the restored Monarch, hastily echoed back by the assemblage, impatient to render it due homage. Another brief pause was filled by the draining of their cups, and the mustering breath to join in a shout so loud, that not only the rafters of the old hall trembled while they echoed it back, but the garlands of oaken boughs and flowers with which they were decorated, waved wildly, and rustled as if agitated by a sudden whirlwind. This rite observed, the company proceeded to assail the good cheer with which the table groaned, animated as they were to the attack both by mirth and melody, for they were attended by all the minstrels of the district, who, like the Episcopal clergy, had been put to silence during the reign of the self-entitled saints of the Commonwealth. The social occupation of good eating and drinking, the exchange of pledges betwixt old neighbours who had been fellow-soldiers in the moment of resistance—fellow-sufferers in the time of depression and subjugation, and were now partners in the same general subject of congratulation, soon wiped from their memory the trifling cause of complaint, which in the minds of some had darkened the festivity of the day; so that when the Lady Peveril walked into the hall, accompanied as before with the children and her female attendants, she was welcomed with the acclamations due to the mistress of the banquet and of the Castle—the dame of the noble Knight, who had led most of them to battle with an undaunted and persevering valour, which was worthy of better success.

Her address to them was brief and matronly, yet spoken with so much feeling as found its way to every bosom. She apologized for the lateness of her personal welcome, by reminding them that there were then present in Martindale Castle that day, persons whom recent happy events had converted from enemies into friends, but on whom the latter character was so recently imposed, that she dared not neglect with them any point of ceremonial. But those whom she now addressed, were the best, the dearest, the most faithful friends of her husband's house, to whom and to their valour Peveril had not only owed those successes which had given them and him fame during the late unhappy times, but to whose courage she in particular had owed the preservation of their leader's life, even when it could not avert defeat. A word or two of heartfelt congratulation on the happy restoration of the royal line and authority, completed all which she had boldness to add, and, bowing gracefully round her, she lifted a cup to her lips as if to welcome her guests.

There still remained, and especially amongst the old Cavaliers of the period, some glimmering of that spirit which inspired Froissart, when he declares that a knight hath double courage at need, when animated by the looks and words of a beautiful and virtuous woman. It was not until the reign which was commencing at the moment we are treating of, that the unbounded license of the age, introducing a general course of profligacy, degraded the female sex into mere servants of pleasure, and, in so doing, deprived society of that noble tone of feeling towards the sex, which, considered as a spur to "raise the clear spirit," is superior to every other impulse, save those of religion and of patriotism. The beams of the ancient hall of Martindale Castle instantly rung with a shout louder and shriller than that at which they had so lately trembled, and the names of the Knight of the Peak and his lady were proclaimed amid waving of caps and hats, and universal wishes for their health and happiness.

Under these auspices the Lady Peveril glided from the hall, and left free space for the revelry of the evening.

But a woman's brain is sometimes as inconstant as a popular assembly; and presently after she had said the morning was like to be rainy, and that the best chamber was the fittest play-room for the children, Mistress Deborah came to the somewhat somnolent resolution, that the park was the fittest room for her own morning walk. It is certain, that rising the unrestrained joviality of the preceding evening, she had danced till midnight with Lance Trum, the park-keeper; but how far the seeing him pass the window in his woodland trim, with aether in his hat, and a crossbow under his arm, increased the discrepancy of the opinions Mrs. Deborah used concerning the weather, we are far from pretending to guess. It is enough for us, that so soon Mistress Ellemere's back was turned, Mistress Deborah carried the children into the gilded chamber, without a strict charge (for we must do her justice) to Master Julian to take care of his little wife, mistress Alice; and then, having taken so satisfactory a precaution, she herself glided into the park by a glass-door of the still-room, which was nearly opposite to the great breach.

The gilded chamber in which the children were, by its arrangement, left to amuse themselves, without the guardianship than what Julian's manhood afforded, was a large apartment, hung with stamped Turkish leather, curiously gilded, representing, in a manner now obsolete, but far from displeasing, a scene of battle and combats betwixt the Saracens of Granada, and the Spaniards under the command of King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella, during that memorable siege, which was terminated by the overthrow of the last fragments of the Moorish empire in Spain.

The little Julian was carousing about the room for the amusement of his infant friend, as well as his own, mimicking with a rude the menacing attitude of the Abencerrages and Zagnis engaged in the Eastern sort of hurling the jaas, or javelin; and at times sitting down beside her, and carousing her into silence and good humour, when the petulant or timid child bore to become tired of remaining an inactive spectator of his boisterous sport; when, on a sudden, he perceived one of the panel compartments of the leather hangings slide apart, so as to show a fair hand, with its fingers resting upon its edge, prepared, it would seem, to push it still farther back. Julian was much surprised, and somewhat frightened, at what he witnessed, for the tales of the nursery had strongly impressed on his mind the terrors of the invisible world. Yet, naturally bold and high spirited, the little champion placed himself beside his defenceless sister, continuing to brandish his weapon in her defence, as boldly as if he had himself been an Abencerrage of Granada.

The panel, on which his eye was fixed, gradually continued to slide back, and display more and more a form to which the hand appartained until in the dark aperture which was disclosed, the children saw the figure of a lady in a mourning dress, past the median of life, but whose countenance still retained signs of great beauty, although the predominant character both of her features and person was an air of most royal dignity. After pausing a moment on the threshold of the portal which she had thus unexpectedly disclosed, and looking with some surprise at the children, whom she had not probably observed while engaged with the management of the panel, the stranger stepped into the apartment, and the panel, upon touch of a spring, closed behind her so suddenly, that Julian almost doubted it had ever been open, and began to apprehend that the whole apparition had been a delusion.*

* The conclusion and discovery of the Countess of Derby is here from a picturesque account of a similar event described to me by the person by whom it was witnessed in childhood. This story, by name Mrs. Margaret Sumner, and a daughter of that name lived near me a sister of my maternal grandmother and of mine my grandfather. She was so often happy in such circumstances, our constant resource in unknown or when we lived of times by, and chased around her to listen to her tales. As she might be supposed to have been in the beginning of the last century she had a lock marked on with government often related to events of that period. I may have mistook, that she told me the unhappy story of the Duke of Longueville, being nearly related to the Countess.

The stately lady, however, advanced to him, and said, "Are not you the little Feveril?"

"Yes," said the boy, reddening, not altogether without a juvenile feeling of that role of chivalry which forbade any one to disown his name, whatever danger might be annexed to the avowal of it.

"Then," said the stately stranger, "go to your mother's room, and tell her to come instantly to speak with me."

"I won't," said the little Julian.

"How!" said the lady,—"so young and so disobedient?—but you do but follow the fashion of the time. Why will you not go, my pretty boy, when I ask it of you as a favour?"

"I would go, madam," said the boy, "but"—and he stopped short, still drawing back as the lady advanced on him, but still holding by the hand Alice Bridgenorth, who, too young to understand the nature of the dialogue, clung, trembling, to her companion.

The stranger saw his embarrassment, smiled, and remained standing fast, while she asked the child once more, "What are you afraid of, my brave boy,—and why should you not go to your mother on my errand?"

Presently, whose daughter was the image of that melancholy beauty.

The present tale, though of a different character was also sufficiently striking when told by an eye-witness. Aunt Margaret was, I suppose, seven or eight years old when residing in the old mansion house of Newton and already displayed the firmness and sagacity which distinguished her through life. Being one of a large family she was young to slight indisposition, and at length one day when the rest of the family went to church with Mr. John and Lady Newton their parents. Before leaving the little invalid, she was strictly enjoined not to go into the parlour where the child girls had breakfasted. But when she found how if alone in the upper part of the house the spirit of her great aunt, Mrs. Eve took possession of my Aunt Margaret and forth she went to examine the parlour in person. She was struck with admiration and awe at what she saw there. A lady, beautiful, exceeding, was seated by the breakfast table, and employed in watching the dishes which had been used. Little Margaret would have had no doubt in ascribing this singular vision an emanation from the angelical world but for her cry, "my lord," which she could not so easily reconcile to her ideas of angels.

The lady, with great pressure of hand, called the astonished child to her, and with much tenderness and encouraging availing to render the necessity of secrecy less severe she told the girl she must not let any one except her mother know that she had seen her. Having allowed this escape, which for the benefit of her curiosity, the mysterious stranger desired the little girl to look from the window of the parlour to see if her mother was returning from church. When she turned her head again the fair vision had vanished but by what means Miss Margaret was unable to form a conjecture.

Long watched and eagerly waited for the Lady Newton at last returned from church and her daughter had no time in telling her extraordinary tale. "You are a very sensible girl, Peggy," answered her mother, "for if you had suspicion of that sort of lady to any one but me, it might have cost her her life. But now I will not be afraid of trusting you with any secret, and I will show you where the poor lady lives." In fact the introduction led to a concealed apartment opening by a sliding panel from the parlour and showed her the lady in the hiding place, which she inhabited. It may be said, in passing, that there were few Scottish houses belonging to families of rank which had not such contrivances for the political machinations of the times often calling them into operation.

The history of the lady of the closet was both melancholy and bloody, and though I have seen various accounts of the story, I do not pretend to distinguish the right edition. She was a young woman of extreme beauty who had been married to an old man, a writer named MacFarlane. Her education and perhaps her manners, gave courage to some who desired to be accounted her captives. Among them was a young Englishman named Cayley, who was a commissioner of government upon the estates forfeited in the rebellion of 1715. In 1718 Mr. Cayley visited the lady in her lodgings where they quarrelled either on account of his having offered her some violence or on another account and became she reproached him with having treated of former favours. It ended in her arising upon a jar of pistols which lay loaded in a closet, her husband intending to take them with him on a journey. The pistol commenced with an air of dexterity saying,

"What madam do you intend to perform a comedy?"—"You shall find it a tragedy," answered the lady and fired both pistols, by which Commissioner Cayley fell dead.

She lived and remained undisturbed for a certain time. Her claim of refuge in Scotland House I do not know—of some probably that name of the indecorous generalissimo Blakeney which cost her Scottish freedom. A very small room would even at any time have been a room for interfering between an individual and the law.

Whatever were the circumstances of Mrs. MacFarlane's case, it is certain that she returned, and lived and died in Edinburgh, without being brought to trial. Indeed, considering the times, there was no great wonder for to our strong party the death of an English commissioner was not a circumstance to require much apology. The Scots, however, could not be of that opinion, the family being of Presbyterian and Whig principles.

"He never," answered Julian, firmly, "if I go, little Alice must stay alone with you."

"You are a valiant fellow," said the lady, "and will not desert your blood, which never left the veins of your protection."

The lady restrained her not, and still gazed with anxious apprehension first on her who addressed her, and then upon her little companion, whose eyes, in the early years of infancy, wandered from the face of the Lady, to that of her companion and protector, and at length, affected by a portion of the fear which the latter's magnanimous efforts could not prevent from flowing into Julian's arms, and, by the very act of being so, augmented his alarm, and, by the very act of being so, rendered it very difficult for him to resist the very fear which impelled him to do so.

There was something in the manner and bearing of the stranger lady, which might justify awe and respect, when joined to the singular and unexpected manner in which she had made her appearance. Her dress was not remarkable, being the hood and gown of the time, such as was worn by the class of gentlewomen; but her hair was very long, and, several locks having escaped from under her hood, hung down dishevelled over her shoulders. Her eyes were deep black, and very large, and her features had something of a foreign expression. When she spoke, her language was marked by a slight foreign accent, although, in reality, it was pure English. Her slightest gesture had the air of one accustomed to command, and to be obeyed; the recollection of which suggested to Julian the apology he afterwards made for being frightened, that he took the Countess for an "enchanted queen."

At the same time the stranger lady and the children thus conversing, two persons entered almost at the same moment from different doors, whose haste and alarm they had been alarmed by the screams of the children.

The first was Major Bridgenorth, whose ears had been struck with the cries of his child as he entered the hall. His intention had been to return to the more public apartment, until the Lady Peveril should make her appearance, with the good purpose of assuring her that the preceding day's events had passed in every respect agreeably to her wishes, and without any of those alarming consequences which might have been apprehended from the confusion betwixt the parties. But when it is considered how severely he had been agitated by apprehensions for his child's safety and health, too well might it be thought surprising that the infantine appearance of Alice induced him to break through the barriers of form, and intrude farther into the interior of the castle than a sense of strict propriety might have permitted.

He entered the gilded chamber, therefore, by a narrow and narrow passage, which communicated between that apartment and the hall, and, snatching the child from the arms, endeavoured, by a thousand caresses, to soothe the screams which burst yet more violently from the little girl, on beholding herself in the arms of one to whose voice and manner she was, too long and too late, an entire stranger.

Of course Alice's shrieks were redoubled, and, recouped by those of Julian Peveril, who, on the appearance of this second intruder, was frightened into pursuit of every more manly idea of rescue than that which consisted in invoking assistance at the very top of his lungs.

Alarmed by this noise, which in half a minute became very clamorous, Lady Peveril, with whose apartment the gilded chamber was connected by a private door of communication opening into her wardrobe, entered on the scene. The instant she appeared, the little Alice, extricating herself from the grasp of her father, ran towards her protectress, and when she had once taken hold of her skirts, not only became quiet, but turned her large blue eyes, in which the tears were still glistening, with a look of wonder rather than alarm, towards the strange lady. Julian manfully brandished his reed, a weapon which he had never parted with during the whole alarm, and stood prepared to assist his mother if there should be danger in the encounter betwixt her and the stranger.

In fact, it might have puzzled an older person to account for the sudden and confused pause which the Lady Peveril made, as she gazed on her unexpected guest, as if dubious whether she did or dared to recognise, in her still beautiful though wasted and emaciated features, a countenance which was known well under far different circumstances.

The stranger seemed to understand her hesitation, for she said in that heart-thrilling voice which was peculiarly her own—

"Time and misfortune have changed me—Margaret—that every mirror tells me—yet Margaret Stanley might still have known Countess de la Tremouille."

The Lady Peveril was little in the custom of giving way to sudden emotion, but in the present case she threw herself on her knees in a rapture of joy and grief, and, half embracing the stranger, exclaimed, in broken language—

"My kind, my noble benefactress—the good Countess of Derby—the royal Queen in Marston—I doubt your voice, your features, for a moment—forgive, forgive me!"

The Countess raised the suppliant kinswoman from her husband's house, with all the grace of a woman trained from early birth to receive homage and protection. She kissed the Lady Peveril's forehead, and passed her hand in a caressing manner over her face as she said—

"You too are changed, my fair cousin, but change becomes you, from a pretty and timid girl to a sage and comely matron. But my own name, which I once held a good one, has failed me—what if this gentleman be Sir Geoffrey Peveril?"

"A kind and good neighbour only, madam," said Lady Peveril; "Sir Geoffrey is at Court."

"I understood so much," said the Countess of Derby, "when I arrived here last night."

"How, madam?" said Lady Peveril—"Did you arrive at Martindale Castle—at the house of Mrs. Stanley, where you have such right to come, and did not announce your presence to her?"

"O, I know you are a dutiful subject, Margaret," answered the Countess, "though it be in the nature of a rare character—but it was our pleasure," she said with a smile, "to travel incognito—and finding us engaged in general hospitality, we desired not to disturb you with our royal presence."

"But how and where were you lodged, madam?" said Lady Peveril; "or why should you have so secret a visit which would, if made, have augmented tenfold the happiness of every true heart that meets here yesterday?"

"My lodging was well cared for by Ellesmere—your Ellesmere now, as she was formerly mine—she has acted as quartermaster ere now, you know, on a broader scale; you must excuse her—she is my positive order to lodge me in the most secret of your Castle"—(here she pointed to the door panel)—"she obeyed orders in that, and I am also in sending you now hither."

"Indeed I have not yet seen her," said the Countess, "and therefore was totally ignorant of a visit so full, so surprising."

"And I," said the Countess, "was equally surprised to find none but these beautiful children in that apartment where I thought I heard you moan. Our Ellesmere has become silly—your good-nature has spoiled her—she has forgotten the discipline she learned under me."

"I saw her run through the wood," said the Lady Peveril, after a moment's recollection, "undoubtedly to seek the person who has charge of the children in order to remove them."

"Your own darlings, I doubt not," said the Countess, looking at the children. "Margaret, Providence has blessed you."

"That is my son," said Lady Peveril, pointing to Julian, who stood devoting their discourse to body ear; "the little girl—I may call mine too." Major Bridgenorth, who had in the meantime again picked up his infant, and was engaged in caressing it, laid it down as the Countess of Derby spoke, sighed deeply, and walked towards the oriel window. He was well aware that the ordinary rules of courtesy would have rendered it proper that he should withdraw silently, or at least offer to do so; but he was not a man of ceremonious politeness, and he had a particular interest in the subjects on which the Countess's discourse was likely to turn, which induced him to dispense with ceremony. The ladies seemed indeed scarce to notice his presence. The Countess had now assumed a chair, and motioned to the Lady Peveril to sit upon a stool which was placed by her side. "We will have old times once more, though there are here no roaring of rebel guns to drive you to take refuge at my side, and almost in my closet."

"I have a gun, madam," said little Julian, "and the park-keeper is to teach me how to fire it next year."

"I will list you for my soldier, then," said the Countess.

"Ladies have no soldiers," said the boy, looking earnestly at her.

"He has the true masculine contempt of our frailties, I see," said the Countess; "it is born with the insolent varlets of mankind, and shows itself as soon as they are out of their long clothes.—Did Ellesmere ever tell you of Latham-House and Charlotte of Derby, my little master?"

"A thousand thousand times," said the boy, colouring; "and how the Queen of Man defended it six weeks against three thousand Roundheads, under Logue Harrison the butcher."

"It was your mother defended Latham-House," said the Countess, "not I, my little soldier—Hadst thou been there, thou hadst been the best captain of the three."

"Do not say so, madam," said the boy, "for mamma would not touch a gun for all the universe."

"Not I, indeed, Julian," said his mother; "there was for certain, but as useless a part of the garrison."

"You forget," said the Countess, "you nursed our hospital, and made lint for the soldiers' wounds."

"But did not papa come to help you?" said Julian.

"Papa came at last," said the Countess, "and so did Prince Rupert—but not, I think, till they were both partially wished for.—Do you remember that morning, Margaret, when the roundheaded knaves, that kept us shut up so long, retreated without bag or baggage, at the first glance of the Prince's standards appearing on the hill—and how you took every high-crested cap in you saw for Peveril of the Peak, that had been our partner three months before at the Queen's ask? Nay, never blush for the thought of it—it was an honest affection—and though it was the music of trumpets that accompanied you both to the old chapel, which was almost entirely ruined by the enemy's bullets; and though Prince Rupert, when he gave you away at the altar, was clad in buff and andalier, with pistols in his belt, yet I trust these warlike signs were no type of future discord?"

"Heaven has been kind to me," said Lady Peveril, "in blessing me with an affectionate husband."

"And in preserving him to you," said the Countess, with a deep sigh; "while mine, alas! sealed with his blood his devotion to his king—O, had he lived to see this day!"

"Alas! alas! that he was not permitted!" answered Lady Peveril; "how had that brave and noble Earl rejoiced in the unhopèd-for redemption of our captivity!"

The Countess looked on Lady Peveril with an air of surprise.

"Thou hast not then heard, cousin, how it stands with our house?—How indeed had my noble lord wondered, had he been told that the very monarch for whom he had laid down his noble life on the scaffold at Bolton-le-Moor, should make it his first act of restored monarchy to complete the destruction of our property, already well-nigh ruined in the royal cause, and to persecute me his widow!"

* The Earl of Derby and King in Man was beheaded at Bolton-le-Moors, after having been made prisoner in a previous skirmish in Wigan Lane.

fold at Bolton-le-Moor, should make it his first act of restored monarchy to complete the destruction of our property, already well-nigh ruined in the royal cause, and to persecute me his widow!"

"You astonish me, madam!" said the Lady Peveril. "It cannot be, that you—that you, the wife of the gallant, the faithful, the murdered Earl—you, Countess of Derby, and Queen in Man—you, who took on you even the character of a soldier, and seemed a man when so many men proved women—that you should sustain evil from the event which has fulfilled—exceeded—the hopes of every faithful subject—it cannot be!"

"Thou art as simple, I see, in this world's knowledge as ever, my fair cousin," answered the Countess. "This restoration, which has given others security, has placed me in danger—this change which relieved other royalists, scarce less zealous, I presume to think, than I—has sent me here a fugitive, and in concealment, to beg shelter and assistance from you, fair cousin."

"From me," answered the Lady Peveril—"from me, whose youth your kindness sheltered—from the wife of Peveril, your gallant Lord's companion in arms—you have a right to command every thing! but, alas! that you should need such assistance as I can render—forgive me, but it seems like some ill-omened vision of the night—I listen to your words as if I hoped to be relieved from their painful import by awaking."

"It is indeed a dream—a vision," said the Countess of Derby; "but it needs no seer to read it—the explanation hath been long since given—Put not your faith in princes. I can soon remove your surprise.—This gentleman, your friend, is doubtless honest?"

The Lady Peveril well knew that the Cavaliers, like other factions, usurped to themselves the exclusive denomination of the honest party, and she felt some difficulty in explaining that her visiter was not honest in that sense of the word.

"Had we not better retire, madam," she said to the Countess, rising, as if in order to attend her. But the Countess retained her seat.

"It was but a question of habit," she said; "the gentleman's principles are nothing to me, for what I have to tell you is widely blazed, and I care not who hears my share of it. You remember—you must have heard, for I think Margaret Stanley would not be indifferent to my fate—that after my husband's murder at Bolton, I took up the standard which he never dropped until his death, and displayed it with my own hand in our Sovereignty of Man."

"I did indeed hear so, madam," said the Lady Peveril; "and that you had bidden a bold defiance to the rebel government, even after all other parts of Britain had submitted to them. My husband, Sir Geoffrey, designed at one time to have gone to your assistance with some few followers; but we learned that the island was rendered to the Parliament party, and that you, dearest lady, were thrown into prison."

"But you heard not," said the Countess, "how that disaster befell me.—Margaret, I would have held out that island against the knaves as long as the sea continued to flow around it. Till the shoals which surround it had become safe anchorage—till its precipices had melted beneath the sunshine—till of all its strong abodes and castles, not one stone remained upon another, would I have defended against these villainous hypocritical rebels my dear husband's hereditary dominion. The little kingdom of Man should have been yielded only when not an arm was left to wield a sword, not a finger to draw a trigger in its defence. But treachery did what force could never have done. When we had foiled various attempts upon the island by open force—treason accomplished what Blake and Lawson, with their floating castles, had found too hazardous an enterprise—a base rebel, whom we had nursed in our own bosoms, betrayed us to the enemy. This wretch was named Christian"—

Major Bridgenorth started and turned towards the speaker, but instantly seemed to recollect himself, and again averted his face. The Countess proceeded, without noticing the interruption, which, however, rather surprised Lady Peveril, who was acquainted with her neighbour's general habits of indifference and apathy, and therefore the more surprised at his testifying such sudden symptoms of interest. She would once again have moved the Countess to retire to another apartment, but Lady Derby proceeded with too much vehemence to endure interruption.

"This Christian," she said, "had eat of my lord his sovereign's bread, and drunk of his cup, even from childhood—for his fathers had been faithful servants to the House of Man and Derby. He himself had fought bravely by my husband's side, and enjoyed all his confidence; and when my princely Karl was martyred by the rebels, he recommended to me, amongst other instructions communicated in the last message I received from him, to continue my confidence in Christian's fidelity. I obeyed, although I never loved the man. He was cold and phlegmatic, and utterly devoid of that sacred fire which is the incentive to noble deeds, suspected too of leaning to the cold metaphysics of Calvinistic subtlety. But he was brave, wise, and experienced, and, as the event proved, possessed but too much interest with the islanders. When these rude people saw themselves without hope of relief, and pressed by a blockade, which brought want and disease into their island, they began to fall off from the faith which they had hitherto shown."

"What!" said the Lady Peveril, "could they forget what was due to the widow of their benefactor—she who had shared with the generous Derby the task of bettering their condition?"

"Do not blame them," said the Countess; "the rude herd acted but according to their kind—in present distress they forgot former benefits, and, nursed in their earthen hovels, with spirits suited to their dwellings, they were incapable of feeling the glory which is attached to constancy in suffering. But that Christian should have headed their revolt—that he, born a gentleman, and bred under my murdered Derby's own care in all that was chivalrous and noble—that he should have forgot a hundred benefits—why do I talk of benefits?—that he should have forgotten that kindly intercourse which binds man to man far more than the reciprocity of obligation—that he should have headed the ruffians who broke suddenly into my apartment—immured me with my infants in one of my own castles, and assumed or usurped the tyranny of the island—that this should have been done by William Christian, my vassal, my servant, my friend, was a deed of ungrateful treachery, which even this age of treason will scarcely parallel!"

"And you were then imprisoned," said the Lady Peveril, "and in your own sovereignty?"

"For more than seven years I have endured strict captivity," said the Countess. "I was indeed offered my liberty, and even some means of support, if I would have consented to leave the island, and pledge my word that I would not endeavour to repossess my son in his father's rights. But they little knew the princely house from which I spring, and as little the royal house of Stanley which I uphold, who hoped to humble Charlotte of Tremouille into so base a composition. I would rather have starved in the darkest and lowest vault of Rushin Castle, than have consented to aught which might diminish in one hair's breadth the right of my son over his father's sovereignty."

"And could not your firmness, in a case where hope seemed lost, induce them to be generous, and dismiss you without conditions?"

"They knew me better than thou dost, wench," answered the Countess; "once at liberty, I had not been long without the means of disturbing their usurpation, and Christian would have as soon uncaged a lioness to combat with, as have given me the slightest power of returning to the struggle with him. But time had liberty and revenge in store—I had still friends and partisans in the island, though they were compelled to give way to the storm. Even among the islanders at large, most had been disappointed in the effects which they expected from the change of power. They were loaded with exactions by their new masters, their privileges were abridged, and their immunities abolished, under the pretext of reducing them to the same condition with the subjects of the pretended republic. When the arrival of the changes which were current in these sentiments were privately communicated to Calcott and others acted with great zeal and fidelity, and a rising, effected as suddenly and efficiently that which had made me a captive, placed me at liberty and in possession of the Sovereignty of the island as Regent for my son, the youthful Earl of Derby. Do you think I enjoyed that sovereignty long without doing justice on that traitor Christian?"

"How, madam," said Lady Peveril, who, though she knew the high and ambitious spirit of the Countess, scarce anticipated the extremities to which she was capable of hurrying her—"Have you imposed Christian?"

"Ay, wench,—in that sure prison which his never breaks from," answered the Countess.

Bridgenorth, who had insensibly approached her, and was listening with an agony of interest, when he was unable any longer to suppress, burst a sudden and stern exclamation—

"Lady, I trust you have not dared!"

The Countess interrupted him in her turn.

"I know not who you are who question me, but I know not me when you speak to me of the word dare, or dare not, do. But you seem interested in the fate of this Christian, and you shall hear. No sooner placed in possession of my rights than I ordered the Dempster of the island to lay upon the traitor a High Court of Justice, with the formalities of the law, as prescribed in its records. The Court was held in the open square, under the vaulted cope of heaven, and on the terrace of the Zanzwald Hill, where of old Dr. Scald held their courts of judgment. The case was heard at length in his own defence, and amounted to little more than those specious notions of public consideration, which are ever the colour the ugly front of treason. He was convicted of his crime, and he received the death sentence."

"But which, I trust, is not yet executed," said Lady Peveril, not without an involuntary shudder.

"You are a fool, Margaret," said the Countess sharply; "think you I delayed such an act until some wretched intrigues of the new Court might have prompted their interference? The wench—he passed from the judgment seat to a place of execution, with no farther delay than was necessary for his soul's sake. He was shot by a file of musketeers in the common place of execution, called Hango-hill."

* The reader will find in an Appendix to the history account of this tragedy as related by one who may be supposed to have been present. It must be admitted on the other hand that Captain Christian's trial and execution were conducted in the laws of the island. He was tried in all due form by the Dempster or chief judge then named Norris, the Keys of the island, and other constituted authorities making what is called a court. The word yet retained in many parts of Scotland, Vallie Negott, and is applied to those artificial courts which were in ancient times assigned to the meeting of the nobles for holding their Courts. It was pleaded that the execution against Christian was found fully relevant, and refused to plead at the bar that he was accounting to his Man, most justly sentenced to death. It was also stated that time was left for appeal to England as he was arrested the end of September, and not executed until the 21st of January. These defenses were made for the various officers of the Man called before the Privy Council on account of the death, and supported with many quotations from the law of the island and appear to have been received as a sufficient plea for their share in these proceedings.

I am obliged to the present reverend Vicar of Malw, to afford extract to the following effect:—Malw Burnak, A. Mr. William Christian of Burnak wing, late receiver, was death at Hango Hill the 21st January. He died most peacefully, made a good end, and prayed earnestly, a excellent speech, and the next day was buried in the church Malw.

It is certain that the death of William Christian made deep impression upon the minds of the islanders, and a life of Calcott was much blamed on the occasion. Two legends are with preservation as occurring at his execution. The first was that he was covered with white blankets that he might not fall on the ground, and secondly the presence was no outward effusion of blood.

Many on the island deny Christian's guilt altogether, and consider him a respectable descendant, the present Dempster; but these are Bridgenorth clasped his hands together, wrung them, and groaned bitterly.

"As you seem interested for this criminal," added the Countess, addressing Bridgenorth, "I do him but justice in reporting to you, that his death was firmly and manly, becoming the general tenor of his life, high, but for that gross act of traitorous ingratitude, all been fair and honourable. But what of that? the hypocrite is a saint, and the false traitor a man of honour, till opportunity, that faithful touchstone, gives their metal to be base."

"It is false, woman—it is false!" said Bridgenorth, a longer suppressing his indignation.

"What means this bearing, Master Bridgenorth?" said Lady Peveril, much surprised. "What is this Christian to you, that you should insult the Countess of Derby under my roof?"

"Speak not to me of Countesses and of over-moors," said Bridgenorth, "grief and anger leave me a leisure for idle observances, to humour the vanity of my own children.—Oh Christian—worthy, well worthy, of the name thou didst bear! My friendly brother—the brother of my blessed Alice—the ally friend of my desolate estate! art thou then cruelly murdered by a female fury, who, but for thee, had deservedly paid with her own blood that of God's gifts, which she, as well as her tyrant husband, had filled like water!—Yes, cruel murderers!" he continued, addressing the Countess, "he whom thou hast sheltered in thy insane vengeance, sacrificed for many a year the dictates of his own conscience to an interest of thy family, and did not desert it till thy frantic zeal for royalty had well-nigh brought to her perdition the little community in which he was born. Even in confining thee, he acted but as the ends of the madman, who bind him with iron for his own preservation; and for thee, as I can bear to know, he was the only barrier between thee and the wrath of the Commons of England; and but for his earnest remonstrances, thou hadst suffered the reality of thy malignancy, even like the wicked wife Ahab."

"Master Bridgenorth," said Lady Peveril, "I will bow for your impatience upon hearing these unbecoming tidings; but there is neither use nor propriety in farther urging this question. If in your grief you want other restraints, I pray you to remember that the Countess is my guest and kinswoman, and is under such protection as I can afford her. I beseech you, in simple courtesy, to withdraw, as what must needs be the best and most becoming course in these trying circumstances."

"Nay let him remain," said the Countess, regarding him with composure, not unmingled with triumph; "I would not have it otherwise. I would not that my revenge should be summed up in the stunted gratification which Christian's death hath afforded. This man's rude and clamorous grief only proves that in retribution I have dealt has been more widely felt than by the wretched sufferer himself. I would I saw that it had but made more as many rebel hearts, as there were loyal breasts afflicted by the death of my princely Derby!"

"So please you, madam," said Lady Peveril, "since Master Bridgenorth hath not the manners to leave us upon my request, we will, if your ladyship best, leave him, and retire to my apartment.—Farewell, Master Bridgenorth, we will meet hereafter on better terms."

"Pardon me, Madam," said the Major, who had been striding hastily through the room, but now stood still, and drew himself up, as one who has taken a resolution,—"to yourself I have nothing to say but that is respectful; but to this woman I must speak as a magistrate. She has confessed a murder in my presence—the murder too of my brother in law;—as man, and as a magistrate, I cannot permit her to pass on; hence, excepting under such custody as may prevent her farther flight. She has already confessed that she is a fugitive, and in search of a place of concealment, until she should be able to escape into foreign parts.—Charlotte, Countess of Derby, I attack thee of the crime of which thou hast but now made thy boast."

"I would not obey your arrest," said the Countess, simply. "I was born to give, but not to receive such orders. What have your English laws to do with my acts of justice and of government, within my own hereditary kingdom? Am I not Queen in Man, as well as Countess of Derby? A feudatory Sovereign indeed; but yet independent so long as my duties of homage are duly discharged. What right can you assert over me?"

"That given by the precept of Scripture," answered Bridgenorth—"Whoso spilleth man's blood, by man shall his blood be spilled." Think not that the barbarous privileges of ancient feudal customs will avail to exempt you from the punishment due for an Englishman murdered upon pretexts inconsistent with the act of indemnity."

"Master Bridgenorth," said Lady Peveril, "if by fair means you deem not from your present purpose, I tell you that I neither dare, nor will, permit any violence against this honourable lady, within the walls of my husband's castle."

"You will find yourself unable to prevent me from executing my duty, madam," said Bridgenorth, whose private anxiety now came in aid of his grief and desire of revenge; "I am a magistrate, and act by authority."

"I know not that," said Lady Peveril. "That you were a magistrate, Master Bridgenorth, under the late usurping powers, I know well, but till I hear of your having a commission in the name of the King, I now hesitate to obey you as such."

"I shall stand on small ceremony," said Bridgenorth. "Were I no magistrate, every man has title to arrest for murder against the terms of the indemnities held out by the King's proclamations, and I will make my point good."

"What indemnities? What proclamations?" said the Countess of Derby, indignantly. "Charles Stuart may if he pleases, send it doth seem to please him, consort with those whose hands have been red with the blood, and blackened with the plunder, of his father and of his loyal subjects. He may forgive them if he will, and count their deeds good service. What has that to do with this Christian's death against me and mine? Born a Manksman, and nursed in the island—he broke the laws under which he lived, and died for the breach of them, after the fair trial which they allowed.—Methinks, Margaret, we have enough of this foolish and foolish magistrate—I attend you to your apartment."

Major Bridgenorth placed himself betwixt them and the door, in a manner which showed him determined to interrupt their passage; when the Lady Peveril, who thought she had already shown more forbearance than in this matter than her husband was likely to approve of, raised her voice, and called to her steward, Whitaker. That alert person, who had heard high talking, and a female voice with which he was unacquainted, had remained for several minutes in the ante-room, much afflicted with the anxiety of his own curiosity. Of course he entered with instant.

"Let three of the men instantly take arms," said his lady, "bring them into the ante-room, and wait my further orders."

CHAPTER VI.

You shall have as worse grace than my master.
Not so bad than myself.—The Captain.

The command which Lady Peveril laid on her domestics to arm themselves, was so unlike the usual acquiescence of her manners, that Major Bridgenorth was astonished. "How mean you, madam?" said he; "I thought myself under a friendly roof."

"And you are so, Master Bridgenorth," said the Countess, "I willingly drop the veil over a transgression, which, though it is a transgression, is at the same time a civil war, which I will not have at least one avenger if justice sleep."

my heart, madam," said the Knight. "There are so many noble houses devoted, and so many minds in which the cause is and does place for the training of noble youths is given up, and to be told that I have often tried I must have hoped to be young master at home, and I have had too little nurture myself to teach him much, and so he would have been a mere hunting hawk-bought of Derbyshire. But in your judgment a woman, and with the noble young Earl, he will have all, and more than all, the education which I could desire."

"There shall be no distinction between them, madam," said the Countess. "Margaret Stanley's son shall be as much the object of care to me as my own, since you are kindly disposed to interest him to my charge. You look pale, Margaret," she continued, "and the tear stands in your eye. Do not be so foolish, my love; what I ask is later than you can desire for your boy, for the house of my father, the Duke de la Tremouille, was the most famous school of chivalry in France, nor have I degenerated from him, or suffered any relaxation in that noble discipline which trained young gentlemen to do honour to their race. You can promise your Julian no such advantage, if you train him up a mere home-bred youth."

"I acknowledge the importance of the favour, madam," said Lady Ferveril, "and must acquiesce in what your ladyship commands us by proposing, and Sir Geoffrey approves of; but Julian is an only child, and—"

"An only son," said the Countess, "but surely not an only child. You pay too high a deference to our masters, the monks, if you allow Julian to engross all your affection, and spare none for this beautiful girl."

So saying, she set down Julian, and, taking Alice Bridgenorth on her lap, began to caress her; and there was even something of her maternal character, something so sweet in the tone of her voice and in the cast of her features, that the child immediately smiled, and replied to her marks of fondness. This mistake embarrassed Lady Ferveril exceedingly. Knowing the blunt simplicity of her husband's character, his devotion to the memory of the deceased Earl of Derby, and his corresponding veneration for his widow, she was a stranger to the consequences of his hearing the conduct of Bridgenorth that morning, and was particularly desirous that he should not learn it save from herself in private, and after due preparation. But the Countess's error led to a more fortunate discovery.

"That pretty girl, madam," answered Sir Geoffrey, "is none of mine. I wish she were. She belongs to a neighbour hard by—a good man, and, to say truth, a good neighbour, though he was carried off from his allegiance in the late times by a d—d Presbyterian preacher, who calls himself a parson, and whom I hope to fetch down from his perch presently, with a woman to him. He has been cock of the roost long enough. There are rods in pocket to switch the Geneva cloak with I can tell the next good night that much. But this child is the daughter of Bridgenorth—neighbour Bridgenorth, of Maltreave Hall."

"Bridgenorth?" said the Countess. "I thought I had known all the honourable names in Derbyshire. I remember nothing of Bridgenorth. But may—was there not a squatter and commoner-man of that name? Sure it cannot be he."

Ferveril took some shame to himself as he replied, "It is the very man whom your ladyship means, and you may conceive the reluctance with which I submitted to receive good officers from one of his halberds, but had I not done so, I should have a sore lesson how to find a road to cover Dame Margaret's head."

The Countess, as he spoke, raised the child gently from her lap, and placed it upon the carpet, though little Alice showed a disinclination to the change of place, which the Lady of Derby and Man would certainly have indulged in a child of patrician descent and loyal parentage.

"I blame you not," she said; "no one knows what temptations will bring us down to. Yet I do think Ferveril of the Peak would have needed in its deepest cavern, sooner than owed an obligation to a beggar."

"Nay, madam," answered the Knight, "your heart is bad enough, but not as bad as you would have it. He is but a Presbyterian—that I am sure—but not an Independent."

A variety of the same meaning, said the Countess, belittled while the others looked on, the victim whom the Independents accused. I twist such facts I prefer the Independents to be at least bold, barefaced, conscious when of more of the type of them, and less of the craft. I have no doubt it was that worthy gentleman's wish upon him that morning."

She stopped short, for she saw Lady Ferveril regard and embarrassed.

"I am," she said, "the more foolish of me I have said something, I know not what, to you, Margaret—Mystery is a bad thing, and as there should be none."

"There is none, madam," said Lady Ferveril, "I wanted but an answer to my husband's question—what had happened?—and Master Bridgenorth was unfortunately here. Lady Derby and I met; and he thought a duty to speak of."

"To speak of what?" said the Knight, looking on. "You were over something up hill, and giving way to the occupation of such job."

"I only mean," said Lady Ferveril, "that person—he to whom Lady Derby's maid was the brother of his late lady, he threatened cannot think that he was serious."

"Threaten? threaten the Lady of Derby in my house?—the widow of my friend—Charlotte of Latham House?—by Heaven, he dared slave shall answer it! How comes he to leave them but out of the window?"

"Alas! Sir Geoffrey, you forget how awkward," said the lady.

"Ours him," said the Knight, still more awkward in his eagerness of apprehension, he said that his wife alluded to pecuniary obligations. He owes him some money, both he not money, and must he have the right, over and above, to over and play the Magistrate in Mordred's? Where is he? what have you made of him? I must speak with him."

"He patient, Sir Geoffrey," said the Countess, "now discerned the count of her knowledge, and he assured I did not need policy to defend me against this dangerous man as Marie d'Arthur would have called him. I am so pleased to owe my deliverance to such gallantry that I charge and command you, my knight, not to mingle in the adventure of such."

Lady Ferveril, who knew her husband's disposition, temper, and perceived that he was long angry, now took up the story, and simply pointed out the cause of Master Bridgenorth's interference.

"I am sorrow for it," said the Knight, "that he had more sense, and that this happy change have done some good upon him. But you shall hold us this instantly. It consists not with me that he should be kept prisoner in the house as if I feared any thing he could do to annoy the Countess, while she is under my roof, or within my circle of this castle."

So saying, and bowing to the Countess to be brought to the gilded chamber, leaving Lady Ferveril in great anxiety for the event of an angry man, turned a temper hoarse as that of her husband, stubborn like that of Bridgenorth. Her appearance was, however, unnecessary, for the meeting was fatal to take place.

While Sir Geoffrey Ferveril, having dismissed the taker and his entrance, entered the gilded chamber in which he expected to find his captive, the man had escaped, and it was easy to see in what manner. The sliding panel had, in the hurry of the moment, escaped the memory of Lady Ferveril, and whatever the only persons who knew any thing of it. It was probable that a chink had remained sufficient to indicate its existence to Bridgenorth.

Withdrawing it altogether, had found his way to a secret apartment with which it communicated from thence to the postern of the Castle by a secret passage, which had been formed in the crevices of the wall, as is not uncommon in ancient castles; the lords of which were liable to so many vicissitudes of fortune, that they usually contrived to have some lurking-place and secret mode of retreat in their fortresses. That Bridgenorth had discovered and availed himself of this secret mode of retreat was evident; because the private doors communicating with the postern and the sliding panel in the chamber, were both left open.

Geoffrey returned to the ladies with looks of anxiety. While he deemed Bridgenorth within his grasp, he was apprehensive of nothing he could do; but felt himself his superior in personal strength, and that species of courage which induces a man to act without hesitation, upon personal danger. Even at a distance, he had been for many years accustomed to consider Bridgenorth's power and influence as something formidable; and, notwithstanding the late change of affairs, his ideas so naturally reverted to his neighbour as a powerful friend or dangerous enemy, that he felt more apprehension on the Countess's score, than he was willing to acknowledge to himself. The Countess observed his silent and anxious brow, and requested to know what they were likely to involve him in any way or in any danger.

"No trouble should be welcome," said Sir Geoffrey, "and more welcome the danger, which should be such an account. My plan was, that your husband should have honoured Martindale with a residence, which might have been kept private until the search after you was ended. Had I seen a fellow Bridgenorth, I have no doubt I could have impelled him to act discreetly; but he is now gone, and will keep out of my reach; and, what is more, he has the secret of the priest's chamber." The Knight paused, and seemed much embarrassed.

"I can, then, neither conceal nor protect me?" said the Countess.

"No, my honoured lady," answered the Knight, "let me say out my say. The plain truth is, that there are many friends among the Presbyterians who are more numerous than I would wish them; and he falls in with the pursuivant fellow who holds the warrant of the Privy Council, it is likely to back him with force sufficient to try to execute it."

"And I doubt whether any of our own friends summoned together in haste, sufficient to resist the power as they are like to bring together."

"Would I wish any friends to take arms, in my own name against the King's warrant, Sir Geoffrey," said the Countess.

"For that matter," replied the Knight, "an angry Majesty will grant warrants against his best subjects, and he must look to have them resisted. But the main thing to think of in this emergency is—though the castle be something inhospitable—that your ladyship should take presently to horse, if your fatigue permit. I will mount also, with some brisk fellows who will lodge you safe at Vale-Royal, though the sheriff stopped the way with a whole posse comitatus."

The Countess of Derby willingly acquiesced in this plan. She had enjoyed a night's sound repose in her private chamber, to which Ellesmere had guided her the preceding evening, and was quite ready to start on her route, or flight—"she scarce knew," she said, "which of the two she should term it."

Peveril wept at the necessity which seemed to separate her earliest friend and protectress from under her feet, at the instant when the clouds of adversity were gathering around her; but she saw no alternative, nay, however strong her attachment to Lady Derby, she could not but be more ready to accede to her hasty departure, when she considered the inconvenience, and even danger, in which she was, at such a time, and in such circumstances, was likely to involve a man so bold and unscrupled as her husband Sir Geoffrey.

While Lady Peveril, therefore, made every arrangement which time permitted and circumstances required, for the Countess prosecuting her journey, her husband, whose spirits always rose with the prospect of action, issued his orders to Whitaker to get together a few stout fellows, with back and breast-pieces, and steel-caps. "There are the two lackeys, and Outram and Saunders, besides the other groom fellow, and Roger Raine, and his son; but bid Roger not to come drunk again;—thyself, young Dick of the Dale and his servant, and a file or two of the tenants,—we shall be enough for any force they can make. All these are fellows that will strike hard, and ask no question why—their hands are ever readier than their tongues, and their mouths are more made for drinking than speaking."

Whitaker, apprized of the necessity of the case, asked if he should not warn Sir Jasper Cranbourne.

"Not a word to him, as you live," said the Knight; "this may be an outlawry, as they call it, for what I know; and therefore I will bring no lands or tenements into peril, saving mine own. Sir Jasper hath had a troublesome time of it for many a year. By my will, he shall sit quiet for the rest of his days."

CHAPTER VII.

Fang. A rescue! a rescue!

Mrs. Quickly. Good people, bring a rescue or two.

Henry IV., Part I.

THE followers of Peveril were so well accustomed to the sound of "Boot and Saddle," that they were soon mounted and in order; and in all the form, and with some of the dignity of danger, proceeded to escort the Countess of Derby through the hilly and desert tract of country which connects the frontier of the shire with the neighbouring county of Cheshire. The cavalcade moved with considerable precaution, which they had been taught by the discipline of the Civil Wars. One wary and well-mounted trooper rode about two hundred yards in advance; followed, at about half that distance, by two more, with their carabines advanced, as if ready for action. About one hundred yards behind the advance, came the main body; where the Countess of Derby, mounted on Lady Peveril's ambling palfrey, (for her own had been exhausted by the journey from London to Martindale Castle,) accompanied by one groom, of approved fidelity, and one waiting-maid, was attended and guarded by the Knight of the Peak, and three files of good and practised horsemen. In the rear came Whitaker, with Lance Outram, as men of especial trust, to whom the covering the retreat was confided. They rode, as the Spanish proverb expresses it, "with the beard on the shoulder," looking around, that is, from time to time, and using every precaution to have the speediest knowledge of any pursuit which might take place.

But, however wise in discipline, Peveril and his followers were somewhat remiss in civil policy. The Knight had communicated to Whitaker, though without any apparent necessity, the precise nature of their present expedition; and Whitaker was equally communicative to his comrade Lance, the keeper. "It is strange enough, Master Whitaker," said the latter, when he had heard the case, "and I wish you, being a wise man, would expound it;—why, when we have been wishing for the King—and praying for the King—and fighting for the King—and dying for the King, for these twenty years, the first thing we find to do on his return, is to get into harness to resist his warrant!"

"Pooh! you silly fellow," said Whitaker, "that is all you know of the true bottom of our quarrel! Why, man, we fought for the King's person against his warrant, all along from the very beginning; for I remember the rogues' proclamations, and so forth, always ran in the name of the King and Parliament."

"Ay! was it even so?" replied Lance. "Nay, then, if they begin the old game so soon again, and send out warrants in the King's name against his loyal subjects, well fare our stout Knight, say I, who is ready to take them down in their stocking-soles."

ly in her favour: and the death of Christian was at length only punished by the imposition of a heavy fine, amounting, we believe, to many thousand pounds; which was paid, with great difficulty, out of the shattered estates of the young Earl of Derby.

CHAPTER VIII.

My native land, good night! BYRON.

LADY PEVERIL remained in no small anxiety for several hours after her husband and the Countess had departed from Martindale Castle; more especially when she learned that Major Bridgenorth, concerning whose motions she made private inquiry, had taken horse with a party, and was gone to the westward in the same direction with Sir Geoffrey.

At length her immediate uneasiness in regard to the safety of her husband and the Countess was removed, by the arrival of Whitaker, with her husband's commendations, and an account of the scuffle betwixt himself and Major Bridgenorth.

Lady Peveril shuddered to see how nearly they had approached to renewal of the scenes of civil discord; and, while she was thankful to Heaven for her husband's immediate preservation, she could not help feeling both regret and apprehension for the consequences of his quarrel with Major Bridgenorth. They had now lost an old friend, who had showed himself such under those circumstances of adversity by which friendship is most severely tried; and she could not disguise from herself, that Bridgenorth, thus irritated, might be a troublesome, if not a dangerous enemy. His rights as a creditor, he had hitherto used with gentleness; but if he should employ rigour, Lady Peveril, whose attention to domestic economy had made her much better acquainted with her husband's affairs than he was himself, foresaw considerable inconvenience from the measures which the law put in his power. She comforted herself with the recollection, however, that she had still a strong hold on Bridgenorth, through his paternal affection, and from the fixed opinion which he had hitherto manifested, that his daughter's health could only flourish while under her charge. But any expectations of reconciliation which Lady Peveril might probably have founded on this circumstance, were frustrated by an incident which took place in the course of the following morning.

The governante, Mistress Deborah, who has been already mentioned, went forth, as usual, with the children, to take their morning exercise in the Park, accompanied by Rachel, a girl who acted occasionally as her assistant in attending upon them. But not as usual did she return. It was near the hour of breakfast, when Ellesmere, with an unwonted degree of primness in her mouth and manner, came to acquaint her lady that Mistress Deborah had not thought proper to come back from the Park, though the breakfast hour approached so near.

"She will come, then, presently," said Lady Peveril, with indifference.

Ellesmere gave a short and doubtful cough, and then proceeded to say, that Rachel had been sent home with little Master Julian, and that Mistress Deborah had been pleased to say, she would walk on with Miss Bridgenorth as far as Moultrassie Holt; which was a point at which the property of the Major, as matters now stood, bounded that of Sir Geoffrey Peveril.

"Is the wench turned silly," exclaimed the lady, something angrily, "that she does not obey my orders, and return at regular hours?"

"She may be turning silly," said Ellesmere, mysteriously; "or she may be turning too sly; and I think it were as well your ladyship looked to it."

"Looked to what, Ellesmere?" said the lady, impatiently. "You are strangely oracular this morning. If you know any thing to the prejudice of this young woman, I pray you speak it out."

"I prejudice!" said Ellesmere; "I scorn to prejudice man, woman, or child, in the way of a fellow-servant; only I wish your ladyship to look about you, and use your own eyes—that is all."

"You bid me use my own eyes, Ellesmere; I suspect," answered the lady, "you would be pleased were I contented to see through your spectacles. I charge you—and you know I will be deaf—I charge you to tell me what you know or suspect about this girl, Deborah Debbitch."

"I see through spectacles!" exclaimed the servant Abigail; "your ladyship will pardon me, for I never use them, unless a pair that belonged to my poor mother, which I put on when your ladyship wants your pinnars curiously wrought. Now above sixteen ever did white-seam without break. And then as to suspecting, I suspect nothing: your ladyship hath taken Mistress Deborah from under my hand, to be sure it is neither her butter of mine. Only," (here she began to pinch her lips shut, so as scarce to permit a sound to escape, and nipping her words as if she pinched off the ends of them before she suffered them to escape,) "madam, if Mistress Deborah goes so often of a morning to Moultrassie Holt, why, I should not be surprised if she should never find the way back."

"Once more, what do you mean, Ellesmere? We were wont to have some sense—let me hear distinctly what the matter is."

"Only, madam," pursued the Abigail, "as Major Bridgenorth came back from Chesterfield, he brought you at the Castle Hall, Mistress Deborah was pleased to carry the children every morning to that place; and it has so happened that she has met the Major, as they call him, there is a rub, for he can walk about now like other folk, without warrant you she hath not been the worse of the meeting—one way at least, for she hath her new hood might serve yourself, madam; but she hath had any thing in hand besides a penny money, no doubt your ladyship is best judge."

Lady Peveril, who readily adopted the most favourable construction of the governante's words, could not help laughing at the idea of a man of Bridgenorth's precise appearance, strict principles, and reserved habits, being suspected of a want of gallantry; and readily concluded, that Mistress Deborah had found her advantage in gratifying her paternal affection by a frequent sight of his daughter, during the few days which intervened betwixt his first arrival at the Castle, and the events which followed. But she was somewhat surprised, when an hour after the usual breakfast hour, during which neither the child nor Mistress Deborah appeared, Major Bridgenorth's only man-servant arrived at the Castle on horseback, dressed as for a journey, having delivered a letter addressed to her lady, and another to Mistress Ellesmere, rode away without waiting any answer.

There would have been nothing remarkable in this, had any other person been concerned; but Major Bridgenorth was so very quiet and orderly in his proceedings—so little liable to act hastily or on impulse, that the least appearance of bustle which was concerned, excited surprise and curiosity.

Lady Peveril broke her letter hastily open, and found that it contained the following lines:—

"For the Hands of the Honourable and Right Lady Peveril—These:

"MADAM—Please it your Ladyship, I write more to excuse myself to your ladyship than to accuse either you or others, in respect of those of others. Neither do I mean to speak of my times, particularly in respect of your worthy ladyship, being sensible that if I have served you in that post when our Israel might be called triumphant, I have more than requited me, in giving to my son a child, redeemed, as it were, from the vale of the shadow of death. And therefore, as I heartily forget your ladyship the unkind and violent measure which you dealt to me at our last meeting, (seeing that the woman who was the cause of strife is accounted one of your kindred people,) I do entreat you, in like manner, to pardon my enticing away from your son the young woman called Deborah Debbitch, who fortune, instructed as she hath been under your ladyship's direction, is, it may be, indispensable to the health of my dearest child. I had purposed, madam, with your gracious permission, that Alice should have remained at Martindale Castle under your kind charge, until she could so far discern betwixt good and evil, that it should be matter of conscience to teach her the way in which she should go. For it is not unknown to your ladyship, and in no way do I speak it reproachfully, but rather sorrowfully, that a person so excellently gifted as yourself—I mean touching natural qualities—has not yet received that true light, which is a lamp to the paths, but are contented to stumble in darkness, and among the graves of bad men. It has been my prayer in the watches of the night, that your ladyship should cease from the doctrine which causeth to err; but I grieve to say, that our candlestick being about to be removed, the land will most likely be involved in deeper darkness than ever; and the return of the King, to which I had many looked forward as a manifestation of divine favour, seems to prove little else than a permitted triumph of the Prince of the Air, who setteth out to restore his Vanity-fair of bishops, deans, and such like, extruding the peaceful ministers of the word, whose labours have proved faithful to many angry souls. So, hearing from a sure hand, that permission has gone forth to restore these dumb dogs, the followers of Laud and of Williams, who were cast forth by the late Parliament, and that an act of Conformity, or rather of deformity, of worship, was to be expected, it is my purpose to fly from the wrath to come, and to seek some corner where I may dwell in peace, and enjoy liberty of conscience. For who would abide in the Sanctuary, after a carved work thereof is broken down, and when hath been made a place for owls, and satyrs of the Idleness?—And here in I blame myself, madam, that I went in the singleness of my heart too readily to that carousing in the house of feasting, wherein my love of union, and my desire to show respect to your ladyship, were made a snare to me. But I trust will be an atonement, that I am now about to absent myself from the place of my birth, and the house of my fathers, as well as from the place which holdeth the dust of those pledges of my affection. I have so to remember, that in this land my honour (after the worldly estimation) hath been abated, and my ability circumscribed, by your husband, Sir Geoffrey Peveril; and that without any chance of my obtaining reparation at his hand, whereby I may say the end of a kinsman was lifted up against my credit and my life. These things are bitter to the taste of the old Adam; wherefore, to prevent farther bickerings, and, it may be, bloodshed, it is better that I leave this land for a time. The affairs which remain to be settled between Sir Geoffrey and myself, shall place in the hand of the righteous Master Joachim Win-the-Fight, an attorney in Chester, who will arrange them with such attention to Sir Geoffrey's convenience, as justice and the due exercise of the law, will permit; for, as I trust I shall have grace to resist the temptation to make the weapons of carnal warfare the instruments of my revenge, so I turn to effect it through the means of Mammon. Pishing, madam, that the Lord may grant you every blessing, and, in especial, that which is over all others, namely, the true knowledge of His way,

"I remain, your devoted servant to command,

"RALPH BRIDGENORTH.

Written at Moultrassie-Hall, this tenth day of July, 1660.

So soon as Lady Peveril had perused this long and regular homily, in which it seemed to her that her neighbour showed more spirit of religious fanaticism than she could have supposed him possessed of, she looked up and beheld Ellesmere,—with a countenance which mortification, and an affected air of contempt, seemed to struggle together,—who, tired with watching the expression of her mistress's countenance, applied for confirmation of her suspicions in plain terms.

"I suppose, madam," said the waiting-woman,

VOL. IV.—W

"the fanatic fool intends to marry the wench? They say he goes to shift the country. Truly it's time, indeed; for, besides that the whole neighbourhood would laugh him to scorn, I should not be surprised if Lance Outram, the keeper, gave him a buck's head to bear; for that is all in the way of his office."

"There is no great occasion for your spite at present, Ellesmere," replied her lady. "My letter says nothing of marriage; but it would appear that Master Bridgenorth, being to leave this country, has engaged Deborah to take care of his child; and I am sure I am heartily glad of it, for the infant's sake."

"And I am glad of it for my own," said Ellesmere; "and, indeed, for the sake of the whole house.—And your ladyship thinks she is not like to be married to him? Troth, I could never see how he should be such an idiot; but perhaps she is going to do worse, for she speaks here of coming to high preferment, and that scarce comes by honest service now-a-days; then she writes me about sending her things, as if I were mistress of the wardrobe to her ladyship—ay, and recommends Master Julian to the care of my age and experience, forsooth, as if she needed to recommend the dear little jewel to me; and then, to speak of my age—But I will bundle away her rags to the Hall, with a witness!"

"Do it with all civility," said the lady, "and let Whitaker send her the wages for which she has served, and a broad-piece over and above; for, though a light-headed young woman, she was kind to the children."

"I know who is kind to their servants, madam, and would spoil the best ever pinned a gown."

"I spoiled a good one, Ellesmere, when I spoiled thee," said the lady; "but tell Mrs. Deborah to kiss the little Alice for me, and to offer my good wishes to Major Bridgenorth, for his temporal and future happiness."

She permitted no observation or reply, but dismissed her attendant, without entering into farther particulars.

When Ellesmere had withdrawn, Lady Peveril began to reflect, with much feeling of compassion, on the letter of Major Bridgenorth; a person in whom there were certainly many excellent qualities, but whom a series of domestic misfortunes, and the increasing gloom of a sincere, yet stern feeling of devotion, rendered lonely and unhappy; and she had more than one anxious thought for the happiness of the little Alice, brought up, as she was likely to be, under such a father. Still the removal of Bridgenorth was, on the whole, a desirable event; for while he remained at the Hall, it was but too likely that some accidental collision with Sir Geoffrey might give rise to a rencontre betwixt them, more fatal than the last had been.

In the meanwhile, she could not help expressing to Doctor Dummerar her surprise and sorrow, that all which she had done and attempted, to establish peace and unanimity betwixt the contending factions, had been perversely fated to turn out the very reverse of what she had aimed at.

"But for my unhappy invitation," she said, "Bridgenorth would not have been at the Castle on the morning which succeeded the feast, would not have seen the Countess, and would not have incurred the resentment and opposition of my husband. And but for the King's return, an event which was so anxiously expected as the termination of all our calamities, neither the noble lady nor ourselves had been engaged in this new path of difficulty and danger."

"Honoured madam," said Doctor Dummerar, "were the affairs of this world to be guided implicitly by human wisdom, or were they uniformly to fall out according to the conjectures of human foresight, events would no longer be under the domination of that time and chance, which happen unto all men, since we should, in the one case, work out our own purposes to a certainty, by our own skill, and, in the other, regulate our conduct according to the views of unerring prescience. But man is, while in this vale of tears, like an un instructed bowler, so to speak, who thinks to attain the jack, by delivering his bowl straight forward upon it, being ignorant that there is a concealed bias within the spheroid, which will make and forsake the wavering, whom his continued cares might have directed into the right path—these were of themselves deep causes of sorrow, and were aggravated, doubtless, by those natural feelings with which all men, especially those whose duties or habits have confined them to a limited circle, regard the separation from wonted scenes, and their accustomed haunts of solitary musing, or social intercourse.

There was, indeed, a plan of placing Mr. Solsgrace at the head of a nonconforming congregation in his present parish, which his followers would have readily consented to endow with a sufficient revenue. But although the act for universal conformity was not yet passed, such a measure was understood to be impending, and there existed a general opinion among the Presbyterians, that in no hands was it likely to be more strictly enforced, than in those of Peveril of the Peak. Solsgrace himself considered not only his personal danger as being considerable,—for, assuming perhaps more consequence than was actually attached to him or his productions, he conceived the honest Knight to be his mortal and determined enemy,—but he also conceived that he should serve the cause of his church by absenting himself from Derbyshire.

"Less known pastors," he said, "though perhaps more worthy of the name, may be permitted to assemble the scattered flocks in caverns or in secret wilds, and to them shall the gleanings of the grapes of Ephraim be better than the vintage of Abiezer. But I, that have so often carried the banner forth against the mighty—I, whose tongue hath testified, morning and evening, like the watchman upon the tower, against Popery, Prelacy, and the tyrant of the Peak—for me to abide here, were but to bring the sword of bloody vengeance amongst you, that the shepherd might be smitten, and the sheep scattered. The shedders of blood have already assailed me, even within that ground which they themselves call consecrated; and yourselves have seen the scalp of the righteous broken, as he defended my cause. Therefore, I will put on my sandals, and gird my loins, and depart to a far country, and there do as my duty shall call upon me, whether it be to act or to suffer—to bear testimony at the stake or in the pulpit."

Such were the sentiments which Mr. Solsgrace expressed to his desponding friends, and which he expatiated upon at more length with Major Bridgenorth; not failing, with friendly zeal, to rebuke the haste which the latter had shown to thrust out the hand of fellowship to the Amalekite woman, whereby he reminded him, "He had been rendered her slave and bondsman for a season, like Samson, betrayed by Delilah, and might have remained longer in the house of Dagon, had not Heaven pointed to him a way out of the snare. Also, it sprung originally from the Major's going up to feast in the high place of Baal, that he who was the champion of the truth was stricken down, and put to shame by the enemy, even in the presence of the host."

These oburgations seeming to give some offence to Major Bridgenorth, who liked, no better than any other man, to hear of his own mishaps, and at the same time to have them imputed to his own misconduct, the worthy divine proceeded to take shame to himself for his own sinful compliance in that matter; for to the vengeance justly due for that unhappy dinner at Martindale Castle, (which was, he said, a crying of peace when there was no peace, and a dwelling in the tents of sin,) he imputed his ejection from his living, with the destruction of some of his most pithy and highly prized volumes of divinity, with the loss of his cap, gown, and band, and a double hogshhead of choice Derby ale.

The mind of Major Bridgenorth was strongly tinged with devotional feeling, which his late misfortunes had rendered more deep and solemn; and it is therefore no wonder, that, when he heard these arguments urged again and again, by a pastor whom he so much respected, and who was now a sufferer in the cause of their joint faith, he began to look back with disapproval on his own conduct, and to suspect that he had permitted himself to be seduced by gratitude towards Lady Peveril, and by her arguments in favour of a mutual and tolerant liberality of sentiments, into an action which had a tendency to compromise his religious and political principles.

One morning, as Major Bridgenorth had occupied himself with several details respecting the management of his affairs, he was reposing in the leather easy-chair, beside the latticed window, a pane of which, by natural association, recalled to his memory of former times, and the feelings which he was wont to expect the returning of Sir Geoffrey, who brought him news of his country welfare.—"Surely," he said, thinking as he lay aloud, "there was no sin in the kindness which I then regarded that man."

Solsgrace who was in the apartment, and perceived what passed through his friend's mind, as he was with every point of his history, replied, "When God caused Elijah to be fed by ravens while hiding at the brook Cherith, we hear him fondling the unclean birds, whom, contrary to his purifying nature, a miracle compelled to minister to him."

"It may be so," answered Bridgenorth, "but the flap of their wings must have been graceful as the ear of the famished prophet, like the tread of a horse in mine. The ravens, doubtless, were of a different nature when the season was passed, and as he has fared with him.—Hark!" he exclaimed, "I hear his horse's hoof tramp even now."

It was seldom that the echoes of that noise in the court-yard were awakened by the tramp of horses, but such was now the case.

Both Bridgenorth and Solsgrace were up at the sound, and even disposed to suspect some farther oppression on the part of government, when the Major's old servant introduced, with a ceremonious bow, (for his manners were nearly as polished as his master's,) a tall gentleman on the far side of middle life, whose vest and cloak, long hair, and ed hat, and drooping feather, announced him as a Cavalier. He bowed formally, but courteously to both gentlemen, and said, that he was "Sir Jasper Cranbourne, charged with an especial message from Master Ralph Bridgenorth of Moultrassie-Hall, his honourable friend Sir Geoffrey Peveril of the Peak, and that he requested to know whether Major Bridgenorth would be pleased to receive his acquittal of commission here or elsewhere."

"Any thing which Sir Geoffrey Peveril may wish to say to me," said Major Bridgenorth, "may be told instantly, and before my friend, from whom I have no secrets."

"The presence of any other friend were, indeed, being objectionable, the thing in the world most to be desired," said Sir Jasper, after a moment's hesitation, and looking at Mr. Solsgrace; "but this gentleman seems to be a sort of clergyman."

"I am not conscious of any secrets," answered Bridgenorth, "nor do I desire to have any, in which a clergyman is an unfitting confidant."

"At your pleasure," replied Sir Jasper, "in confidence, for aught I know, may be well chosen, for your divines (always under your foot) have proved no enemies to such matters as I am to treat with you upon."

"Proceed, sir," answered Mr. Bridgenorth, politely; "and I pray you to be seated, unless it is your pleasure to stand."

"I must, in the first place, deliver myself of a small commission," answered Sir Jasper, drawing himself up; "and it will be after I have seen the reception thereof, that I shall know whether I am not, to sit down at Moultrassie-Hall.—Sir Geoffrey Peveril, Master Bridgenorth, hath carefully considered with himself the unhappy circumstances which at present separate you as neighbours. He remembers many passages in former times, which I speak his very words—which incline him to all that can possibly consist with his honour, to wipe out unkindness between you; and for this desirable object he is willing to condescend to a degree, which, as you could not have expected, will no doubt give you great pleasure to learn."

"How me to say, Sir Jasper," said Bridgenorth, "that is unnecessary. I have made no mention of Sir Geoffrey. I have required no opinion from him. I am about to leave this country, what affairs we may have together, can be settled by others as by ourselves."

"In word," said the doctor, "the worthy Major Bridgenorth hath had enough of trafficking with you, and will no longer, on any terms, consort with them."

"Wellness both," said Sir Jasper, with supercilious politeness, bowing, "you greatly mistake error of my commission which you will do us to hear out before making any reply to it."

"Major Bridgenorth, you cannot but remember letter to the Lady Peveril, of which I have here a copy in which you complain of the hard use which you have received at Sir Geoffrey's, and in particular, when he pulled you from horse at or near Hartley-wick. Now, Sir, you think so well of you, as to believe, that, it not for the wide difference betwixt his deand rank and your own, you would have it to bring this matter to a gentlemanlike settlement, as the only mode when by your stain is honourably wiped away. Wherefore in this note, he gives you, in his generosity, the offer not you, in your modesty, but to nothing else, to impute your acquiescence, I have declined to read of him. And withal, I bring you the point of his weapon, and when you have accepted the which I now offer you, I shall be ready to the time, place, and other circumstances of meeting."

"And I," said Solarrace, with a solemn voice, "did the further of evil tempt my friend to accept so dishonourably a proposal, would be the first offence against him sentence of the greater punishment."

"Is not you whom I address, reverend sir," replied even; "your interest, not ungenerally, may give you to be more anxious about your patient than about his honour. I must know, himself, to which he is disposed to give the precedence."

"Saying, and with a graceful bow, he again addressed the challenge to Major Bridgenorth. There was already a struggle in that gentleman's breast, in the suggestions of human honour and those of generous principle, but the latter prevailed. He waived receiving the paper which Sir Jasper offered him, and spoke to the following purpose:

"As not be known to you, Sir Jasper, that more moral pouring out of Christian light upon this sin, many solid men have been led to doubt of the shocking human blood by the hand of a creature be in any respect justifiable. And although this rule appears to me to be scarcely able to our state in this stage of trial, being, only non resistance, if general, would necessarily valued and good rights into the hands of what, during tyrants might use the same, yet I had have been, inclined to limit the use of carnal to the case of necessary self-defence, whether regards our own person, or the protection of country against invasion; or of our rights of us, and the freedom of our laws and of our arms against usurping power. And as I have shown myself unwilling to draw my sword in the latter cause, so you shall excuse my suffering it now to remain in the scabbard, when, as sustained a grievous injury, the man who did it summons me to combat, either upon an accident, or, as is more likely, in mere bravado."

"I have heard you with patience," said Sir Jasper; now, Master Bridgenorth, take it not amiss, if I yeth you to bethink yourself better on this. I vow to Heaven, sir, that your honour be doing; and that in condoning nothing to afford you if meeting, and then in giving you some character wounds, Sir Geoffrey has been moved by her sense of your condition, and an earnest to redeem your dishonour. And it will be but owing of your blade with his honoured sword for the space of some few minutes, and you will either live or die a noble and honoured gentleman. Besides, that the Knight's exquisite skill of fence may enable him as his good nature will incline him, to disarm you with some flesh wound, little to the damage of your person, and greatly to the benefit of your reputation."

"The weak maxims of the wicked," said Master Solarrace, emphatically by way of commenting on this speech, which Sir Jasper had uttered very pathetically, "are cruel."

"I pray to have no farther interruption from your reverence," said Sir Jasper, "especially as I think this affair very little concerns you; and I entreat that you permit me to discharge myself regularly of my commission from my worthy friend."

"Saying he took his sheathed rapier from his belt, and passing the point through the silk thread which secured the letter, he once more, and literally at sword point, gracefully tendered it to Major Bridgenorth, who again waved it aside, though cocking deeply at the same time, as if he was putting a marked constraint upon himself—drew back, and made Sir Jasper Cranbourne a deep bow.

"Since it is to be thus," said Sir Jasper, "I must myself do violence to the seal of Sir Geoffrey's letter, and read it to you, that I may fully acquit myself of the charge intrusted to me, and make you, Master Bridgenorth, equally aware of the generous intentions of Sir Geoffrey on your behalf."

"If," said Major Bridgenorth, "the contents of the letter be to no other purpose than you have intimated, methinks further ceremony is unnecessary on this occasion, as I have already taken my course."

"Nevertheless," said Sir Jasper, breaking open the letter, "it is fitting that I read to you the letter of my worshipful friend." And he read accordingly as follows:—

"For the worthy hands of Ralph Bridgenorth, Esquire, of Mountlake Hall—This:

"By the honoured conveyance of the Worshipful Sir Jasper Cranbourne, Knight, of Long-Mallington.

"MAYEN BUCKINGHAM.

"We have been given to understand by your letter to our loving wife, Dame Margaret Peveril, that you had had construction of certain passages betwixt you and I of a late date, as if your honour could have been in some sort prejudiced by what then took place. And although you have not thought it fit to have direct answer to me, in respect of such satisfaction as is due from one gentleman of condition to another, yet I am fully minded that this proceeds only from modesty, arising out of the distinction of our degree, and from no lack of that courage which you have heretofore displayed, I would I could say in a good cause. Wherefore I am purposed to give you, by my friend Sir Jasper Cranbourne, a meeting for the sake of doing that which shall do you entirely good, for Sir Jasper will deliver you the length of my weapon, and appoint circumstances and an hour for our meeting, which, whether early or late—on foot or horseback—with rapier or backsword, I refer to your self, with all the other privileges of a challenged person, only desiring, that if you choose to match my weapon, you will send me forthwith the length and breadth of your own. And nothing doubting that the issue of this meeting must needs be to end, in one way or other, all unhappiness betwixt two near neighbours.

"I remain, your humble servant to command,

"GEORGEY PEVERIL OF THE PRAE.

"Given from my poor house of Mountlake Castle, this second of — sixteen hundred and sixty."

"But back my respects to Sir Geoffrey Peveril," said Major Bridgenorth. "According to his light, his meaning may be fair towards me. But tell him that our quarrel lead its way in his own wish against us towards him, and that though I wish to be in charity with a friend, I am not so weak to let his friendship go to break the laws of God, and run the risk of suffering or committing murder, in order to regain it. And, for you, sir, methinks your ed-

"I was that man," he replied, "while oppression left me a name."

He spoke nothing more, but continued to walk beside her for a minute or two in silence. She felt her situation embarrassing; and to divest it of that feeling, as well as out of real interest in the question, she asked him, "How her god-daughter Alice now was?"

"Of god-daughter, madam," answered Major Bridgenorth, "I know nothing; that being one of the names which have been introduced, to the corruption and pollution of God's ordinances. The infant who owed to your ladyship (so called) her escape from disease and death, is a healthy and thriving girl, as I am given to understand by those in whose charge she is lodged, for I have not lately seen her. And it is even the recollection of those passages, which in a manner implicated me, alarmed also by your fall, to offer myself to you in this time and mood, which in other respects is no way consistent with my present safety."

"With your safety, Master Bridgenorth?" said the Lady Peveril; "surely, I could never have thought that it was in danger!"

"You have some news, then, yet to learn, madam," said Major Bridgenorth; "but you will hear, in the course of to-morrow, reasons why I dare not appear openly in the neighbourhood of my own property, and wherefore there is small prospect in committing the knowledge of my present residence to any one connected with Martindale Castle."

"Master Bridgenorth," said the lady, "you were, in former times, prudent and cautious. I hope you have been misled by no hasty impression—by no rash scheme—I hope—"

"Pardon my interrupting you, madam," said Bridgenorth. "I have indeed been changed—ay, my very heart within me has been changed. In the times to which your ladyship so graciously thinks proper to refer, I was a man of this world—bestowing on it all my thoughts—all my actions, save formal observances—little dreaming what was the duty of a Christian man, and how far his self-denial ought to extend—even unto giving all as if he gave nothing. Hence I thought chiefly on carnal things—on the adding of field to field, and wealth to wealth—of the balancing between party and party—securing a friend here, without losing a friend there. But Heaven smote me for my apostasy, the rather that I abused the name of religion, as a self-deceiver, and a most blinded and carnal will-worshipper. But I thank Him who hath at length brought me out of Egypt."

In our day—although we have many instances of enthusiasm among us—we might still suspect one who avowed it thus suddenly and broadly, of hypocrisy, or of insanity; but, according to the fashion of the times, such opinions as those which Bridgenorth expressed, were openly pleaded as the ruling motives of men's actions. The sagacious Vane—the brave and skillful Harrison—were men who acted avowedly under the influence of such. Lady Peveril, therefore, was more grieved than surprised at the language she heard Major Bridgenorth use, and reasonably concluded, that the society and circumstances in which he might lately have been engaged, had blown into a flame the spark of eccentricity which always smouldered in his bosom. This was the more probable, considering that he was melancholy by constitution and descent—that he had been unfortunate in several particulars—and that no passion is more easily nursed by melancholy than the species of enthusiasm of which he now showed tokens. She therefore answered him by calmly hoping, "That the expression of his sentiments had not involved him in suspicion or in danger."

"In suspicion, madam?" answered the Major;—"for I cannot forbear giving to you, such is the strength of habit, one of those idle titles by which we poor potsherds are wont, in our pride, to denominate each other. I walk not only in suspicion, but in that degree of danger, that, were your husband to meet me at this instant—me, a native Englishman, treading on my own lands—I have no doubt he would do his best to offer me to the Moloch of Romish superstition, who now rages abroad for victims and their people."

"You surprise me by your language, Major Bridgenorth," said the lady, who now felt rather than to be relieved from his company, and with that pose walked on somewhat hastily. He made no pace, however, and kept close by her side.

"Know you not," said he, "that Satan bowed down upon earth with great wrath, because his reign is short? The next heir to the crown is a real Papist; and I who dare assert, save sycophants and time-servers, that he who wears it is not yet ready to stoop to Rome, were he not kept in check by a few noble spirits in the Commons' House! I believe not this—yet in my solitary and midnight walks, when I thought on your kindness to the dead and to the living, it was my prayer that I might be means granted to warn you—and lo! I have heard me."

"Major Bridgenorth," said Lady Peveril, "we were wont to be moderate in these sentences—comparatively moderate, at least, and to keep our own religion, without hating that of others."

"What I was while in the gall of bitterness; the bond of iniquity, it signifies not to me," answered he. "I was then like to Galba, who cared for none of these things. I devoted on creature-forts—I clung to worldly honour and my thoughts were earthward—or those I turned to heaven were cold, formal, pharisaical meditations—brought nothing to the altar save straw and stubble. Heaven saw need to chastise me in love—I was peevish of all that I clung to on earth—my worldly life was torn from me—I went forth an exile from the home of my fathers, a deprived and desolate man, a battered and beaten, and dishonoured man. How shall I find out the ways of Providence? Seek the means by which I was chosen forth as a champion for the truth—holding my life as nothing, that may be advanced. But this was what I wished to speak of. Thou hast saved the earthly life of my child—let me save the eternal life of yours."

Lady Peveril was silent. They were now approaching the point where the avenue terminated in a communication with the public road, or rather way, running through an unenclosed common. Thus the lady had to prosecute for a little way, and a turn of the path gave her admittance into the park of Martindale. She now felt sincerely anxious to reach the open moonshine, and avoided reply to the Major, that she might make the more haste. As they reached the junction of the avenue and the park, he laid his hand on her arm, and commanded her rather than requested her to stop. She obeyed, and pointed to a huge oak, of the largest size, which grew on the summit of a knoll in the open grass, which terminated the avenue, and was exactly placed as to serve for a termination to the vista. In moonshine without the avenue was so strong, its midst the flood of light which it poured on the venerable tree, they could easily discover, from the shattered state of the boughs on one side, that it had suffered damage from lightning. "Remember you," said he, "when we last looked together on that tree, I had ridden from London, and brought with me a petition from the committee for your husband; and I passed the spot—here on this spot where we now stand, you stood with my lost Alice—two—the two of my beloved infants gambolled before me—I leaped from my horse—to her I was a husband—to those a father—to you a welcome and revered protector. What am I now to any one?" He pressed his hand on his brow, and groaned in agony of spirit.

It was not in the Lady Peveril's nature to be sorrow without an attempt at consolation. "Major Bridgenorth," she said, "I blame no man's creed while I believe and follow my own; and I regret that in yours you have sought consolation for temporal afflictions. But does not every Christian exhort us alike, that affliction should soften our heart?"

"Ay, woman," said Bridgenorth, sternly, "as the lightning which shattered yonder oak hath softened its trunk. No; the seared wood is the fitter for the ness of the workmen—the hardened and the dried-up heart is that which can best bear the task imposed by these dismal times. God and man will no longer endure the unbridled profligacy of the dissolute—the scoffing of the profane—the contempt of the divine laws—the infraction of human rights. The times demand righters and avengers, and there will be no want of them."

"I deny not the existence of much evil," said Lady Peveril, compelling herself to answer, and beginning at the same time to walk forward; "and from hearsay, though not, I thank Heaven, from observation, I am convinced of the wild debauchery of the times. But let us trust it may be corrected without such violent remedies as you hint at. Surely the ruin of a second civil war—though I trust your thoughts go not that dreadful length—were at best a desperate alternative."

"Sharp, but sure," replied Bridgenorth. "The blood of the Paschal lamb chased away the destroying angel—the sacrifices offered on the threshing-floor of Araunah, stayed the pestilence. Fire and sword are severe remedies, but they purge and purify."

"Alas! Major Bridgenorth," said the lady, "wise and moderate in your youth, can you have adopted in your advanced life the thoughts and language of those whom you yourself beheld drive themselves and the nation to the brink of ruin?"

"I know not what I then was—you know not what I now am," he replied, and suddenly broke off; for they even then came forth into the open light, and it seemed as if, feeling himself under the lady's eye, he was disposed to soften his tone and his language.

At the first distinct view which she had of his person, she was aware that he was armed with a short sword, a poniard, and pistols at his belt—precautions very unusual for a man who formerly had seldom, and only on days of ceremony, carried a walking rapier, though such was the habitual and constant practice of gentlemen of his station in life. There seemed also something of more stern determination than usual in his air, which indeed had always been rather sullen than affable; and ere she could repress the sentiment, she could not help saying, "Master Bridgenorth, you are indeed changed."

"You see but the outward man," he replied; "the change within is yet deeper. But it was not of myself that I desired to talk—I have already said, that as you have preserved my child from the darkness of the grave, I would willingly preserve yours from that more utter darkness, which, I fear, hath involved the path and walks of his father."

"I must not hear this of Sir Geoffrey," said the Lady Peveril; "I must bid you farewell for the present; and when we again meet at more a suitable time, I will at least listen to your advice concerning Julian, although I should not perhaps incline to it."

"That more suitable time may never come," replied Bridgenorth. "Time wanes, eternity draws nigh. Harken! It is said to be your purpose to send the young Julian to be bred up in yonder bloody island, under the hand of your kinswoman, that cruel murderess, by whom was done to death a man more worthy of vital existence than any that she can boast among her vaunted ancestry. These are current tidings—are they true?"

"I do not blame you, Master Bridgenorth, for thinking harshly of my cousin of Derby," said Lady Peveril; "nor do I altogether vindicate the rash action of which she hath been guilty. Nevertheless, in her habitation, it is my husband's opinion and my own, that Julian may be trained in the studies and accomplishments becoming his rank, along with the young Earl of Derby."

"Under the curse of God, and the blessing of the Pope of Rome," said Bridgenorth. "You, lady, so quicksighted in matters of earthly prudence, are you blind to the gigantic pace at which Rome is moving to regain this country, once the richest gem in her usurped tiara? The old are seduced by gold—the youth by pleasure—the weak by flattery—cowards by fear—and the courageous by ambition. A thousand baits for each taste, and each bait concealing the same deadly hook."

X

"I am well aware, Master Bridgenorth," said Lady Peveril, "that my kinswoman is a Catholic;* but her son is educated in the Church of England's principles, agreeably to the command of her deceased husband."

"Is it likely," answered Bridgenorth, "that she, who fears not shedding the blood of the righteous, whether on the field or scaffold, will regard the sanction of her promise when her religion bids her break it? Or, if she does, what shall your son be the better, if he remain in the mire of his father? What are your Episcopal tenets but mere Popery, save that ye have chosen a temporal tyrant for your Pope, and substitute a mangled mass in English for that which your predecessors pronounced in Latin?—But why speak I of these things to one who hath ears indeed, and eyes, yet cannot see, listen to, or understand, what is alone worthy to be heard, seen, and known? Pity, that what hath been wrought so fair and exquisite in form and in disposition, should be yet blind, deaf, and ignorant, like the things which perish!"

"We shall not agree on these subjects, Master Bridgenorth," said the lady, anxious still to escape from this strange conference, though scarce knowing what to apprehend; "once more, I must bid you farewell."

"Stay yet an instant," he said, again laying his hand on her arm; "I would stop you if I saw you rushing on the brink of an actual precipice—let me prevent you from a danger still greater. How shall I work upon your unbelieving mind? Shall I tell you that the debt of bloodshed yet remains a debt to be paid by the bloody house of Derby? And wilt thou send thy son to be among those from whom it shall be exacted?"

"You wish to alarm me in vain, Master Bridgenorth," answered the lady; "what penalty can be exacted from the Countess for an action which I have already called a rash one, has been long since levied."

"You deceive yourself," retorted he, sternly.—"Think you a paltry sum of money, given to be wasted on the debaucheries of Charles, can atone for the death of such a man as Christian—a man precious alike to heaven and to earth? Not on such terms is the blood of the righteous to be poured forth! Every hour's delay is numbered down as adding interest to the grievous debt, which will one day be required from that blood-thirsty woman."

At this moment the distant tread of horses was heard on the rock on which they held this singular dialogue. Bridgenorth listened a moment, and then said, "Forget that you have seen me—name not my name to your nearest or dearest—lock my counsel in your breast—profit by it, and it shall be well with you."

So saying, he turned from her, and, plunging through a gap in the fence, regained the cover of his own wood, along which the path still led.

The noise of horses advancing at full trot, now came nearer; and Lady Peveril was aware of several riders, whose forms rose indistinctly on the summit of the rising ground behind her. She became also visible to them; and one or two of the foremost made towards her at increased speed, challenging her as they advanced with the cry of "Stand! Who goes there?" The foremost who came up, however, exclaimed, "Mercy on us if it be not my lady!" and Lady Peveril, at the same moment recognized one of her own servants. Her husband rode up immediately afterwards, with, "How now, Dame Margaret? What makes you abroad so far from home, and at an hour so late?"

Lady Peveril mentioned her visit at the cottage, but did not think it necessary to say aught of having seen Major Bridgenorth; afraid, perhaps, that her husband might be displeased with that incident.

"Charity is a fine thing, and a fair," answered Sir Geoffrey; "but I must tell you, you do ill, dame, to wander about the country like a quacksalver, at the call of every old woman who has a colic-fit; and at this time of night especially, and when the land is so unsettled besides."

* I have elsewhere noticed that this is a deviation from the truth—Charlotte, Countess of Derby, was a Huguenot.

"I am sorry to hear that it is so," said the lady. "I had heard no such news."

"News!" repeated Sir Geoffrey; "why, here has a new plot broken out among the Roundheads, worse than Venner's by a butt's length; and who should be so deep in it as our old neighbour Bridgenorth! There is a search for him everywhere; and I promise you, if he is found, he is like to pay old scores!"

"Then I am sure, I trust he will not be found," said Lady Peveril.

"Do you so?" replied Sir Geoffrey. "Now I, on my part, hope that he will; and it shall not be my fault if he be not; for which effect I will presently ride down to Moultrassie, and make strict search, according to my duty; there shall neither rebel nor traitor earth so near Martindale Castle, that I will assure them. And you, my lady, be pleased for once to dispense with a pillion, and get up, as you have done before, behind Saunders, who shall convey you safe home."

The lady obeyed in silence; indeed, she did not dare to trust her voice in an attempt to reply, so much was she disconcerted with the intelligence she had just heard.

She rode behind the groom to the Castle, where she awaited in great anxiety the return of her husband. He came back at length; but, to her great relief, without any prisoner. He then explained more fully than his haste had before permitted, that an express had come down to Chesterfield, with news from Court of a purposed insurrection amongst the old Commonwealth men, especially those who had served in the army; and that Bridgenorth, said to be lurking in Derbyshire, was one of the principal conspirators.

After some time, this report of a conspiracy seemed to die away like many others of that period. The warrants were recalled, but nothing more was seen or heard of Major Bridgenorth; although it is probable he might safely enough have shown himself as openly as many did who lay under the same circumstances of suspicion.

About this time also, Lady Peveril, with many tears, took a temporary leave of her son Julian, who was sent, as had long been intended, for the purpose of sharing the education of the young Earl of Derby. Although the boding words of Bridgenorth sometimes

* The celebrated insurrection of the Anabaptists and Fifth Monarchy men in London, in the year 1651.

† Persecution of the Puritans.—It is naturally to be supposed that the twenty years' triumph of the roundheads, and the violence towards the malcontents as they were wont to call the cavaliers, had generated many grudges and feuds almost every neighbour against his neighbour, which the victorious party failed not to act upon, so soon as the Restoration gave them an opportunity. Captain Hodgeson, a parliamentary officer, whose wife had been married to a cavalier, gives us many instances of this. "I tell you," says he, "what a long and winding account of his sufferings."

"It was after the King's return to London, one night a parcel of armed men comes to my house at Colley Hall, near Halifax, and in an unseasonable hour, the ruffians demand entrance, and my servants having some discourse with them on the outside, they gave threatening language, and put their pistols in at the windows. My wife being with child, I ordered the door to be opened, and they came in. After they had presented a pistol to my breast, they showed me their authority to apprehend me, under the hands and seals of two knights and deputy-lieutenants, for speaking treasonable words against the King. The cavalier captain was conveyed to prison at Bradford, and had refused. His prosecutor proved to be one Daniel Lyster, brother to the peace-officer who headed the troop for his apprehension. It seems that the prisoner Hodgeson had once in former days bound over to his good behaviour this Daniel Lyster, then accused of adultery and other debauched habits. "After the King came in," says Hodgeson, "this man meets me, and demands the names of those that informed against him, and a copy of their information. I told him that the business was over, and that it was not reasonable to rip up old troubles, on which he threatened me, and said he would have them. 'The son,' he said, 'now shines on our side of the hedge.' Such being his accuser, Hodgeson was tried for having said, 'There is a crown provided, but the King will never wear it,' to which was added, that he alleged he had 'never been a turncoat; never took the oath of allegiance, and never would do.' Little or no part of the charge was proved, while on the contrary it was shown that the prosecutor had been heard to say, that if times ever changed, he would sit on Hodgeson's skirts. In fine, Hodgeson escaped for five months' imprisonment, about thirty pounds' expenses, and the necessity of swallowing the oath of allegiance, which seems to have been a bitter pill.

About the middle of June, 1662, Captain Hodgeson was again arrested in a summary manner by one Peckles an attorney, quarter-master to Sir John Armytage's troop of horse-militia, with about twelve other cavaliers, who used him rudely, called him rebel and traitor, and seemed to wish to pick a quarrel with him, upon occurred to Lady Peveril's mind, she did not ask them to weigh with her in opposition to the advantages which the patronage of the Countess of Derby secured to her son.

The plan seemed to be in every respect second; and when, from time to time, Julian visited the house of his father, Lady Peveril had the satisfaction to see him on every occasion, improved in person in manner, as well as ardent in the pursuit of his solid acquirements. In process of time he became gallant and accomplished youth, and travelled in some time upon the continent with the young Earl. This was the more especially necessary for the enlarging of their acquaintance with the world; because the Countess had never appeared in London, or at Court of King Charles, since her flight to the King's Man in 1660; but had resided in solitary and sequestered state, alternately on her estates in England in that island.

This had given to the education of both the young men, otherwise as excellent as the best tutor could render it, something of a narrow and reserved character; but though the disposition of the young Earl was lighter and more volatile than that of Julian, both the one and the other had profited in considerable degree, by the opportunities afforded to them. It was Lady Derby's strict injunction to her son, on returning from the continent, that he should appear at the Court of Charles. But having for some time of age, he did not think it absolutely necessary to obey her in this particular; and had remained for some time in London, partaking the pleasures of the gay Court there, with all the ardour of a young man bred up in comparative seclusion.

In order to reconcile the Countess to the regression of her authority, (for he continued to retain for her the profound respect in which he had been educated,) Lord Derby agreed to make a sojourn with her in her favourite island, when she abandoned almost entirely to her management.

Julian Peveril had spent at Martindale Castle a good deal of the time which his friend had been in London; and at the period to which, passing many years, our story has arrived, as it were, presently, they were both living, as the Countess's guest in the Castle of Rushin, in the venerable King's Man.

which he demanded to see their authority. Peckles laid it on his sword, and told him it was better authority than was granted by Cromwell. They satisfied him, however, in part, which he partly owed to the valour of his landlady, who sat at the table and betwixt him and danger, and kept his words at some distance.

He was afterwards accused of having assembled some troops from his having been accidentally seen riding with a soldier in which accusation he also escaped. Finally, he fell under suspicion of being concerned in a plot, of which the secret was known. On this charge he is not explicit, but the plot found the bill of attainder.

After this the poor Roundhead was again repeated arrested, and the last occasion we shall notice occurred 11th September, 1662, when he was disarmed by his old friend Peckles, at the head of a party. He demanded to see the warrant on which he was answered as formerly, by the quarter-master, holding his hand on his sword hilt, saying it was a better order than Oliver used to give. At length a warrant was produced, and the son submitting to the search, they took from his dwelling better than of value in flowing pieces, pistols, muskets, and such like. A quarrel ensued about his buff coat, which the son refused to deliver, alleging they had no authority to take it without an order. To this he remained constant, even after the period of the attack of Sir John Armytage, who called him rebel and traitor, and said, "If I did not send the buff coat with all else he would come to me to-day." "I tell him," says Hodgeson, "I was no rebel, and he did not call me so before these soldiers and gentlemen, to make me the mark for every one to shoot at. The buff coat was then peremptorily demanded, and at last seized by open force. One of Sir John Armytage's brethren was it for many years after, making good Prince Henry's observation, that a buff jacket is a most sweet robe of durance. An arm of Sir John's came to compound for this garment of proof. Hodgeson says he would not have taken ten pounds for it. Sir John would have given about four, but insisting on the owner's not for the money, which its former possessor was unwilling to give, the two magistrates kept both sides, and Hodgeson never more satisfied.

We will not prosecute Mr. Hodgeson's tale of petty grievances any farther. Enough has been said to display the melancholy picture of the country after the civil war, and to show the civil animosity and oppression which must have extended itself over the face of England, since there was scarcely a county in which battles had not been fought, and deep injuries sustained, during ascendancy of the roundheads, which were not afterwards retaliated by the vengeance of the cavaliers.

suffering under the infliction of ennui—now looking into a volume of Homer—now whistling—now swinging on his chair—now traversing the room—till, at length, his attention became swallowed up in admiration of the tranquillity of his companion.

"King of men!" he said, repeating the favourite epithet by which Homer describes Agamemnon.—"I trust, for the old Greek's sake, he had a merrier office than being King of Men—Most philosophical Julian, will nothing rouse thee—not even a bad pun on my own royal dignity?"

"I wish you would be a little more the King in Man," said Julian, starting from his reverie, "and then you would find more amusement in your dominions."

"What! dethrone that royal Semiramis my mother," said the young lord, "who has as much pleasure in playing Queen as if she were a real Sovereign?—I wonder you can give me such counsel."

"Your mother, as you well know, my dear Derby, would be delighted, did you take any interest in the affairs of the island."

"Ay, truly, she would permit me to be King; but she would choose to remain Viceroy over me. Why, she would only gain a subject the more, by my converting my spare time, which is so very valuable to me, to the cares of royalty. No, no, Julian, she thinks it power to direct all the affairs of these poor Manxmen; and, thinking it power, she finds it pleasure. I shall not interfere, unless she hold a high court of justice again. I cannot afford to pay another fine to my brother, King Charles—but I forget—this is a sore point with you."

"With the Countess, at least," replied Julian; "and I wonder you will speak of it."

"Why, I bear no malice against the poor man's memory any more than yourself, though I have not the same reasons for holding it in veneration," replied the Earl of Derby; "and yet I have some respect for it too. I remember their bringing him out to die—It was the first holiday I ever had in my life, and I heartily wish it had been on some other account."

"I would rather hear you speak of any thing else, my lord," said Julian.

"Why, there it goes," answered the Earl; "whenever I talk of any thing that puts you on your mettle, and warms your blood, that runs as cold as a merman's—to use a simile of this happy island—Hey pass! you press me to change the subject.—Well, what shall we talk of?—O, Julian, if you had not gone down to earth yourself among the castles and caverns of Derbyshire, we should have had enough of delicious topics—the playhouses, Julian—Both the King's house and the Duke's—Louis's establishment is a jest to them;—and the Ring in the Park, which beats the Corso at Naples—and the beauties, who beat the whole world!"

"I am very willing to hear you speak on the subject, my lord," answered Julian; "the less I have seen of the London world myself, the more I am likely to be amused by your account of it."

"Ay, my friend—but where to begin?—with the wit of Buckingham, and Sedley, and Etherege, or with the grace of Harry Jermyn—the courtesy of the Duke of Monmouth, or with the loveliness of La Belle Hamilton—of the Duchess of Richmond—of Lady —, the person of Roxalana, the smart humour of Mrs. Nelly"—

"Or what say you to the bewitching sorceries of Lady Cynthia?" demanded his companion.

"Faith, I would have kept these to myself," said the Earl, "to follow your prudent example. But since you ask me, I fairly own I cannot tell what to say of them; only I think of them twenty times as often as all the beauties I have spoke of. And yet she is neither the twentieth part so beautiful as the plainest of these Court beauties, nor so witty as the dullest I have named, nor so modish—that is the great matter—as the most obscure. I cannot tell what makes me quote on her, except that she is as capricious as her whole sex put together."

"That I should think a small recommendation," answered his companion.

"Small, do you term it," replied the Earl, "and write yourself a brother of the angle? Why, what like you best? to pull a dead strain on a miserable gudgeon, which you draw ashore by main force, as the fellows here tow in their fishing-boat—or a lively salmon, that makes your rod crack, and the line whistle—plays you ten thousand mischievous pranks—wearies your heart out with hopes and fears—and is only laid panting on the bank, after you have shown the most unmatched display of skill, patience, and dexterity?—But I see you have a more go on angling after your own old fashion. Of an coat, and on brown jerkin;—lively colours scarce in the sober waters of the Isle of Man;—but in London you will catch few, unless the bait glitters a little. But you are going?—well, good luck to you! I will take the barge;—the sea and wind are less constant than the tide you have embarked on."

"You have learned to say all these smart things in London, my lord," answered Julian; "but will you have you a penitent for them, if Lady Cynthia be of my mind. Adieu, and pleasure till we meet."

The young men parted accordingly; and when the Earl betook him to his pleasure voyage, just as his friend had prophesied, assumed the dress of one who means to amuse himself with angling. His hat and feather were exchanged for a cap of velvet; the deeply-laced cloak and doublet for a simple jacket of the same colour, with hose cut to the knee, and finally, with rod in hand, and pannier on his back, mounted upon a handsome Manx pony. Peveril rode briskly over the country which he descended to the sea from the Kirk-Merlagh mountains.

Having reached the spot where he meant to commence his day's sport, Julian let his little sledge, which, accustomed to the situation, followed him like a dog; and now and then, when tired of passing herbage in the valley through which the stream wound, came near her master's side, and as if he had been a curious amateur of the sport, pointed out the trouts as Julian brought them struggling to shore. But Fairy's master showed, on that day, more of the patience of a real angler, and took no heed of old Isaac Walton's recommendation, to fish a stream inch by inch. He chose, indeed, with an angler's eye, the most promising casts, where the water broke sparkling over a stone, affording the best shelter to a trout; or where, gliding away from a rippling current to a still eddy, it streamed under a projecting bank, or dashed from the pool of some cascade. By this judicious selection of spots, when on to employ his art, the sportsman's basket was soon sufficiently heavy, to show that his occupation was not a mere pretext; and so soon as this was the case, he walked briskly up the glen, only making a cast from time to time, in case of his being served from any of the neighbouring heights.

It was a little green and rocky valley through which the brook strayed, very lonely, although a slight track of an unformed road showed that it was occasionally traversed, and that it was not altogether void of inhabitants. As Peveril advanced still farther, the right bank reached to some distance from the stream, leaving a piece of meadow, the lower part of which, being close to the brook, was entirely covered with rich herbage, being possibly occasionally irrigated by its overflow. The higher part of the level ground afforded a stance for an old house, of a singular structure, with a terraced garden, and a cultivated field or two beside it. In former times, a Danish or Norwegian fastness had stood here, called the Black Fort, from the colour of a heathy hill, which, rising behind the building, appeared to be the boundary of the valley, and to affect the sources of the brook. But the original structure had been long demolished, as, indeed, it probably only consisted of dry stones, and its materials had been applied to the construction of the present mansion—the work of some churchman during the sixteenth century, as was evident from the huge stone-work of its windows, which scarce left room for light to pass through, as well as from two or three heavy buttresses, which projected from the front of the house, and exhibited on their surface little niches for images. These had been carefully destroyed, and pots of flowers were placed in the niches in their stead, besides their being ornamented by creeping plants of various kinds, fancifully twined around them. The garden was also in good order; and though the spot was extremely solitary, there was about it altogether an air of comfort, accommodation, and even elegance, by no means generally characteristic of the habitations of the island at the time.

With much circumspection, Julian Peveril approached the low Gothic porch, which defended the entrance of the mansion from the tempests incident to its situation, and was, like the buttresses, overrun with ivy and other creeping plants. An iron ring, contrived so as when drawn up and down to rattle against the bar of notched iron through which it was suspended, served the purpose of a knocker; and to this he applied himself, though with the greatest precaution.

He received no answer for some time, and indeed it seemed as if the house was totally uninhabited; when, at length, his impatience getting the upper hand, he tried to open the door, and, as it was only upon the latch, very easily succeeded. He passed through a little low-arched hall, the upper end of which was occupied by a staircase, and turning to the left opened the door of a summer parlour, wainscoted with black oak, and very simply furnished with chairs and tables of the same materials; the former cushioned with leather. The apartment was gloomy—one of those stone-shafted windows which we have mentioned, with its small latticed panes, and thick garland of foliage, admitting but an imperfect light.

Over the chimney-piece (which was of the same massive materials with the panelling of the apartment) was the only ornament of the room; a painting, namely, representing an officer in the military dress of the Civil Wars. It was a green jerkin, then the national and peculiar wear of the Manxmen; his short band which hung down on the cuirass—the orange-coloured scarf, but, above all, the shortness of his close-cut hair, showing evidently to which of the great parties he had belonged. His right hand rested on the hilt of his sword; and in the left he held a small Bible, bearing the inscription, "In hoc signo." The countenance was of a light complexion, with fair and almost effeminate blue eyes, and an oval form of face—one of those physiognomies, to which, though not otherwise unpleasing, we naturally attach the idea of melancholy and of misfortune.* Apparently it was well known to Julian Peveril; for, after having looked at it for a long time, he could not forbear muttering aloud, "What would I give that that man had never been born, or that he still lived!"

"How now—how is this?" said a female, who entered the room as he uttered this reflection. "You here, Master Peveril, in spite of all the warnings you have had! You here, in the possession of folk's house when they are abroad, and talking to yourself, as I shall warrant!"

"Yes, Mistress Deborah," said Peveril, "I am here once more, as you see, against every prohibition, and in defiance of all danger.—Where is Alice?"

"Where you will never see her, Master Julian—you may satisfy yourself of that," answered Mistress Deborah, for it was that respectable governante; and sinking down at the same time upon one of the large leathern chairs, she began to fan herself with her handkerchief, and complain of the heat in a most ladylike fashion.

In fact, Mistress Debbitch, while her exterior intimated a considerable change of condition for the better, and her countenance showed the less favoura-

* I am told that a portrait of the unfortunate William Christian is still preserved in the family of Waterson of Ballnabow of Kirk Church, Rushin. William Dhone is dressed in a green coat without collar or cape, after the fashion of those puritanic times, with the head in a close-cropt wig, resembling the bishop's peruke of the present day. The countenance is youthful and well looking, very unlike the expression of foreboding melancholy. I have so far taken advantage of this criticism, as to bring my ideal portrait in the present edition nearer to the complexion at least of the fair-haired William Dhone.

ble effects of the twenty years which had passed over her head, was in mind and manners very much what she had been when she battled the opinions of Madam Ellesmere at Martindale Castle. In a word, she was self-willed, obstinate, and coquettish as ever, otherwise no ill-disposed person. Her present appearance was that of a woman of the better rank. From the sobriety of the fashion of her dress, and the uniformity of its colours, it was plain she belonged to some sect which condemned superfluous gayety in attire; but no rules, not those of a nunnery or of a quaker's society, can prevent a little coquetry in that particular, where a woman is desirous of being supposed to retain some claim to personal attention. All Mistress Deborah's garments were so arranged as might best set off a good-looking woman, whose countenance indicated ease and good cheer—who called herself five-and-thirty, and was well entitled, if she had a mind, to call herself twelve or fifteen years older.

Julian was under the necessity of enduring all her tiresome and fantastic airs, and awaiting with patience till she had "prinked herself and pinned herself"—flung her hoods back, and drawn them forward—snuffed at a little bottle of essences, closed her eyes like a dying fowl—turned them up like a duck in a thunder-storm; when at length, having exhausted her round of minauderics, she condescended to open the conversation.

"These walks will be the death of me," she said, "and all on your account, Master Julian Peveril; for if Dame Christian should learn that you have chosen to make your visits to her niece, I promise you, Mistress Alice would be soon obliged to find other quarters, and so should I."

"Come now, Mistress Deborah, be good-humoured," said Julian; "consider, was not all this intimacy of ours of your own making? Did you not make yourself known to me the very first time I strolled up this glen with my fishing-rod, and tell me that you were my former keeper, and that Alice had been my little play-fellow? And what could there be more natural, than that I should come back and see two such agreeable persons as often as I could?"

"Yes," said Dame Deborah; "but I did not bid you fall in love with us, though, or propose such a matter as marriage either to Alice or myself."

"To do you justice, you never did, Deborah," answered the youth; "but what of that? Such things will come out before one is aware. I am sure you must have heard such proposals fifty times when you least expected them."

"Fie, fie, fie, Master Julian Peveril," said the governante; "I would have you to know that I have always so behaved myself, that the best of the land would have thought twice of it, and have very well considered both what he was going to say, and how he was going to say it, before he came out with such proposals to me."

"True, true, Mistress Deborah," continued Julian; "but all the world have not your discretion. Then Alice Bridgenorth is a child—a mere child; and one always asks a baby to be one's little wife, you know. Come, I know you will forgive me. Thou wert ever the best-natured, kindest woman in the world; and you know you have said twenty times we were made for each other."

"O no, Master Julian Peveril; no, no, no!" ejaculated Deborah. "I may indeed have said your estates were born to be united; and to be sure it is natural to me, that come of the old stock of the honest yeomanry of Peveril of the Peak's estate, to wish that it was all within the ring fence again; which sure enough it might be, were you to marry Alice Bridgenorth. But then there is the knight your father, and my lady your mother; and there is her father, that is half crazy with his religion; and her aunt, that wears eternal black program for that unlucky Colonel Christian; and there is the Countess of Derby, that would serve us all with the same sauce if we were thinking of any thing that would displease her. And besides all that, you have broke your word with Mistress Alice, and every thing is a domestic independence, was caused by the impression by alarming her person account of Alice's health. The mansion of high stand, she said, much exposed to the winds, which could not but be cold, as they in a country where, as she was assured, we and snow at midsummer. In short, did, and was put into full possession of the, a house which, as well as Kirk Trough formerly to Christian, and now to his never, it was enjoined on the government, to send Kirk Trough from time to time to consider themselves as under the man and guardianship of Mistress Christian: a subjection the cause of which Deborah told to learn, by assuming as much free and as she possibly dared, under the doubtless, of the same feelings of rule which adorned her at Martindale Hall, to advice of Mistress Christian.

this generous disposition to defy control, lured her to procure for Alice, secretly as of education, which the stern genius of would have proscribed. She ventured to bring taught music - say even dancing, nature of the austere Colonel Christian in the wigwag where it was suspended, a phylax beam of Alice, and the substance of Dame Deborah, executed French and hence to the sound of a small band under the bow of Monsieur de Piquet half dance or master. This abomination of the ears of the Colonel's widow, and is communicated to Hedgesworth, whose warfare in the island showed the importance attached to the communication. When the dance he folded her in his arms, smothered her disordered locks with a father's affectionately kissed her brow and took his leave, no single word farther interdicting the dancing. He did not himself communicate of his visit at the Black Fort to Martin, but she was not long of learning it, by and Dame Deborah on her next visit.

It said the stern old lady, my brother hath permitted you to make a Herodias and teach her dancing. You have only I her a partner for life. I shall neither make noise in these affairs.

the triumph of Dame Deborah or rather, state on this occasion, had more import than the former had ventured to anticipate. Mistress Christian, though she received mail in the formal visits of the government, were, would therefore so pettish with her remembrance upon the enormity of allowing to a little fiddle that she opposed interference in her affairs, and left Dame and Alice to manage both education and as in which she had hitherto greatly herself, much after their own pleasure.

in this independent state that they lived, in first visited their habitation, and he they encouraged to do so by Dame Deborah believed him to be one of the last persons in the world with whom Mistress Christian would have desired her name to be acquainted—the happy spirit of contradiction so prevailing, with Dame Deborah, on this as on other occasions, all consideration of the fitness of things. She did not get altogether without provocation neither. She was aware she had to guard not only against any reviving interest or curiosity on the part of Mistress Christian, but against the sudden arrival of Major Hedgesworth, who never failed once in the year to make his appearance at the Black Fort when least expected, and to remain there for a few days. Dame Deborah, therefore, exacted of Julian, that his visits should be few and far between, that he should understand to pass for a relation of her own, in the eyes of two ignorant Manz girls and a lad, who formed her establishment; and that he should always appear in his ancestor's dress made of the simple Lonsdale, or buff coloured wool of the island, which is not subjected to dyeing. By these cautions she thought his intimacy at the Black Fort would be entirely unnecessary, or considered as immaterial, while, in the meantime it furnished much amusement to her charge and herself.

Thus was accordingly the case during the earlier part of their intercourse, while Julian was a lad, and Alice a girl two or three years younger. But as the ad shot up to youth, and the girl to womanhood, even Dame Deborah Deborah's judgment saw longer in their continued intimacy. She took an opportunity to communicate to Julian who Miss Hedgesworth actually was, and the peculiar circumstances which placed distance between their fathers. He heard the story of their quarrel with interest and surprise for he had only read occasionally at Martindale Castle, and the subject of Hedgesworth's quarrel with his father had never been mentioned in his presence. His imagination caught fire at the sparks afforded by this singular story, and far from complying with the prudent remonstrance of Dame Deborah, and gradually extricating himself from the Black Fort and its fair inmate, he frankly declared, or considered his intimacy there as casually commenced as intimating the will of Heaven, that they and he were destined for each other in spite of every obstacle which passion or prejudice could raise up between them. They had been companions in infancy, and a little exaction of memory enabled him to recall his childish grief for the unexpected and sudden disappearance of his little companion, whom he was destined again to meet with in the early bloom of growing beauty in a country which was foreign to them both.

Dame Deborah was confounded at the consequences of her communication, which had thus blown into a flame the passion which she hoped it would have either prevented or extinguished. She had not the sort of head which resists the masculine and energetic remonstrances of passionate attachment, whether addressed to her or her own account, or on behalf of another. She lamented and wondered, and ended her feeble opposition, by weeping, and sympathizing, and consenting to allow the continuance of Julian's visits, provided he should only address himself to Alice as a friend, to gain the world, she would consent to nothing more. She was not, however so simple, but that she also had her forebodings of the designs of Providence on this youthful couple; for certainly they could not be more formed to be united than the good estates of Martindale and Lonsdale.

Then came a long sequence of reflection. Martindale Castle wanted but some repairs to be almost equal to Chatsworth. The Hall might be allowed to go to ruin; or, what would be better, when Sir Geoffrey's time came, (for the good knight had been some, and must be breaking now) the Hall would be a good downy home, in which my lady and Elizabeth might reside, while temporary of the cell room, and queen of the pantry; Mistress Deborah Deborah should reign housekeeper at the castle, and a steward, perhaps, the crown matrimonial to Lancelot Outram, provided he was not become too old, too fat, or too fond of sin.

Such were the soothing visions under the influence of which the dame connived at an attachment, which lulled also to pleasing dreams, though of a character so different, her charge and her visitant.

The visits of the young angler became more and more frequent; and the embarrassed Deborah, though foreseeing all the dangers of discovery and the additional risk of an explanation between Alice and Julian, which must necessarily render their relative situation so much more delicate, felt completely overborne by the enthusiasm of the young lover, and was compelled to let matters take their course.

The departure of Julian for the continent interrupted the course of his intimacy at the Black Fort, and while it relieved the elder of its inmates from such internal apprehension, spread an air of languor and dejection over the countenance of the younger, which, at Bridgenorth's next visit to the Isle of Man, renewed all his terrors for his daughter's constitutional malady.

Deborah misread faithfully she should look better the next morning, and she kept her word. She had retained in her possession for some time a letter which Julian had, by some private conveyance, sent to her charge, for his youthful friend. Deborah had dreaded the consequences of delivering it as a billet-doux, but, as in the case of the dance, she thought there could be no harm in administering it as a remedy.

It had complete effect; and next day the cheeks of the maiden had a tinge of the rose, which so much delighted her father, that, as he mounted his horse, he hung his purse into Deborah's hand, with the desire she should spare nothing that could make herself and his daughter happy, and the assurance that she had his full confidence.

This expression of liberality and trust from a man of Major Bridgenorth's reserved and cautious disposition, gave full plumage to Mistress Deborah's hopes; and emboldened her not only to deliver another letter of Julian's to the young lady, but to encourage more boldly and freely than formerly the intercourse of the lovers when Peveril returned from abroad.

At length, in spite of all Julian's precaution, the young Earl became suspicious of his frequent solitary fishing parties; and he himself now better acquainted with the world than formerly, became aware that his repeated visits and solitary walks with a person so young and beautiful as Alice, might not only betray prematurely the secret of his attachment, but be of essential prejudice to her who was its object.

Under the influence of this conviction, he abstained, for an unusual period, from visiting the Black Fort. But when he next indulged himself with spending an hour in the place where he would gladly have abode for ever, the altered manner of Alice—the tone in which she seemed to upbraid his neglect, penetrated his heart, and deprived him of that power of self-command, which he had hitherto exercised in their interviews. It required but a few energetic words to explain to Alice at once his feelings, and to make her sensible of the real nature of her own. She wept plentifully, but her tears were not all of bitterness. She sat passively still, and without reply, while he explained to her, with many an interjection, the circumstances which had placed discord between their families; for hitherto, all that she had known was, that Master Peveril, belonging to the household of the great Countess or Lady of Man, must observe some precautions in visiting a relative of the unhappy Colonel Christian. But, when Julian concluded his tale with the warmest protestations of eternal love, "My poor father!" she burst forth, "and was this to be the end of all thy precautions?—This, that the son of him that disgraced and banished thee, should hold such language to thy daughter!"

"You err, Alice, you err," cried Julian, eagerly. "That I hold this language—that the son of Peveril addresses thus the daughter of your father—that he thus kneels to you for forgiveness of injuries which passed when we were both infants, shows the will of Heaven, that in our affection should be quenched the discord of our parents. What else could lead those who parted infants on the hills of Dovedale to meet thus in the valleys of Man?"

Alice, however new such a scene, and about her own emotions, might be, was highly struck with that exquisite delicacy which is unusual in the female heart, to give warning of her approach to impropriety in a situation like this.

"Rise, rise, Master Peveril," she said, "leave yourself and me this injustice—we have done wrong—very wrong; but my fault was done in ignorance. O God! my poor father, who needs not so much—as it for me to add to his misfortune—Rise!" she added, more firmly; "if you remain in that unbecoming posture any longer, I will leave the room, and you shall never see me more."

The commanding tone of Alice overrode the petulance of her lover, who took in silence and removed to some distance from her, and was about to speak. "Julian," she said, in a low tone, "you have spoken enough, and seen enough. Would you had left me in the pleasant dream in which I could have listened to you forever, but the hour of waking is arrived." Peveril stopped the prosecution of her speech as a crime, and he waits his doom; for he was sufficiently sensible that an answer, delivered not certainly with emotion, but with firmness and resolution, ought to be interrupted. "We have done wrong," he repeated, "very wrong; and if we now separate ever, the pain we may feel will be but a just penalty for our error. We should never have met here, we should part as soon as possible. Our intercourse can but double our pain at parting—Farewell, Julian; and forget we ever have met other?"

"Forget!" said Julian; "never, never. Is it easy to speak the word—to think the thought? To me, an approach to either can only be a step to destruction. Why should you doubt that the love of our fathers, like so many of which we have heard might be appeased by our friendship? You are my only friend. I am the only one whom Heaven has assigned to you. Why should we separate? Is it the fault of others, which befell when we were children?"

"You speak in vain, Julian," said Alice, "I pity you—perhaps I pity myself—indeed I should pity myself, perhaps, the most of the two; for you will go forth to new scenes and new faces, and will soon forget me; but I, remaining in this solitude, shall I forget—that, however, is not now the question—I can bear my lot, and it commands me to part."

"Hear me yet a moment," said Peveril, "evil is not, cannot be remediless. I will go to my father—I will use the intercession of my mother, whom he can refuse nothing—I will gain their consent—they have no other child—and they must consent, or lose him for ever. Say, Alice, if I come to you with my parents' consent to my marriage, you again say, with that tone so touching and so sad, yet so incredibly determined—Julian, we must part?" Alice was silent. "Cruel girl, will you not even deign to answer me?" said her lover.

"We answer not those who speak in their dreams," said Alice. "You ask me what I would do were impossibilities performed. What right have you to make such suppositions, and ask such a question?"

"Hope, Alice, hope," answered Julian, "the best support of the wretched, which even you must not be cruel enough to deprive me of in every difficulty, in every doubt, in every danger. Hope will fight even if he cannot conquer. Tell me once more, if I come to you in the name of my father—in the name of that mother, to whom you partly owe your life, what would you answer me?"

"I would refer you to my own father," said Alice, blushing, and casting her eyes down; but instantly raising them again, she repeated, in a firmer and sadder tone, "Yes, Julian, I would refer you to my father; and you would find that your pilot, Hope, had deceived you; and that you had but escaped the quicksands to fall upon the rocks."

"I would that could be tried!" said Julian. "Is thinks I could persuade your father that in ordinary eyes our alliance is not undesirable. My family have fortune, rank, long descent—all that fathers look for when they bestow a daughter's hand."

"All this would avail you nothing," said Alice. "The spirit of my father is bent upon the things of another world; and if he listened to hear you out, it would be but to tell you that he spurned your offers."

"You know not—you know not, Alice," said Julian. "Fire can soften iron—thy father's heart cannot be so hard, or his prejudices so strong, but I shall find some means to melt him. Forbid me not—O, forbid me not at least the experiment!"

"I can but advise," said Alice; "I can forbid you nothing; for, to forbid, implies power to command obedience. But if you will be wise, and listen to me—Here, and on this spot, we part for ever!"

"Not so, by Heaven!" said Julian, whose bold and sanguine temper scarce saw difficulty in attaining aught which he desired. "We now part indeed, but it is that I may return armed with my parents' consent. They desire that I should marry—in their last letters they pressed it more openly—they shall have their desire; and such a bride as I will present to them, has not graced their house since the Conqueror gave it origin. Farewell, Alice! Farewell, for a brief space!"

She replied, "Farewell, Julian! Farewell for ever!"

Julian, within a week of this interview, was at Martindale Castle, with the view of communicating his purpose. But the task which seems easy at a distance, proves as difficult upon a nearer approach, as the fording of a river, which from afar appeared only a brook. There lacked not opportunities of entering upon the subject; for in the first ride which he took with his father, the Knight resumed the subject of his son's marriage, and liberally left the lady to his choice; but under the strict proviso, that she was of a loyal and an honourable family;—if she had fortune, it was good and well, or rather, it was better than well; but if she was poor, why, "there is still some picking," said Sir Geoffrey, "on the bones of the old estate; and Dame Margaret and I will be content with the less, that you young folks may have your share of it. I am turned frugal already, Julian. You see what a north-country shambling bit of a galloway nag I ride upon—a different beast, I wot, from my old Black Hastings, who had but one fault, and that was his wish to turn down Moultrassie-avenue."

"Was that so great a fault?" said Julian, affecting indifference, while his heart was trembling, as it seemed to him, almost in his very throat.

"It used to remind me of that base, dishonourable Presbyterian fellow, Bridgenorth," said Sir Geoffrey: "and I would as lief think of a toad:—they say he has turned Independent, to accomplish the full degree of rascality.—I tell you, Gill, I turned off the cow-boy, for gathering nuts in his woods—I would hang a dog that would so much as kill a hare there.—But what is the matter with you? You look pale."

Julian made some indifferent answer, but too well understood, from the language and tone which his father used, that his prejudices against Alice's father were both deep and envenomed, as those of country gentlemen often become, who, having little to do or think of, are but too apt to spend their time in nursing and cherishing petty causes of wrath against their next neighbours.

In the course of the same day, he mentioned the Bridgenorths to his mother, as if in a casual manner. But the Lady Peveril instantly conjured him never to mention the name, especially in his father's presence.

"Was that Major Bridgenorth, of whom I have heard the name mentioned," said Julian, "so very bad a neighbour?"

"I do not say so," said Lady Peveril; "nay, we were more than once obliged to him, in the former unhappy times; but your father and he took some passages so ill at each other's hands, that the least allusion to him disturbs Sir Geoffrey's temper in a manner quite unusual, and which, now that his health is somewhat impaired, is sometimes alarming to me. For Heaven's sake, then, my dear Julian, avoid upon all occasions the slightest allusion to Moultrassie, or any of its inhabitants."

This warning was so seriously given, that Julian himself saw that mentioning his secret purpose would be the sure way to render it abortive, and therefore he returned disconsolate to the Isle.

Peveril had the boldness, however, to make the best he could of what had happened, by requesting an interview with Alice, in order to inform her what had passed betwixt his parents and him on her account. It was with great difficulty that this boon was obtained: and Alice Bridgenorth showed no slight degree of displeasure, when she discovered, after much circumlocution, and many efforts to give an air of importance to what he had to communicate, that all amounted but to this, that Lady Peveril continued to retain a favourable opinion of her father, Major Bridgenorth, which Julian would fain have represented as an omen of their future more perfect reconciliation.

"I did not think you would thus have trifled with me, Master Peveril," said Alice, assuming an air of dignity; "but I will take care to avoid such intrusion in future—I request you will not again visit the Black Fort; and I entreat of you, good Mistress Debbitch, that you will no longer either encourage or permit this gentleman's visits, as the result of such persecution will be to compel me to appeal to my aunt and father for another place of residence, and perhaps also for another and more prudent companion."

This last hint struck Mistress Deborah with so much terror, that she joined her ward in requiring and demanding Julian's instant absence, and he was obliged to comply with their request. But the courage of a youthful lover is not easily subdued; and Julian, after having gone through the usual round of trying to forget his ungrateful mistress, and again entertaining his passion with augmented violence, ended by the visit to the Black Fort, the beginning of which we narrated in the last chapter.

We then left him anxious for, yet almost fearful of, an interview with Alice, which he had prevailed upon Deborah to solicit; and such was the tumult of his mind, that while he traversed the parlour, it seemed to him that the dark melancholy eyes of the slaughtered Christian's portrait followed him wherever he went, with the fixed, chill, and ominous glance, which announced to the enemy of his race mishap and misfortune.

The door of the apartment opened at length, and these visions were dissipated.

CHAPTER XIII.

Parents have flinty hearts! No tears can move them.
OTWAY.

WHEN Alice Bridgenorth at length entered the parlour where her anxious lover had so long expected her, it was with a slow step, and a composed manner. Her dress was arranged with an accurate attention to form, which at once enhanced the appearance of its puritanic simplicity, and struck Julian as a bad omen; for although the time bestowed upon the toilet may, in many cases, intimate the wish to appear advantageously at such an interview, yet a ceremonious arrangement of attire is very much allied with formality, and a preconceived determination to treat a lover with cold politeness.

The sad-coloured gown—the pinched and plaited cap, which carefully obscured the profusion of long dark-brown hair—the small ruff, and the long sleeves, would have appeared to great disadvantage on a shape less graceful than Alice Bridgenorth's; but an exquisite form, though not, as yet, sufficiently rounded in the outlines to produce the perfection of female beauty, was able to sustain and give grace even to this unbecoming dress. Her countenance, fair and delicate, with eyes of hazel, and a brow of alabaster had, notwithstanding, less regular beauty than her form, and might have been justly subjected to criticism. There was, however, a life and spirit in her gayety, and a depth of sentiment in her gravity, which made Alice, in conversation with the very few persons with whom she associated, so fascinating in her manners and expression, whether of language or countenance—so touching, also, in her simplicity and purity of thought, that brighter beauties might have been overlooked in her company. It was no wonder, therefore, that an ardent character like Julian, influenced by these charms, as well as by the secrecy and mystery attending his intercourse with Alice, should prefer the seclusion of the Black Fort to all others with whom he had become acquainted in general society.

His heart beat high as she came into the apartment, and it was almost without an attempt to speak that his profound obedience acknowledged her entrance.

"This is a mockery, Master Peveril," said Alice, with an effort to speak firmly, which yet was disconcerted by a slightly tremulous inflection of voice—"a mockery, and a cruel one. You come to this lone place, inhabited only by two women, too simple to command your absence—too weak to enforce it—you come in spite of my earnest request—to the neglect of your own time—to the prejudice, I may fear, of my character—you abuse the influence you possess over the simple person to whom I am intrusted. All this you do, and think to make it up by low reverences and constrained courtesy! Is this honourable, or is it fair?—Is it," she added, after a moment's hesitation—"is it kind?"

The tremulous accent fell especially on the last word she uttered, and it was spoken in a low tone of gentle reproach, which went to Julian's heart.

"If," said he, "there were a mode by which, at the peril of my life, Alice, I could show my regard—my respect—my devoted tenderness—the danger would be dearer to me than ever was pleasure."

"You have said such things often," said Alice, "and they are such as I ought not to hear, and do not desire to hear. I have no tasks to impose on you—no enemies to be destroyed—no need or desire of protection—no wish, Heaven knows, to expose you to danger—It is your visits here alone to which danger attaches. You have but to rule your own wilful temper—to turn your thoughts and your cares elsewhere, and I can have nothing to ask—nothing to wish for. Use your own reason—consider the injury you do yourself—the injustice you do us—and let me, once more, in fair terms, entreat you to absent yourself from this place—till—till—"

She paused, and Julian eagerly interrupted her.—"Till when, Alice?—till when?—impose on me any length of absence which your severity can inflict short of a final separation—Say, Be gone for years, but return when these years are over; and, slow and wearily as they must pass away, still the thought, that they must at length have their period, will enable me to live through them. Let me, then, conjure thee, Alice, to name a date—to fix a term—to say till when?"

"Till you can bear to think of me only as a friend and sister."

"That is a sentence of eternal banishment indeed!" said Julian; "it is seeming, no doubt, to fix a term of exile, but attaching it to an impossible condition."

"And why impossible, Julian?" said Alice, in a tone of persuasion; "were we not happier ere you threw the mask from your own countenance, and tore the veil from my foolish eyes? Did we not meet with joy, spend our time happily, and part cheerily, because we transgressed no duty, and incurred no self-reproach? Bring back that state of happy ignorance, and you shall have no reason to call me unkind. But while you form schemes which I know to be visionary, and use language of such violence and passion, you shall excuse me if I now and once for all, declare, that since Deborah shows herself unfit for the trust reposed in her, and must needs expose me to persecutions of this nature, I will write to my father, that he may fix me another place of residence; and in the meanwhile I will take shelter with my aunt at Kirk-Trough."

"Hear me, unpitying girl," said Peveril, "hear me and you shall see how devoted I am to obedience: all that I can do to oblige you! You say you are happy when we spoke not on such topics—well—all expense of my own suppressed feelings, that happy period shall return. I will meet you—walk with you—read with you—but only as a brother with his sister, or a friend with his friend: the thoughts I may nourish, be they of hope or of despair, my tongue shall not give birth to, and therefore I cannot offend; Deborah shall be ever by your side, and her presence shall prevent my even hinting what might displease you—only do not make a secret to me of those thoughts which are the dearest part of my existence; for believe me it were better kinder to rob me of existence itself."

"This is the mere ecstasy of passion," Julian answered Alice Bridgenorth; "that which is pleasant, our selfish and stubborn will repeat as impossible. I have no confidence in the plan you propose—no confidence in your resolution, and than none in the protection of Deborah. Till we can renounce, honestly and explicitly, the wishes we have lately expressed, we must be strangers—we could you renounce them even at this moment, were better that we should part for a long time—for Heaven's sake, let it be as soon as we can—perhaps it is even now too late to prevent a very pleasant accident—I thought I heard a noise."

"It was Deborah," answered Julian, "be not afraid, Alice; we are secure against surprise."

"I know not," said Alice, "what you mean by such security—I have nothing to hide. I sought this interview; on the contrary, averted it as long as I could—and am now most desirous to break it off."

"And wherefore, Alice, since you say it must be our last? Why should you shake the sand which is passing so fast? the very executioner hurries the prayers of the wretches upon the scaffold. Do you not see you not—I will argue as coldly as you can—see you not that you are breaking your own word—and recalling the hope which yourself held out to me?"

"What hope have I suggested? What word have I given, Julian?" answered Alice. "You have built wild hopes in the air, and accuse me of destroying what had never any earthly foundation. Spare yourself, Julian—spare me—and in mercy to us both, depart, and return not again till you can be more reasonable."

"Reasonable?" replied Julian; "it is you, Alice, who will deprive me altogether of reason. Did you not say, that if our parents could be brought to consent to our union, you would no longer oppose my wish?"

"No—no—no," said Alice, eagerly, and blushed deeply. "I did not say so, Julian—it was your own wild imagination which put construction on my silence and my confusion."

"You do not say so, then?" answered Julian, "and if all other obstacles were removed, I should find one in the cold flinty bosom of her, who repays the most devoted and sincere affection with contempt and dislike?—Is that," he added, in a deep tone of feeling—"is that what Alice Bridgenorth says to Julian Peveril?"

"Indeed—indeed, Julian," said the almost weeping girl, "I do not say so—I say nothing, and I ought not to say any thing concerning what I might do in a state of things which can never take place. Indeed, Julian, you ought not thus to press me. Unprotected as I am—wishing you well—very well—why should you urge me to say or do what would lessen me in my own eyes? to own affection for one from whom fate has separated me for ever? It is ungenerous—it is cruel—it is seeking a momentary and selfish gratification to yourself, at the expense of every feeling which I ought to entertain."

"You have said enough, Alice," said Julian, with sparkling eyes; "you have said enough in depreciating my urgency, and I will press you no farther. But you overrate the impediments which lie between us—they must and shall give way."

"So you said before," answered Alice, "and with has probability, your own account may show. You need not to mention the subject to your own father. How should you venture to mention it to mine?"

"That I will soon enable you to decide upon. Major Bridgenorth, by my mother's account, is a worthy and an estimable man. I will remind him, not to my mother's care he owes the dearest treasure and comfort of his life, and I will ask him if it is a just retribution to make that mother childless, or to know where to find him, Alice, and you will soon hear if I have feared to plead my cause with him."

"Alice" answered Alice "you will know my uncertainty as to my dear father's sentence. How often has it been my earnest request to him that he would let me share his solitary abode, or his obscure wanderings. But the short and infrequent visits which he makes to this house are all that he permits me of his society. Something I might surely do, however little, to alleviate the melancholy by which he is oppressed."

"Something we might both do," said Peveril. "How willingly would I aid you in so pleasing a task! All old griefs should be forgotten, all old friendships revived. My father's prejudices are those of an Englishman strong, indeed, but not incurable by reason. Tell me, then, where Major Bridgenorth is, and leave the rest to me, or let me at least know by what address your letters reach him, and I will forthwith essay to discover his dwelling."

"Do not attempt it I charge you," said Alice. "He is already a man of sorrows, and what would I think were I capable of entertaining a suit so likely to add to them? Besides, I could not tell you, I would, where he is now to be found. My letters reach him from time to time by means of my aunt Christian, but of his address I am entirely ignorant."

"Then, by Heaven," answered Julian, "I will watch his arrival in this island, and in this house, and ere he has locked there in his arms, he shall answer to me on the subject of my suit."

"Then demand that answer now," said a voice from without the door, which was at the same time softly opened. Demand that answer now, for ere stands Ralph Bridgenorth."

As he spoke, he entered the apartment with his usual slow and sedate step, raised his flapp'd and apple-crowned hat from his brows, and standing in the midst of the room, eyed alternately his daughter and Julian Peveril with a fixed and penetrating gaze.

"Father!" said Alice, utterly astonished, and terrified besides, by his sudden appearance at such a juncture. "Father, I am not to blame."

"Of that anon, Alice," said Bridgenorth. "meanwhile retire to your apartment. I have that to say to us youth which will not endure your presence."

"Indeed indeed, father," said Alice, alarmed at that she supposed those words indicated, "Julian is a little to be blamed as I. It was chance, it was fortune, which caused our meeting together." Then suddenly rushing forward, she threw her arms round her father saying, "O do him no injury—he cannot be so wrong! Father you were wont to be a man of reason and of religious peace."

"And wherefore should I not be so now, Alice?" said Bridgenorth, raising his daughter from the ground, on which she had almost sunk in the earnestness of her supplication. "Dost thou know night, mowden, which should inflame my anger against this young man, more than reason or religion may bribe? Go go to thy chamber. Command those own passions—learn to rule them—and give it to me to deal with this stubborn young man."

Alice arose, and with her eyes fixed on the ground, strode slowly from the apartment. Julian followed at steps with his eyes till the last wave of her garment was visible at the closing door; then turned in looks to Major Bridgenorth, and then sunk them on the ground. The Major continued to regard him in profound silence, his looks were melancholy and even austere; but there was nothing which indicated either agitation or keen resentment. He motioned to Julian to take a seat, and assumed one himself. After which, he opened the conversation in the following manner—

"You seemed but now, young gentleman, anxious to learn where I was to be found. Such I at least conjectured, from the few expressions which I chanced to overhear; for I made bold, though it may be contrary to the code of modern courtesy, to listen a moment or two, in order to gather upon what subject so young a man as you entertained so young a woman as Alice, in a private interview."

"I trust, sir," said Julian, relying spirits in what he felt to be a case of extremity, "you have heard nothing on my part which has given offence to a gentleman, whom, though unknown, I am bound to respect so highly."

"On the contrary," said Bridgenorth, with the same formal gravity, "I am pleased to find that your business is, or appears to be, with me, rather than with my daughter. I only think you had done better to have intrusted it to me in the first instance, as my sole concern."

The utmost sharpness of attention which Julian applied, could not discover if Bridgenorth spoke seriously or ironically to the above purpose. He was, however, quick-witted beyond his experience, and was internally determined to endeavour to discover something of the character and the temper of him with whom he spoke. For that purpose, regulating his reply in the same tone with Bridgenorth's observation, he said, that not having the advantage to know his place of residence, he had applied for information to his daughter.

"Who is now known to you for the first time?" said Bridgenorth. "Am I so to understand you?"

"By no means," answered Julian, looking down; "I have been known to your daughter for many years, and what I wished to say, respects both her happiness and my own."

"I must understand you," said Bridgenorth, "even as carnal men understand each other on the matters of this world. You are attached to my daughter by the cords of love, I have long known that."

"You, Master Bridgenorth?" exclaimed Peveril—

"You have long known it."

"You, young man. Think you, that as the father of an only child, I could have suffered Alice Bridgenorth—the only living pledge of her who is now an angel in Heaven—to have remained in this seclusion without the sweet knowledge of all her maternal actions? I have, in person, seen more, both of her and of you, than you could be aware of; and when absent in the body, I had the means of maintaining the same superintendence. Young men, they say that much love as you entertain for my daughter teaches much subtlety; but believe not that it can overthrow the affection which a widowed father bears to an only child."

"If," said Julian, his heart beating thick and joyfully, "if you have known this intercourse so long, may I not hope that it has not met your disapprobation?"

The Major paused for an instant, and then answered, "In some respects, certainly not. Had it done so—had there seemed ought on your side, or on my daughter's, to have rendered your visits here dangerous to her, or displeasing to me, she had not been long the inhabitant of this solitude, or of this island. But be not so hasty as to presume, that all which you may desire in this matter can be either easily or speedily accomplished."

"I foresee, indeed, difficulties," answered Julian; "but with your kind acquiescence, they are such as I trust to remove. My father is generous—my mother is candid and liberal. They loved you once; I trust they will love you again. I will be the mediator to twist you—peace and harmony shall once more inhabit our neighbourhood, and"

Bridgenorth interrupted him with a grim smile, for such it seemed, as it passed over a face of deep melancholy. "My daughter well said, but a short while past, that you were a dreamer of dreams—an architect of plans and hopes fantastic as the visions of the night. It is a great thing you ask of me;—the hand of my only child—the sum of my worldly substance, though that is but dross in comparison. You ask the key of the only fountain from which I may yet hope to drink one pleasant draught; you ask to be the sole and absolute keeper of my earthly happiness—and what have you offered, or what have you to offer, in return of the surrender you require of me?"

"I am but too sensible," said Peveril, abashed at his own hasty conclusions, "how difficult it may be."

"Nay, but interrupt me not," replied Bridgenorth, "till I show you the amount of what you offer me in exchange for a boon, which, whatever may be its intrinsic value, is earnestly desired by you, and comprehends all that is valuable on earth which I have it in my power to bestow.—You may have heard, that in the late times I was the antagonist of your father's principles and his profane faction, but not the enemy of his person."

"I have ever heard," replied Julian, "much the contrary; and it was but now that I reminded you that you had been his friend."

"Ay. When he was in affliction and I in prosperity, I was neither unwilling, nor altogether unable, to show myself such. Well, the tables are turned—the times are changed. A peaceful and unoffending man might have expected from a neighbour, now powerful in his turn, such protection, when walking in the paths of the law, as all men, subjects of the same realm, have a right to expect even from perfect strangers. What chances? I pursue, with the warrant of the King and law, a murderess, bearing on her hand the blood of my near connexion, and I had, in such a case, a right to call on every liege subject to render assistance to the execution. My late friendly neighbour, bound, as a man and a magistrate, to give ready assistance to a legal action—bound, as a grateful and obliged friend, to respect my rights and my person—thrusts himself betwixt me—me, the avenger of blood—and my lawful captive; beats me to the earth, at once endangering my life, and, in mere human eyes, sullying mine honour; and, under his protection, the Midianitish woman reaches, like a sea-eagle, the nest which she hath made in the wave-surrounded rocks, and remains there till gold, duly administered at Court, wipes out all memory of her crime, and baffles the vengeance due to the memory of the best and bravest of men.—But," he added, apostrophizing the portrait of Christian, "thou art not yet forgotten, my fair-haired William! The vengeance which dogs thy murderers is slow,—but it is sure!"

There was a pause of some moments, which Julian Peveril, willing to hear to what conclusion Major Bridgenorth was finally to arrive, did not care to interrupt. Accordingly, in a few minutes, the latter proceeded.—"These things," he said, "I recall not in bitterness, so far as they are personal to me—I recall them not in spite of heart, though they have been the means of banishing me from my place of residence, where my fathers dwelt, and where my earthly comforts lie interred. But the public cause sets farther strife betwixt your father and me. Who so active as he to execute the fatal edict of black St. Bartholomew's day, when so many hundreds of gospel-preachers were expelled from house and home—from hearth and altar—from church and parish, to make room for belly-gods and thieves? Who, when a devoted few of the Lord's people were united to lift the fallen standard, and once more advance the good cause, was the readiest to break their purpose—to search for, persecute, and apprehend them? Whose breath did I feel warm on my neck—whose naked sword was thrust within a foot of my body, whilst I lurked darkling, like a thief in concealment, in the house of my fathers?—It was Geoffrey Peveril's—it was your father's!—What can you answer to all this, or how can you reconcile it with your present wishes?"

Julian, in reply, could only remark, "That these injuries had been of long standing—that they had been done in heat of times, and heat of temper, and that Master Bridgenorth, in Christian kindness, should not entertain a keen resentment of them, when a door was open for reconciliation."

"Peace, young man," said Bridgenorth, "thou speakest of thou knowest not what. To forgive human wrongs is Christian-like and commendable; but we have no commission to forgive those who have been done to the cause of religion and of law—we have no right to grant immunity, or to mix hands with those, who have poured forth the blood of our brethren." He looked at the picture of Christian, and was silent for a few minutes, as if he were to give too violent way to his own impetuosity, and resumed the discourse in a milder tone.

"These things I point out to you, Julian, that may show you how impossible, in the eyes of a worldly man, would be the union which you are desirous of. But Heaven hath at times opened a way where man beholds no means of issue. Julian's mother, for one to whom the truth is unknown after the fashion of the world, one of the best, one of the wisest of women; and Providence, who gave her so fair a form, and tenanted that form with a mind as pure as the original frailty of our nature will permit, means not, I trust, that she shall live to the end to be a vessel of wrath and passion. Of your father I say nothing—he is what times and example of others, and the counsel of a lordly priest, have made him; and of him, once more, I say nothing, save that I have power over him which ere now he might have felt, but that he is one within his chambers, who might have seen in his suffering. Nor do I wish to root up an ancient family. If I prize not your boasts of honours and pedigree, I would not willingly overthrow them; more than I would pull down a massive tower, or hew to the ground an ancient castle for the straightening of the common path to the advantage of the public. I have, therefore, no sentiment against the humbled House of Peveril; I have regard to it in its depression."

He here made a second pause, as if he expected Julian to say something. But notwithstanding the ardour with which the young man had pressed his suit, he was too much trained in ideas of the importance of his family, and in the better respect for his parents, to hear, without displeasure, some part of Bridgenorth's discourse.

"The House of Peveril," he replied, "was humbled."

"Had you said the sons of that House had been humble," answered Bridgenorth, "you would have come nearer the truth.—Are you not humble? Live you not here, the lackey of a haughty woman, the play-companion of an empty youth? If you leave this Isle, and go to the Court of England, see what regard will there be paid to the old pedigree that deduces your descent from kings and conquerors. I scurril or obscene jest, an impudent carriage, a fine cloak, a handful of gold, and the readiness to wear it on a card, or a die, will better advance you at the Court of Charles, than your father's ancient name and slavish devotion of blood and fortune to the cause of his father."

"That is, indeed, but too probable," said Peveril; "but the Court shall be no element of mine. I will live like my fathers, among my people, care for their comforts, decide their differences"—

"Build Maypoles, and dance around them," said Bridgenorth, with another of those grim smiles which passed over his features like the light of a sexton's torch, as it glares and is reflected by the window of the church, when he comes from locking a funeral vault. "No, Julian, these are not times in which, by the dreaming drudgery of a country magistrate, and the petty cares of a country proprietor, a man can serve his unhappy country. There are mighty designs afloat, and men are called to make their choice betwixt God and Baal. The ancient superstition—the abomination of our fathers—is raising its head and flinging abroad its snares, under the protection of the princes of the earth; but she raises not her head unmarked or unwatched; the true English hearts are as thousands, which wait but a signal to arise as one man, and show the kings of the earth that they have combined in vain! We will cast their cords from us—the cup of their abominations we will not taste."

'You speak in darkness, Master Bridgenorth,' said Peveril. 'Knowing so much of me, you may, I hope, also be aware, that I at least have seen too much of the delusions of Rome, to desire that they should be propagated at home.'

'Else, wherefore do I speak to thee friendly and so gently?' said Bridgenorth. 'Do I not know, with that readiness of early wit you baffled the wily attempts of the woman's priest, to seduce thee from the Protestant faith? Do I not know, how thou was beset when abroad, and that thou didst both hold thine own and secure the wavering belief of thy friend? Did I not, this was done like the son of Margaret Peveril? Said I not, he holdeth, as yet, but the dead seed—but the seed which is sown shall one day grow and quicken?—Enough, however, of this. For day this is thy habitation. I will see in thee either the servant of that daughter of Eshbaal, nor the son of him who pursued my life, and blemished my honours; but thou shalt be to me, for this day, as a child of her without whom my house had been extinct.'

So saying, he stretched out his thin, bony hand, and grasped that of Julian Peveril; but there was such a look of mourning in his welcome, that whatever delight the youth anticipated, spending so long time in the neighbourhood of Alice Bridgenorth, perhaps in her society, or however strongly he felt the influence of conciliating her father's good-will, he could not help feeling as if his heart was chilled in company.

CHAPTER XIV.

This day at least is friendship's—on the morrow
Let strife come as she will.

OTWAY.

DEBORAH DEBBITCH, summoned by her master, made her appearance, with her handkerchief at her eyes, and an appearance of great mental trouble. 'It was not my fault, Major Bridgenorth,' she said; 'how could I help it? like will to like—the boy would not—the girl would see him.'

'Peace, foolish woman,' said Bridgenorth, 'and let me say what I have got to say.'

'I know what your honour has to say well enough,' said Deborah. 'Service, I wot, is no intemperance now-a-days—some are wiser than others—If I had not been wheedled away from Martindale, I might have had a house of mine own by this time.'

'Peace, idiot!' said Bridgenorth; but so intent was Deborah on her vindication, that he could but restrain the interjection, as it were edgewise, between exclamations, which followed as thick as is usual in cases where folk endeavour to avert deserved censure by a clamorous justification ere the charge be brought.

'No wonder she was cheated,' she said, 'out of sight of her own interest, when it was to wait on pretty Miss Alice. All your honour's gold should never have tempted me, but that I knew she was but a dead castaway, poor innocent, if she were taken away from my lady or me.—And so this is the end of it!—up early, and down late—and this is all my thanks!—But your honour had better take care what she does—she has the short cough yet sometimes—and would take physic spring and fall.'

'Peace, chattering fool!' said her master, so soon her failing breath gave him an opportunity to take in, 'thinkest thou I knew not of this young gentleman's visits to the Black Fort, and that, if I had displeased me, I would not have known how to stop them?'

'Did I know that your honour knew of his visits?' claimed Deborah, in a triumphant tone,—for like most of her condition, she never sought farther for defence than a lie, however inconsistent and improbable—'Did I know that your honour knew of it?—Why, how should I have permitted his visits?—I wonder what your honour takes me for! Did I not been sure it was the thing in this world that your honour most desired, would I have presumed to lend it a hand forward? I trust I know my duty better. Hear if I ever asked another youngster into the house, save himself—for I knew your honour was wise, and quarrels cannot last for ever, and love begins where hatred ends; and, to be sure, they look as if they were born one for the other—and then, the estates of Moultrassie and Martindale suit each other like sheath and knife.'

'Parrot of a woman, hold your tongue!' said Bridgenorth, his patience almost completely exhausted; 'or, if you will prate, let it be to your playfellows in the kitchen, and bid them get ready some dinner presently, for Master Peveril is far from home.'

'That I will, and with all my heart,' said Deborah; 'and if there are a pair of fatter fowls in Manthan shall clap their wings on the table presently, your honour shall call me goose as well as parrot.' She then left the apartment.

'It is to such a woman as that,' said Bridgenorth, looking after her significantly, 'that you conceived me to have abandoned the charge of my only child? But enough of this subject—we will walk abroad, if you will, while she is engaged in a province fitter for her understanding.'

So saying, he left the house, accompanied by Julian Peveril, and they were soon walking side by side, as if they had been old acquaintances.

It may have happened to many of our readers, as it has done to ourselves, to be thrown by accident into society with some individual whose claims to what is called a serious character stand considerably higher than our own, and with whom, therefore, we have conceived ourselves likely to spend our time in a very stiff and constrained manner; while, on the other hand, our destined companion may have apprehended some disgust at the supposed levity and thoughtless gayety of a disposition so different from his own. Now it has frequently happened, that when we, with that urbanity and good-humour which is our principal characteristic, have accommodated ourselves to our companion, by throwing as much seriousness into our conversation as our habits will admit, he, on the other hand, moved by our liberal example, hath divested his manners of a part of their austerity; and our conversation has, in consequence, been of that pleasant texture, betwixt the useful and agreeable, which best resembles 'the fairy web of night and day,' usually called in prose the twilight. It is probable both parties may, on such occasions, have been the better for their encounter, even if it went no farther than to establish for the time a community of feeling between men, who, separated more perhaps by temper than by principle, are too apt to charge each other with profane frivolity on the one hand, or fanaticism on the other.

It fared thus in Peveril's walk with Bridgenorth, and in the conversation which he held with him.

Carefully avoiding the subject on which he had already spoken, Major Bridgenorth turned his conversation chiefly on foreign travel, and on the wonders he had seen in distant countries, and which he appeared to have marked with a curious and observant eye. This discourse made the time fly light away; for although the anecdotes and observations thus communicated, were all tinged with the serious and almost gloomy spirit of the narrator, they yet contained traits of interest and of wonder, such as are usually captivating to a youthful ear, and were particularly so to Julian, who had in his disposition some cast of the romantic and adventurous.

It appeared that Bridgenorth knew the south of France, and could tell many stories of the French Huguenots, who already began to sustain those vexations which a few years afterwards were summed up by the revocation of the Edict of Nantz. He had even been in Hungary, for he spoke as from personal knowledge of the character of several of the heads of the great Protestant insurrection, which at this time had taken place under the celebrated Tekeli; and laid down solid reasons why they were entitled to make common cause with the Great Turk, rather than submit to the Pope of Rome. He talked also of Savoy, where those of the reformed religion still suffered a cruel persecution; and he mentioned, with a swelling spirit, the protection which Oliver had afforded to the oppressed Protestant churches; "therein showing himself," he added, "more fit to wield the supreme power, than those who, claiming it by right of inheritance, use it only for their own vain and voluptuous pursuits."

"I did not expect," said Peveril, modestly, "to have heard Oliver's panegyric from you, Master Bridgenorth."

"I did not panegyrize him," answered Bridgenorth; "I speak but truth of that extraordinary man, now being dead, whom, when alive, I feared not to withstand to his face. It is the fault of the present unhappy King, if he make us look back with regret to the days when the nation was respected abroad, and when devotion and sobriety were practised at home.--But I mean not to vex your spirit by controversy. You have lived amongst those who find it more easy and more pleasant to be the pensioners of France than her controllers--to spend the money which she doles out to themselves, than to check the tyranny with which she oppresses our poor brethren of the religion. When the scales shall fall from thine eyes, all this thou shalt see; and seeing, shall learn to detest and despise it."

By this time they had completed their walk, and were returned to the Black Fort by a different path from that which had led them up the valley. The exercise and the general tone of conversation had removed, in some degree, the shyness and embarrassment which Peveril originally felt in Bridgenorth's presence, and which the tenor of his first remarks had rather increased than diminished. Deborah's promised banquet was soon on the board; and in simplicity, as well as neatness and good order, answered the character she had claimed for it. In one respect alone, there seemed some inconsistency, perhaps a little affectation. Most of the dishes were of silver, and the plates were of the same metal; instead of the trenchers and pewter which Peveril had usually seen employed on similar occasions at the Black Fort.

Presently, with the feeling of one who walks in a pleasant dream from which he fears to awake, and whose delight is mingled with wonder and with uncertainty, Julian Peveril found himself seated between Alice Bridgenorth and her father--the being he most loved on earth, and the person whom he had ever considered as the great obstacle to their intercourse! The confusion of his mind was such, that he could scarcely reply to the importunate civilities of Dame Deborah; who, seated with them at table in her quality of governante, now dispensed the good things which had been prepared under her own eye.

As for Alice, she seemed to have formed a resolution to play the mute; for she answered not, excepting briefly, to the questions of Dame Debbitch; nay, even when her father, which happened once or twice, attempted to bring her forward in the conversation, she made no farther reply than respect for him rendered absolutely necessary.

Upon Bridgenorth himself, then, devolved the task of entertaining the company; and, contrary to his ordinary habits, he did not seem to shrink from it. His discourse was not only easy, but almost cheerful, though ever and anon crossed by some expressions indicative of natural and habitual melancholy, or prophetic of future misfortune and woe. Flashes of enthusiasm, too, shot along his conversation, gleaming like the sheet-lightning of an autumn eve, which throws a strong, though momentary illumination, across the sober twilight, and all the surrounding objects, which, touched by it, assume a wilder and more striking character. In general, however, Bridgenorth's remarks were plain and sensible; and as he aimed at no graces of language, any ornament which they received arose out of the interest with which they were impressed on his hearers. For example, when Deborah, in the pride and vulgarity of her heart, called Julian's attention to the plate from which they had been eating, Bridgenorth seemed to think an apology necessary for such superfluous expense.

"It was a symptom," he said, "of approaching danger, when such men, as were not usually concerned by the vanities of life, employed much more in ornaments composed of the precious metals. It was a sign that the merchant could not obtain a profit for the capital, which, for the sake of security, he invested in this inert form. It was a proof that the noblemen or gentlemen feared the rapacity of power when they put their wealth into forms the most portable and the most capable of being hidden; and it showed the uncertainty of credit, when a man's judgment preferred the actual possession of a mass of silver to the convenience of a goldsmith's or banker's receipt. While a shadow of liberty remained," he said, "domestic rights were last invaded, and, therefore, men disposed upon their cups and tables the wealth which in these places would remain longest, though not perhaps finally, from the grasp of a tyrannical government. But there be a demand for capital to support a profitable commerce, and the mass is at once consigned to a furnace, and, ceasing to be a vain and cumbersome ornament of the banquet, becomes a potent and active agent for furthering the prosperity of the country."

"In war, too," said Peveril, "plate has been found a ready resource."

"But too much so," answered Bridgenorth. "In the late times, the plate of the nobles and gentry, with that of the colleges, and the sale of the crown jewels, enabled the King to make his unhappy state, which prevented matters returning to a state of peace and good order, until the sword had stamped an undue superiority both over King and Parliament."

He looked at Julian as he spoke, much as he proves a horse offers some object suddenly to his eyes, then watches to see if he starts or backs from it. But Julian's thoughts were too much occupied on other topics to manifest any alarm. His eye referred to a previous part of Bridgenorth's discourse, and was not returned till after a brief pause. "War, then," he said, "war, the grand impostor, is also a creator of the wealth which it wastes and devours?"

"Yes," replied Bridgenorth, "even as the fire brings into action the sleeping waters of the sea, which it finally drains. Necessity invents arts and discovers means; and what necessity is stronger than that of civil war? Therefore, even war is not itself unmixed evil, being the creator of impulses and energies which could not otherwise have existed in society."

"Men should go to war, then," said Peveril, "if they may send their silver-plate to the mint, and not from pewter dishes and wooden platters?"

"Not so, my son," said Bridgenorth. Then, checking himself as he observed the deep crimson on Julian's cheek and brow, he added, "I crave your pardon for such familiarity; but I meant not to limit what I said even now to such trifling consequences, although it may be something salutary to tear men from their pomps and luxuries, and to reduce those to be Romans who would otherwise be Sybarites. But I would say, that times of public danger, as they call into circulation the miser's hoard of the proud man's bullion, and so add to the circulating wealth of the country, do also call into action many a brave and noble spirit, which would otherwise lie torpid, give no example to the living, and bequeath no name to future ages. Society knows not, and cannot know, the mental treasures which slumber in her bosom, till necessity and opportunity call forth the statesman and the soldier from the shades of lowly life to the parts they are designed by Providence to perform, and the stations which nature had qualified them to hold. So rose Oliver--so rose Milton--so rose many another name which cannot be forgotten--even as the tempest summons forth and displays the address of the mariner."

"You speak," said Peveril, "as if national calamity might be, in some sort, an advantage."

"And if it were not so," replied Bridgenorth, "it had not existed in this state of trial, where all temporal evil is alleviated by something good in it."

gross or result, and where all that is good is close pled with that which is in itself evil." It must be a noble sight," said Julian, "to be-the slumbering energies of a great mind awainto energy, and to see it assume the authority is its due over spirits more meanly endowed."
I once witnessed," said Bridgenorth, "some-to the same effect; and as the tale is brief, I tell it you, if you will:—
Amongst my wanderings, the Transatlantic lements have not escaped me; more especially country of New-England, into which our native has shaken from her lap, as a drunkard flings in his treasures, so much that is precious in eyes of God and of his children. There thou-ds of our best and most godly men—such whose teousness might come between the Almighty his wrath, and prevent the ruin of cities—are tent to be the inhabitants of the desert, rather ountering the unenlightened savages, than stoop-to extinguish, under the oppression practised in tain, the light that is within their own minds.
ere I remained for a time, during the wars which colony maintained with Philip, a great Indian ief, or Sachem, as they were called, who seemed messenger sent from Satan to buffet them. His elty was great—his dissimulation profound; and skill and promptitude with which he maintained destructive and desultory warfare, inflicted many adful calamities on the settlement. I was, by ance, at a small village in the woods, more than irty miles from Boston, and in its situation ex-edingly lonely, and surrounded with thickets.
evertheless, there was no idea of any danger from e Indians at that time, for men trusted to the pro-ction of a considerable body of troops who had ken the field for protection of the frontiers, and ho lay, or were supposed to lie, betwixt the hamlet the enemy's country. But they had to do with foe, whom the devil himself had inspired at once ith cunning and cruelty. It was on a Sabbath orning, when we had assembled to take sweet coun-il together in the Lord's house. Our temple was but nstructed of wooden logs; but when shall the ant of trained hirelings, or the sounding of tin nd brass tubes amid the aisles of a minster, arise o sweetly to Heaven, as did the psalm in which e united at once our voices and our hearts! An excellent worthy, who now sleeps in the Lord, Ne-emiah Solsgrace, long the companion of my pilgrimage, had just begun to wrestle in prayer, when woman, with disordered looks and dishevelled hair, ntered our chapel in a distracted manner, scream-ng incessantly, 'The Indians! The Indians!'—In hat land no man dares separate himself from his means of defence; and whether in the city or in the ield, in the ploughed land or the forest, men keep beside them their weapons, as did the Jews at the rebuilding of the Temple. So we sallied forth with our guns and pikes, and heard the whoop of these incarnate devils, already in possession of a part of the town, and exercising their cruelty on the few whom weighty causes or indisposition had withheld from public worship; and it was remarked as a judgment, that, upon that bloody Sabbath, Adrian Hanson, a Dutchman, a man well enough disposed towards man, but whose mind was altogether given to worldly gain, was shot and scalped as he was summing his weekly gains in his warehouse. In fine, there was much damage done; and although our arrival and entrance into combat did in some sort put them back, yet being surprised and confused, and having no appointed leader of our band, the devilish enemy shot hard at us, and had some advantage. It was pitiful to hear the screams of women and children amid the report of guns and the whistling of bullets, mixed with the ferocious yells of these savages, which they term their warwhoop.
Several houses in the upper part of the village were soon on fire; and the roaring of the flames, and crackling of the great beams as they blazed, added to the horrible confusion; while the smoke which the wind drove against us gave farther advantage to the enemy, who fought as it were, invisible, and under cover, whilst we fell fast by their unerring fire. In this state of confusion, and while we were about to adopt the desperate project of evacuating the village, and, placing the women and children in the centre, of attempting a retreat to the nearest settlement, it pleased Heaven to send us unexpected assistance. A tall man of a reverend appearance, whom no one of us had ever seen before, suddenly was in the midst of us, as we hastily agitated the resolution of retreating.

His garments were of the skin of the elk, and he wore sword and carried gun; I never saw any thing more august than his features, overshadowed by locks of gray hair, which mingled with a long beard of the same colour. 'Men and brethren,' he said, in a voice like that which turns back the flight, 'why sink your hearts? and why are you thus disquieted? Fear ye that the God we serve will give you up to yonder heathen dogs? Follow me, and you shall see this day that there is a captain in Israel!' He uttered a few brief but distinct orders, in the tone of one who was accustomed to command; and such was the influence of his appearance, his mien, his language, and his presence of mind, that he was implicitly obeyed by men who had never seen him until that moment.
We were hastily divided, by his orders, into two bodies; one of which maintained the defence of the village with more courage than ever, convinced that the Unknown was sent by God to our rescue. At his command, they assumed the best and most sheltered positions for exchanging their deadly fire with the Indians; while, under cover of the smoke, the stranger sallied from the town, at the head of the other division of the New England men, and fetching a circuit, attacked the Red Warriors in the rear. The surprise, as is usual amongst savages, had complete effect; for they doubted not that they were assailed in their turn, and placed betwixt two hostile parties by the return of a detachment from the provincial army.
The heathens fled in confusion, abandoning the half-won village, and leaving behind them such a number of their warriors, that the tribe hath never recovered its loss. Never shall I forget the figure of our venerable leader, when our men, and not they only, but the women and children of the village, rescued from the tomahawk and scalping knife, stood crowded around him, yet scarce venturing to approach his person, and more minded, perhaps, to worship him as a descended angel, than to thank him as a fellow mortal. 'Not unto me be the glory,' he said; 'I am but an implement, frail as yourselves, in the hand of Him who is strong to deliver. Bring me a cup of water, that I may allay my parched throat, ere I essay the task of offering thanks where they are most due.' I was nearest to him as he spoke, and I gave into his hand the water he requested. At that moment we exchanged glances, and it seemed to me that I recognised a noble friend whom I had long since deemed in glory; but he gave me no time to speak, had speech been prudent. Sinking on his knees, and signing us to obey him, he poured forth a strong and energetic thanksgiving for the turning back of the battle, which, pronounced with a voice loud and clear as a war-trumpet, thrilled through the joints and marrow of the hearers. I have heard many an act of devotion in my life, had Heaven vouchsafed me grace to profit by them; but such a prayer as this, uttered amid the dead and the dying, with a rich tone of mingled triumph and adoration, was beyond them all—it was like the song of the inspired prophetess who dwelt beneath the palm-tree between Ramah and Bethel. He was silent; and for a brief space we remained with our faces bent to the earth—no man daring to lift his head. At length we looked up, but our deliverer was no longer amongst us; nor was he ever again seen in the land which he had rescued."

Here Bridgenorth, who had told this singular story with an eloquence and vivacity of detail very contrary to the usual dryness of his conversation, paused for an instant, and then resumed—"Thou seest, young man, that men of valour and of discretion are called forth to command in circumstances of national exigence, though their very existence is unknown in the land which they are predestined to deliver."

"But what thought the people of the mysterious stranger?" said Julian, who had listened with eagerness, for the story was of a kind interesting to the youthful and the brave.

"Many things," answered Bridgenorth, "and, as usual, little to the purpose. The prevailing opinion was, notwithstanding his own disclamation, that the stranger was really a supernatural being; others believed him an inspired champion, transported in the body from some distant climate, to show us the way to safety; others, again, concluded that he was a recluse, who, either from motives of piety, or other cogent reasons, had become a dweller in the wilderness, and shunned the face of man."

"And, if I may presume to ask," said Julian, "to which of these opinions were you disposed to adhere?"

"The last suited best with the transient though close view with which I had perused the stranger's features," replied Bridgenorth; "for although I dispute not that it may please Heaven, on high occasions, even to raise one from the dead in defence of his country, yet I doubted not then, as I doubt not now, that I looked on the living form of one, who had indeed powerful reasons to conceal him in the cleft of the rock."

"Are these reasons a secret?" asked Julian Peveril.

"Not properly a secret," replied Bridgenorth; "for I fear not thy betraying what I might tell thee in private discourse; and besides, wert thou so base, the prey lies too distant for any hunters to whom thou couldst point out its traces. But the name of this worthy will sound harsh in thy ear, on account of one action of his life—being his accession to a great measure, which made the extreme isles of the earth to tremble. Have you never heard of Richard Whalley?"

"Of the regicide?" exclaimed Peveril starting.

"Call his act what thou wilt," said Bridgenorth; "he was not less the rescuer of that devoted village, that, with other leading spirits of the age, he sat in the judgment-seat when Charles Stewart was arraigned at the bar, and subscribed the sentence that went forth upon him."

"I have ever heard," said Julian, in an altered voice, and colouring deeply, "that you, Master Bridgenorth, with the other Presbyterians, were totally averse to that detestable crime, and were ready to have made joint cause with the Cavaliers in preventing so horrible a parricide."

"If it were so," replied Bridgenorth, "we have been richly rewarded by his successor!"

"Rewarded!" exclaimed Julian; "Does the distinction of good and evil, and our obligation to do the one and forbear the other, depend on the reward which may attach to our actions?"

"God forbid!" answered Bridgenorth; "yet those who view the havoc which this House of Stewart have made in the Church and State—the tyranny which they exercise over men's persons and consciences—may well doubt whether it be lawful to use weapons in their defence. Yet you hear me not praise, or even vindicate, the death of the King, though so far deserved, as he was false to his oath as a Prince and Magistrate. I only tell you what you desired to know, that Richard Whalley, one of the late King's judges, was he of whom I have just been speaking. I knew his lofty brow, though time had made it balder and higher; his gray eye retained all its lustre; and though the grizzled beard covered the lower part of his face, it prevented me not from recognising him. The scent was hot after him for his blood; but by the assistance of those friends whom Heaven had raised up for his preservation, he was concealed carefully, and emerged only to do the will of Providence, in the matter of that battle. Perhaps his voice may be heard in the field once more, should England need one of her noblest hearts."*

* There is a common tradition in America, that this person, who was never heard of after the Restoration, fled to Massachusetts, and, living for some years concealed in that province, finally closed his days there. The remarkable and beautiful story of his having suddenly emerged from his place of concealment, and,

"Now, God forbid!" said Julian.

"Amen," returned Bridgenorth. "May God send civil war, and pardon those whose madmen bring it on us!"

There was a long pause, during which Julian had scarce lifted his eyes towards Alice, but a glance in that direction, and was struck by the east of melancholy which had stolen over her to which a cheerful, if not a gay expression was most natural. So soon as she caught his eye, she remarked, and, as Julian thought, with significance, that the shadows were lengthening, and was coming on.

He heard; and although satisfied that she had at his departure, he could not, upon the instant, resolve to break the spell which detained her. The language which Bridgenorth held was new and alarming, but so contrary to the manner in which he was brought up, that, as a son of Geoffrey Peveril of the Peak, he would in no case, have thought himself called upon to dispute conclusions, even at the sword's point. But Bridgenorth's opinions were delivered with so much earnestness—seemed so much the result of conviction—they excited in Julian rather a spirit of wonder than of angry controversy. There was a certain sober decision, and sedate melancholy, in the manner said, which, even had he not been the father of Alice (and perhaps Julian was not himself so much he was influenced by that circumstance), would have rendered it difficult to take offence. His language and sentiments were quiet, yet decided kind, upon which it was either to fix controversy, or quarrel, almost impossible to acquiesce in the conclusions which they lead.

While Julian remained, as if spell-bound in his chair, scarce more surprised at the conversation which he found himself, than at the circumstances which he was listening, another circumstance reminded him that the proper time of his stay at Black Fort had been expended. Little Fairy, the pony, which, well accustomed to the visits of her master, began to find her stay rather too long. She had been the subject of the Countess to Julian, whilst a youth, and was a high-spirited mountain breed, remarkable for hardness, for longevity, and for a degree of spirit approaching to that of the dog. Fairy showed her impatience to be moving homeward, at least such seemed the purpose of the shrill whinny with which she startled the female inmates of the parlour, who, the moment afterwards, could not bear smiling to see the nose of the pony peering through the opened casement.

"Fairy reminds me," said Julian, looking up and rising, "that the term of my stay here is exhausted."

"Speak with me yet one moment," said Bridgenorth, withdrawing him into a Gothic recess of an old-fashioned apartment, and speaking so low that he could not be overheard by Alice and her attendant, who, in the meantime, caressed, and fed the fragments of bread, the intruder Fairy.

"You have not, after all," said Bridgenorth, "told me the cause of your coming hither." He seemed as if to enjoy his embarrassment, and then added, "And indeed it were most unnecessary that I should do so. I have not so far forgotten the days of my youth, or those affections which bind poor humanity but too much to the things of this world. Will you find no words to ask of me the great boon which you seek, and which, peradventure, you will placing himself at the head of a party of settlers, shown them the mode of acquiring a victory, which they were on the point of doing to the Indians, is also told; and in all probability truly. The scene the whole tradition commented upon at large in a late New American publication, which goes so far as to ascertain the exact grave to which the remains of Whalley were secretly committed. This singular story has lately afforded the justly celebrated American novelist, Mr. Cooper, the materials from which he has compiled one of those impressive narratives of the early inhabitants of the Transatlantic woods, and the hardy pioneers by whom they were invaded and dispossessed.

have hesitated to make your own, without my knowledge, and against my consent?—Nay, never dedicate thyself, but mark me farther. The patriarch bought his beloved by fourteen years' hard vice to her father, Laban, and they seemed to him as a few days. But he that would wed my daughter must serve, in comparison, but a few days; though in matters of such mighty import, that they all seem as the service of many years.—Reply not me now, but go, and peace be with you."

He retired so quickly, after speaking, that Peveril could literally not an instant to reply. He cast his eyes around the apartment, but Deborah and her charge had also disappeared. His gaze rested for a moment on the portrait of Christian, and his imagination suggested, that his dark features were illuminated by a smile of haughty triumph. He started, and looked more attentively—it was but the effect of an evening beam, which touched the picture at the instant. The effect was gone, and there remained the fixed, grave, inflexible features of the republican soldier.

Julian left the apartment as one who walks in a dream; he mounted Fairy, and, agitated by a variety of thoughts, which he was unable to reduce to order, returned to Castle Rushin before the night sat down.

Here he found all in movement. The Countess, with her son, had, upon some news received, or resolution formed, during his absence, removed, with the principal part of their family, to the yet stronger castle of Holm-Peel, about eight miles distance across the island; and which had been suffered to fall into a much more dilapidated condition than that of Castletown, so far as it could be considered a place of residence. But as a fortress, Holm-Peel was stronger than Castletown; nay, unless sailed regularly, was almost impregnable; and was always held by a garrison belonging to the Lords of the man. Here Peveril arrived at nightfall. He was told in the fishing-village, that the night-bell of the castle had been rung earlier than usual, and the watch set with circumstances of unusual and jealous caution.

Resolving, therefore, not to disturb the garrison by coming at that late hour, he obtained an indifferent lodging in the town for the night, and determined to go to the Castle early on the succeeding morning. He was not sorry thus to gain a few hours of solitude, to think over the agitating events of the preceding day.

CHAPTER XV.

—What seem'd its head,

The likeness of a kingly crown had on.

Paradise Lost.

Sodor, or Holm-Peel,* so is named the castle to which our Julian directed his course early on the

The author has never seen this ancient fortress, which has in its situation so much that is fascinating to the antiquary. Waldron has given the following description, which is perhaps somewhat exaggerated.

"Peel, or Pil-Town, is so called from its garrison and castle: though in effect the castle cannot properly be said to be in the town, an arm of the sea running between them, which in high tides would be deep enough to bear a ship of forty or fifty tons, though sometimes quite drained of salt water, but then it is supplied with fresh by a river which runs from Kirk Jarmin. Morning and evening it itself into the sea. This castle, for its situation, antiquity, strength, and beauty, might justly come in for one of the wonders of the world. Art and nature seem to have vied with each other in the model, nor ought the most minute particular to escape observation. As to its situation it is built upon the top of a huge rock, which rears itself a stupendous height above the sea, with which, as I said before it is surrounded. And also natural fortifications of other lesser rocks, which render it inaccessible but by passing that little arm of the sea which divides the town: thus you may go in a small boat; and the natives, taking up their cloths under their arms, and plucking off their shoes and stockings, frequently wade it in low tides. When I arrived at the foot of the rock, you ascend about some three or four steps, which are cut out of it to the first wall, which is immensely thick and high and built of a very durable and bright stone, though not of the same sort with that of Castle Rushin in the town; and has on it four little houses, or watch-towers, which overlook the sea. The gates are wood, but most curiously bed, carved, and adorned with pilasters. Having passed the first, you have other stairs of near half the number with the following morning, is one of those extraordinary monuments of antiquity with which this singular and interesting island abounds. It occupies the whole of a high rocky peninsula, or rather an island, for it is surrounded by the sea at high water, and scarcely accessible even when the tide is out, although a stone causeway, of great solidity, erected for the express purpose, connects the island with the mainland. The whole space is surrounded by double walls of great strength and thickness; and the access to the interior, at the time which we treat of, was only by two flights of steep and narrow steps, divided from each other by a strong tower and guard-house; under the former of which there is an entrance-arch. The open space within the walls extends to two acres, and contains many objects worthy of antiquarian curiosity. There were, besides the castle itself, two cathedral churches, dedicated, the earlier to Saint Patrick, the latter to Saint Germain; besides two smaller churches; all of which had become, even in that day, more or less ruinous. Their decayed walls, exhibiting the rude and massive architecture of the most remote period, were composed of a ragged grey stone, which formed a singular contrast with the bright red freestone of which the window-cases, corner-stones, arches, and other ornamental parts of the building, were composed.

Besides these four ruinous churches, the space of ground enclosed by the massive exterior walls of Holm-Peel exhibited many other vestiges of the olden time. There was a square mound of earth, facing, with its angles to the points of the compass, one of those mounds, as they were called, on which, in ancient times, the northern tribes elected or recognised their chiefs, and held their solemn popular assemblies, or comitia. There was also one of those singular towers, so common in Ireland as to have proved the favourite theme of her antiquaries, but of which the real use and meaning seem yet to be hidden in the mist of ages. Thus of Holm-Peel had been converted to the purpose of a watch-tower. There were, besides, Runic monuments, of which the legends could not be deciphered; and later inscriptions to the memory of champions, of whom the names only were preserved from oblivion. But tradition and superstitious eld, still most busy where real history is silent, had filled up the long blank of accurate information with tales of Sea-kings and Pirates, Hebridean Chiefs and Norwegian Rascals, who had formerly warred against, and in defence of, this famous castle. Superstition, too, had her tales of goblins, ghosts, and spectres—her legends of saints and demons, of fairies and of familiar spirits, which in no corner of the British empire are told and received with more absolute credulity than in the Isle of Man.

Amidst all these ruins of an older time arose the Castle itself,—now ruinous—but in Charles II.'s reign well garrisoned, and, in a military point of view, kept in complete order. It was a venerable mer to mount, before you come at the second wall, which, as well as the other, is full of port holes for cannon, which are planted on stone crosses on a third wall. Being entered, you find yourself in a wide plain, in the midst of which stands the castle, encompassed by four churches, three of which time has so much decayed, that there is little remaining, besides the walls, and some few tombs, which seem to have been erected with so much care, as to perpetuate the memory of those buried in them till the final dissolution of all things. The fourth is kept a little better in repair; but not so much for its own sake, though it has been the most magnificent of them all, as for a chapel within it, which is appropriated to the use of the bishop, and has under it a prison, or rather a dungeon, for those offenders who are so miserable as to merit the spiritual cure. This is certainly one of the most dreadful places that reanimation can form. The sea runs under it through the hollows of the rock with such a continual roar, that you would think it were every moment breaking in upon you, and over it are the vaults for burying the dead. The stairs descending to this place of terrors are not above thirty, but so steep and narrow, that they are very difficult to go down, a child of eight or nine years old not being able to pass them but sideways. Within it are thirteen pillars on which the whole chapel is supported. They have a superstition, that whatsoever stranger goes to see this cavern out of curiosity, and omits to count the pillars shall do something to occasion being confined there. There are places for penance also under all the other churches, containing several very dark and horrid cells; some have nothing in them either to sit or lie down on, others a small piece of brick work; some are lower and more dark than others, but all of them, in my opinion, dreadful enough for almost any crime humanity is capable of being guilty of;

and very ancient building, containing several apartments of sufficient size and height to be termed noble. But in the surrender of the island by Christian, the furniture had been, in a great measure, plundered or destroyed by the republican soldiers; so that, as we have before hinted, its present state was ill adapted for the residence of the noble proprietor. Yet it had been often the abode, not only of the Lords of Man, but of those state prisoners whom the Kings of Britain sometimes committed to their charge.

In this Castle of Holm-Peel the great king-maker, Richard, Earl of Warwick, was confined, during one period of his eventful life, to ruminate at leisure on his farther schemes of ambition. And here, too, Eleanor, the haughty wife of the good Duke of Gloucester, pined out in seclusion the last days of her banishment. The sentinels pretended that her discontented spectre was often visible at night, traversing the battlements of the external walls, or standing motionless beside a particular solitary turret of one of the watch-towers with which they are flanked; but dissolving into air at cock-crow, or when the bell tolled from the yet remaining tower of Saint Germain's church.

Such was Holm-Peel, as records inform us, till towards the end of the seventeenth century.

It was in one of the lofty but almost unfurnished apartments of this ancient Castle that Julian Peveril found his friend the Earl of Derby, who had that moment sat down to a breakfast composed of various sorts of fish. "Welcome, most imperial Julian," he said; "welcome to our royal fortress; in which, as yet, we are not like to be starved with hunger, though well-nigh dead for cold."

though 'tis supposed they were built with different degrees of horror, that the punishment might be proportionate to the faults of those wretches who were to be confined in them. These have never been made use of since the times of popery; but that under the bishop's chapel is the common and only prison for all offences in the spiritual court, and to that the delinquents are sentenced. But the soldiers of the garrison permit them to suffer their confinement in the castle, it being morally impossible for the strongest constitution to sustain the damps and noisomeness of the cavern even for a few hours, much less for months and years, as is the punishment sometimes allotted. But I shall speak hereafter more fully of the severity of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction. 'Tis certain that there have been very great architects in this island; for the noble monuments in this church, which is kept in repair, and indeed the ruins of the others also, show the builders to be masters of all the orders in that art, though the great number of Doric pillars prove them to be chiefly admirers of that. Nor are the epitaphs and inscriptions on the tombstones less worthy of remark: the various languages in which they are engraved, testify by what a diversity of nations this little spot of earth has been possessed. Though time has defaced too many of the letters to render the remainder intelligible, yet you may easily perceive fragments of the Hebrew, Greek, Latin, Arabian, Saxon, Scotch, and Irish characters: some dates yet visibly declare they were written before the coming of Christ; and, indeed, if one considers the walls, the thickness of them, and the durability of the stone of which they are composed, one must be sensible that a great number of centuries must pass before such strong workmanship could be reduced to the condition it now is. These churches, therefore, were doubtless once the temples of Pagan deities, though since consecrated to the worship of the true divinity; and what confirms me more strongly in this conjecture, is, that there is still a part of one remaining, where stands a large stone directly in form and manner like the Tympanum, which in those days of ignorance, the priests stood upon, to deliver their fabulous oracles. Through one of these old churches, there was formerly a passage to the apartment belonging to the captain of the guard, but is now closed up. The reason they give you for it, is a pretty odd one; but as I think it not sufficient satisfaction to my curious reader, to acquaint him with what sort of buildings this island affords, without letting him know also what traditions are concerning them, I shall have little regard to the censure of those critics, who find fault with every thing out of the common road; and in this, as well as in all other places, where it falls in my way, shall make it my endeavour to lead him into the humours and very souls of the Manx people. They say, that an apparition, called in their language the Maunthe Doog, in the shape of a large black spaniel with curled shaggy hair, was used to haunt Peel Castle, and has been frequently seen in every room, but particularly in the guard chamber, where, as soon as candles were lighted, it came and lay down before the fire, in presence of all the soldiers who at length, by being so much accustomed to the sight of it, lost great part of the terror they were seized with at its first appearance. They still, however, retained a certain awe, not believing it was an evil spirit which only waited permission to do them hurt, and for that reason forbore swearing and all profane discourse while in its company. But though they endured the shock of such a guest when altogether in a body, none cared to be left alone with it; it being the custom, therefore, for one of the soldiers to keep the gates of the castle at a certain hour, and carry the keys to the captain, to whose apartment, as I said before, the way led through a church, Julian answered by inquiring the meaning of the sudden movement.

"Upon my word," replied the Earl, "you know nearly as much of it as I do. My mother has told me nothing about it; supposing, I believe, she shall at length be tempted to inquire; but she will find herself much mistaken. I shall give her credit for full wisdom in her proceedings, rather than her to the trouble to render a reason, though a woman can render one better."

"Come, come; this is affectation my good friend said Julian. "You should inquire into these matters a little more curiously."

"To what purpose?" said the Earl. "To read old stories about the Tinwald laws, and the extending rights of the lords and the clergy and the rest of that Celtic barbarism, which, like Gessé's thorough-paced doctrine, enters at one place through, and goes out at the other?"

"Come, my lord," said Julian, "you are as indifferent as you would represent yourself to be, are dying of curiosity to know what this is all about; only you think it the courtly thing to appear careless about your own affairs."

"Why, what should it be about," said the Earl, "unless some factious dispute between Majesty's minister, Governor Nowell, and the clergy? or perhaps some dispute between the ecclesiastical jurisdictions? for I am sure our Majesty cares as little as any king in the world."

"I had rather suppose there is intelligence in England," said Julian. "I heard last night at town, that Greenhalgh is come over with new news."

they agreed among themselves, that whoever was to ensure night, his fellow in this errand should accompany that went first, and by this means, no man would be singly to the danger; for I forgot to mention that the Maunthe Doog was always seen to come out from that passage of the day and return to it again as soon as the moon appeared, which made them look on this place as its peculiar haunt, and by the strength of its glare, which was more daring than ordinary, laughed at the soldiers' companions, and though it was not his turn to go out, would needs take that office upon him, to testify to all the soldiers endeavoured to dissuade him, but he would not be deterred, and swore that he would follow the Maunthe Doog if he would try if it were dog or cat. Having talked in a very reproachful manner to the soldiers, he went out of the guard chamber, and a great noise was heard, but no one could see what occasioned it, till the adventure was over, as he had been at leaving them, he was now become silent enough, for he was never heard to speak more after all the time he lived, which was three days, he was seen by all who came near him, either to speak, or if he could not, to make some signs, by which they might conjecture what had happened to him, yet nothing intelligible could be gathered from him, only, that by the distortion of his limbs and features, it was evident that he died in agonies more than a common death. The Maunthe Doog was, however, never seen in the castle, nor would any one attempt to go through the passage, for which reason it was closed up, and another way was made. This accident happened about three score years since, and is attested by several, but especially by an old soldier, who says he had seen it oftener than he had then hours of his life. Having taken notice of every thing remarkable in the castle, which in spite of the magnificence the pride of nobles adorned the palaces of princes with, exceeds not only in the nobleness of its structure, but also in the nobleness of its situation, you cannot enter the castle without being struck with a veneration, which the most beautiful mansions of later years cannot inspire you with; the largeness of the rooms, the vast echo resounding through the many winding galleries, the prospect of the sea, and the floating on the waves, make you fancy yourself in a superb palace, the most refined and pure that the soul is capable of conceiving. In this description, the account of the inscriptions in oriental languages, and bearing date before the Christian era, is certainly as much exaggerated as the story of the Maunthe Doog itself. It would be very desirable to find out the meaning of the word Maunthe in the Manx language, which is a dialect of Gaelic. I observe, that maunthe in Gaelic, amongst other significations, has that of artful or speedy; and also, that a fall of his master's authority, by leaving him and sawing at him, was termed maunthe; but neither of these particulars tends to explain the very impressive story of the Maunthe Doog of Peel Castle.

"He brought me nothing that was pleasant, I rot well," said the Earl. "I expected something from St. Evremond or Hamilton—some new plays by Dryden or Lee, and some waggy or lampoons from the Rose Coffee-house; and the fellow has brought me nothing but a parcel of tracts about Protestants and Papists, and a folio play-book, one of the conceptions, as she calls them, of that old mad-woman the Duchess of Newcastle."

"Hush, my lord, for Heaven's sake," said Peveril; "here comes the Countess; and you know she takes fire at the least slight to her ancient friend."

"Let her read her ancient friend's works herself, then," said the Earl, "and think her as wise as she can; but I would not give one of Waller's songs, or Denham's satires, for a whole cart-load of her Grace's trash.—But here comes our mother, with are on her brow."

The Countess of Derby entered the apartment accordingly, holding in her hand a number of papers. Her dress was a mourning habit, with a deep train of black velvet, which was borne by a little favourite attendant, a deaf and dumb girl, whom, in compassion to her misfortune, the Countess had educated about her person for some years. Upon this unfortunate being, with the touch of romance which marked many of her proceedings, Lady Derby had conferred the name of Fenella, after some ancient princess of the island. The Countess herself was not much changed since we last presented her to our readers. Age had rendered her step more slow, but not less majestic; and while it traced some wrinkles on her brow, had failed to quench the edate fire of her dark eye. The young men rose to receive her with the formal reverence which they knew she loved, and were greeted by her with equal kindness.

"Cousin Peveril," she said, (for so she always called Julian, in respect of his mother being a kinswoman of her husband,) "you were ill abroad last night, when we much needed your counsel."

Julian answered with a blush which he could not prevent, "That he had followed his sport among the mountains too far—had returned late—and finding her ladyship was removed from Castletown, had instantly followed the family hither; but as the night-bell was rung, and the watch set, he had deemed it more respectful to lodge for the night in the town."

"It is well," said the Countess; "and, to do you justice, Julian, you are seldom a truant neglecter of appointed hours, though, like the rest of the youth of this age, you sometimes suffer your sports to consume too much of time that should be spent otherwise. But for your friend Philip, he is an avowed contemner of good order, and seems to find pleasure in wasting time, even when he does not enjoy it."

"I have been enjoying my time just now at least," said the Earl, rising from the table, and picking his teeth carelessly. "These fresh mullets are delicious, and so is the Lachrymæ Christi. I pray you to sit down to breakfast, Julian, and partake the goods my royal foresight has provided. Never was King of Tan nearer being left to the mercy of the execrable Randy of his dominions. Old Griffiths would never, in the midst of our speedy retreat of last night, have had sense enough to secure a few flasks, had I not given him a hint on that important subject. But presence of mind amid danger and tumult, is a jewel we have always possessed."

"I wish, then, Philip, you would exert it to better purpose," said the Countess, half smiling, half displeased; for she doted upon her son with all a mother's fondness, even when she was most angry with him for being deficient in the peculiar and chivalrous disposition which had distinguished his father, and which was so analogous to her own romantic and high-minded character. "Lend me your signet," she added with a sigh; "for it were, I fear, vain to ask you to read over these despatches from England, and execute the warrants which I have thought necessary to prepare in consequence."

"My signet you shall command with all my heart, madam," said Earl Philip; "but spare me the revision of what you are much more capable to decide upon. I am, you know, a most complete Roi fainéant, and never once interfered with my Maire de palais in her proceedings."

The Countess made signs to her little train-bearer, who immediately went to seek for wax and a light, with which she presently returned.

In the meanwhile, the Countess continued, addressing Peveril. "Philip does himself less than justice. When you were absent, Julian, (for if you had been here I would have given you the credit of prompting your friend,) he had a spirited controversy with the Bishop, for an attempt to enforce spiritual censures against a poor wretch, by confining her in the vault under the chapel."

"Do not think better of me than I deserve," said the Earl to Peveril; "my mother has omitted to tell you the culprit was pretty Peggy of Ramsey, and her crime what in Cupid's courts would have been called a peccadillo."

"Do not make yourself worse than you are," replied Peveril, who observed the Countess's cheek redden,—“you know you would have done as much for the oldest and poorest cripple in the island. Why, the vault is under the burial ground of the chapel, and, for aught I know, under the ocean itself, such a roaring do the waves make in its vicinity. I think no one could remain there long, and retain his reason."

"It is an infernal hole," answered the Earl, "and I will have it built up one day—that is full certain.—But hold—hold—for God's sake, madam—what are you going to do?—Look at the seal before you put it to the warrant—you will see it is a choice antique cameo Cupid, riding on a flying fish—I had it for twenty zechins, from Signor Furabosco at Rome—a most curious matter for an antiquary, but which will add little faith to a Manx warrant."

"How can you trifle thus, you simple boy?" said the Countess, with vexation in her tone and look. "Let me have your signet, or rather, take these warrants, and sign them yourself."

"My signet—my signet—Oh! you mean that with the three monstrous legs, which I suppose was devised as the most preposterous device, to represent our most absurd Majesty of Man.—The signet—I have not seen it since I gave it to Gibbon, my monkey, to play with.—He did whine for it most piteously—I hope he has not gemmed the green breast of ocean with my symbol of sovereignty!"

"Now, by Heaven," said the Countess, trembling, and colouring deeply with anger, "it was your father's signet! the last pledge which he sent, with his love to me, and his blessing to thee, the night before they murdered him at Bolton!"

"Mother, dearest mother," said the Earl, startled out of his apathy, and taking her hand, which he kissed tenderly, "I did but jest—the signet is safe—Peveril knows that it is so.—Go fetch it, Julian, for Heaven's sake—here are my keys—it is in the left-hand drawer of my travelling cabinet.—Nay, mother, forgive me—it was but a mauvaise plaisanterie; only an ill-imagined jest, ungracious, and in bad taste, I allow—but only one of Philip's follies. Look at me, dearest mother, and forgive me!"

The Countess turned her eyes towards him, from which the tears were fast falling.

"Philip," she said, "you try me too unkindly, and too severely. If times are changed, as I have heard you allege—if the dignity of rank, and the high feelings of honour and duty, are now drowned in giddy jests and trifling pursuits, let me at least, who live secluded from all others, die without perceiving the change which has happened, and, above all, without perceiving it in mine own son. Let me not learn the general prevalence of this levity, which laughs at every sense of dignity or duty, through your personal disrespect—Let me not think that when I die—

"Speak nothing of it, mother," said the Earl, interrupting her affectionately. "It is true, I cannot promise to be all my father and his fathers were; for we wear silk vests for their steel coats, and feathered beavers for their crested helmets. But believe me, though to be an absolute Palmerin of England is not in my nature, no son ever loved a mother more dearly, or would do more to oblige her. And that you may own this, I will forthwith not only seal the warrants, to the great endangerment of my precious fingers, but also read the same from end to end, as well as the despatches thereunto appertaining."

A mother is easily appeased, even when most offended; and it was with an expanding heart that the Countess saw her son's very handsome features, while reading these papers, settle into an expression of deep seriousness, such as they seldom wore. It seemed to her as if the family likeness to his gallant but unfortunate father increased, when the expression of their countenances became similar in gravity. The Earl had no sooner perused the despatches, which he did with great attention, than he rose and said, "Julian, come with me."

The Countess looked surprised. "I was wont to share your father's counsels, my son," she said; "but do not think that I wish to intrude myself upon yours. I am too well pleased to see you assume the power and the duty of thinking for yourself, which is what I have so long urged you to do. Nevertheless, my experience, who have been so long administrator of your authority in Man, might not, I think, be superfluous to the matter in hand."

"Hold me excused, dearest mother," said the Earl, gravely. "The interference was none of my seeking; had you taken your own course, without consulting me, it had been well; but since I have entered on the affair—and it appears sufficiently important—I must transact it to the best of my own ability."

"Go, then, my son," said the Countess, "and may Heaven enlighten thee with its counsel, since thou wilt have none of mine.—I trust that you, Master Peveril, will remind him of what is fit for his own honour; and that only a coward abandons his rights, and only a fool trusts his enemies."

The Earl answered not, but, taking Peveril by the arm, led him up a winding stair to his own apartment, and from thence into a projecting turret, where, amidst the roar of waves and sea-mews' clang, he held with him the following conversation.

"Peveril, it is well I looked into these warrants. My mother queens it at such a rate as may cost me not only my crown, which I care little for, but perhaps my head, which, though others may think little of it, I would feel it an inconvenience to be deprived of."

"What on earth is the matter?" said Peveril, with considerable anxiety.

"It seems," said the Earl of Derby, "that Old England, who takes a frolicsome brain-fever once every two or three years, for the benefit of her doctors, and the purification of the torpid lethargy brought on by peace and prosperity, is now gone stark staring mad on the subject of a real or supposed Popish Plot. I read one programme on the subject, by a fellow called Oates, and thought it the most absurd foolery I ever perused. But that cunning fellow Shaftesbury, and some others amongst the great ones, have taken it up, and are driving on at such a rate as makes harness crack, and horses smoke for it. The King, who has sworn never to kiss the pillow his father went to sleep on, temporizes and gives way to the current; the Duke of York, suspected and hated on account of his religion, is about to be driven to the continent; several principal Catholic nobles are in the Tower already; and the nation, like a bull at Tutbury-running, is persecuted with so many inflammatory rumours and pestilent pamphlets, that she has cocked her hind leg up her heels, taken the bit between her teeth, and is as furiously unmanageable as in the year 1581."

"All this you must have known already," said Peveril; "I wonder you told me not of news so important."

"It would have taken long to tell," said the Earl; "moreover, I desired to have you solus; though I was about to speak when my mother entered; and to conclude, it was no business of mine. But the despatches of my politic mother's private correspondent put a new face on the whole matter; for seems some of the informers—a trade which, having become a thriving one, is now pursued by many—have dared to glance at the Countess herself as an agent in this same plot—ay, and have found out that are willing enough to believe their report."

"On mine honour," said Peveril, "you told me it with great coolness. I think the Countess is more composed of the two; for, except her movement hitherto, she exhibited no mark of alarm; moreover, seemed no way more anxious to communicate the matter to your lordship than deemed rendered necessary."

"My good mother," said the Earl, "love power though it has cost her dear. I wish I could say that my neglect of business is entirely excusable in order to leave it in her hands, but that her motive combines with natural indolence. As she seems to have feared I should not think enough of her in this emergency, and she was right: I am posing so."

"How comes the emergency upon you?" said Julian; "and what form does the danger assume?"

"Marry, thus it is," said the Earl: "I need but bid you remember the affair of Colonel Christian. That man, besides his widow, who is possessed of a large property—Dame Christian of Kirk-Traugh, whom you have often heard of, and perhaps never saw at all. Now this brother—but I dare say you know all about it?"

"Not I, on my honour," said Peveril; "yet the Countess seldom or never alludes to the subject."

"Why?" replied the Earl, "I believe in her heart she is something ashamed of that gallant at a royalty and supreme jurisdiction, the consequences of which maimed my estate so cruelly.—Well, then, this same Edward Christian was one of the dempsters at the time, and, naturally enough, was unwilling to concur in the sentence which adjudged his ainé to be shot like a dog. My mother, who was then in high force, and not to be controlled by any one, would have served the dempster with the same sauce with which she dressed his brother, but he not been wise enough to fly from the island. Since that time, the thing has slept on all hands; and though we knew that Dempster Christian made occasionally secret visits to his friends in the island along with two or three other Puritans of the same stamp, and particularly a prick-eared rogue, called Bridgenorth, brother-in-law to the deceased, yet my mother, thank Heaven, has hitherto had the sense to connive at them, though, for some reason or other, she holds this Bridgenorth in especial disfavour."

"And why," said Peveril, forcing himself to speak in order to conceal the very unpleasant surprise which he felt, "why does the Countess now depart from so prudent a line of conduct?"

"You must know the case is now different. The rogues are not satisfied with toleration—they would have supremacy. They have found friends in the present heat of the popular mind. My mother's name, and especially that of her confessor, Aldred the Jesuit, have been mentioned in this beautiful maze of a plot, which, if any such at all exists, she knows as little of as you or I. However, she is a Catholic, and that is enough; and I have little doubt that if the fellows could seize on our scrap of a kingdom here, and cut all our throats, they would have the thanks of the present house of Commons, as willingly as old Christian had those of the Rump, for a similar service."

"From whence did you receive all this informa-

"Don't?" said Peveril, again speaking, though by the same effort which a man makes who talks in his sleep.

"Aldrick has seen the Duke of York in secret, and his Royal Highness, who wept while he confessed his want of power to protect his friends—and it is no trifle will wring tears from him—told him to send us information that we should look to our safety, for that Dempster Christian and Bridgenorth were in the island, with secret and severe orders; that they had formed a considerable party there, and were likely to be owned and protected in any thing they might undertake against us. The people of Ramsey and Castletown are unluckily discontented about some new regulation of the imposts; and, to tell you the truth, though I thought yesterday's sudden remove a whim of my mother's, I am almost satisfied they would have blockaded us in Rushin Castle, where we could not have held out for lack of provisions. Here we are better supplied, and, as we are in our guard, it is likely the intended rising will not take place."

"And what is to be done in this emergency?" said Peveril.

"That is the very question, my gentle coz," answered the Earl. "My mother sees but one way of going to work, and that is by royal authority. Here are the warrants she had prepared, to search for, take, and apprehend the bodies of Edward Christian and Robert—no, Ralph Bridgenorth, and bring them to instant trial. No doubt, she would soon have had them in the Castle court, with a dozen of the old matchlocks levelled against them—that is her way of solving all sudden difficulties."

"But in which I trust you do not acquiesce, my lord," answered Peveril, whose thoughts instantly reverted to Alice, if they could ever be said to be absent from her.

"Truly, I acquiesce in no such matter," said the Earl. "William Christian's death cost me a fair half of my inheritance. I have no fancy to fall under the displeasure of my royal brother, King Charles, for a new escapade of the same kind. But how to pacify my mother, I know not. I wish the insurrection would take place, and then, as we are better provided than they can be, we might knock the knaves in the head; and yet, since they began the fray, we should keep the law on our side."

"Were it not better," said Peveril, "if by any means these men could be induced to quit the island?"

"Surely," replied the Earl; "but that will be no easy matter—they are stubborn on principle, and empty threats will not move them. This storm-blast in London is wind in their sails, and they will run their length, you may depend on it. I have sent orders, however, to clap up the Manxmen upon whose assistance they depended, and if I can find the two worthies themselves, here are sloops enough in the harbour—I will take the freedom to send them on a pretty distant voyage, and I hope matters will be settled before they return to give an account of it."

At this moment a soldier belonging to the garrison approached the two young men, with many bows and tokens of respect. "How now, friend?" said the Earl to him. "Leave off thy courtesies, and tell thy business."

The man, who was a native islander, answered in Manx, that he had a letter for his honour, Master Julian Peveril. Julian snatched the billet hastily, and asked whence it came.

"It was delivered to him by a young woman," the soldier replied, "who had given him a piece of money to deliver it into Master Peveril's own hand."

"Thou art a lucky fellow, Julian," said the Earl. "With that grave brow of thine, and thy character for sobriety and early wisdom, you set the girls a-wooing without waiting till they are asked; whilst I, their drudge and vassal, waste both language and leisure, without getting a kind word or look, far less a billet-doux."

This the young Earl said with a smile of conscious triumph, as in fact he valued himself not a little upon the interest which he supposed himself to possess with the fair sex.

Meanwhile the letter impressed on Peveril a different train of thoughts from what his companion apprehended. It was in Alice's hand, and contained these few words:—

"I fear what I am going to do is wrong; but I must see you. Meet me at noon at Goddard Crovan's Stone, with as much secrecy as you may."

The letter was signed only with the initials A. B.; but Julian had no difficulty in recognising the handwriting, which he had often seen, and which was remarkably beautiful. He stood suspended, for he saw the difficulty and impropriety of withdrawing himself from the Countess and his friend at this moment of impending danger; and yet, to neglect this invitation was not to be thought of. He paused in the utmost perplexity.

"Shall I read your riddle?" said the Earl. "Go where love calls you—I will make an excuse to my mother—only, most grave anchorite, be hereafter more indulgent to the failings of others than you have been hitherto, and blaspheme not the power of the little deity."

"Nay, but, Cousin Derby"—said Peveril and stopped short, for he really knew not what to say. Secured himself by a virtuous passion from the contagious influence of the time, he had seen with regret his noble kinsman mingle more in its irregularities than he approved of, and had sometimes played the part of a monitor. Circumstances seemed at present to give the Earl a right of retaliation. He kept his eye fixed on his friend, as if he waited till he should complete his sentence, and at length exclaimed, "What! cousin, quite a-la-mort! O, most judicious Julian! O, most precise Peveril! have you bestowed so much wisdom on me that you have none left for yourself? Come, be frank—tell me name and place—or say but the colour of the eyes of the most emphatic she—or do but let me have the pleasure to hear thee say, 'I love!'—confess one touch of human frailty—conjugate the verb amo, and I will be a gentle school-master, and you shall have, as father Richards used to say, when we were under his ferule, 'licentia exeundi.'"

"Enjoy your pleasant humour at my expense, my lord," said Peveril; "I fairly will confess thus much, that I would fain, if it consisted with my honour and your safety, have two hours at my own disposal; the more especially as the manner in which I shall employ them may much concern the safety of the island."

"Very likely, I dare say," answered the Earl, still laughing. "No doubt you are summoned out by some Lady Politic Wouldbe of the isle, to talk over some of the breast-laws; but never mind—go, and go speedily, that you may return as quick as possible. I expect no immediate explosion of this grand conspiracy. When the rogues see us on our guard, they will be cautious how they break out. Only, once more, make haste."

Peveril thought this last advice was not to be neglected; and, glad to extricate himself from the raillery of his cousin, walked down towards the gate of the Castle, meaning to cross over to the village, and there take horse at the Earl's stables, for the place of rendezvous.

CHAPTER XVI.

Acosto. Can she not speak?

Oswald. If speech be only in accented sounds,
Framed by the tongue and lips, the maiden's dumb;
But if by quick and apprehensive look,
By motion, sign, and glance, to give each meaning,
Express as clothed in language, be term'd speech,
She hath that wondrous faculty; for her eyes,
Like the bright stars of heaven, can hold discourse, Though it be mute and soundless. Old Play.

At the head of the first flight of steps which descended towards the difficult and well-defended entrance of the Castle of Holm-Peel, Peveril was met and stopped by the Countess's train-bearer. The little creature—for she was of the least and slightest size of womankind—was exquisitely well formed in all her limbs, which the dress she usually since was composed into the like expression of emotion; and the fire of her large dark eyes, appeared in general so keen and piercing as to over-animate the little sphere to which they were directed, seemed quenched, for the moment, by large drops which hung on her long eyelashes, without falling.

Peveril was far from being void of sympathy towards the poor girl, whose motives in opposition to his departure appeared to be her affectionate solicitation for her mistress's safety. He endeavoured to reassure her by smiles, and, at the same time, by such signs as he could devise, to intimate that there was no danger, and that he would return; and having succeeded in extricating himself from her grasp, and in passing her on the stair, he began to descend the steps as speedily as he could in order to avoid farther importunity.

With activity much greater than his, the dumb maid hastened to intercept him, and succeeded by seizing herself, at the imminent risk of life and limb, a second time into the pass which he was descending, so as to interrupt his purpose. In order to get through this, she was obliged to let herself drop a considerable height from the wall of a small flanking tower, where two patereroes were placed to scour the island, in case any enemy could have mounted so high. Julian had scarce time to shudder at her peril, when he beheld her about to spring from the precipice, like a thing of gossamer, she stood undisturbed and uninjured on the rocky platform below. Astonished, by the gravity of his look and gesture, he made her understand how much he blamed her conduct; but the reproof, though obviously quite ineffectual, was entirely thrown away. A hasty nod of her hand intimated how she contemned the rebuke, and the remonstrance; while at the same time she instantly resumed, with more eagerness than before, the earnest and impressive gestures by which she endeavoured to detain him in the fortress.

He was somewhat staggered by her pertinacity. "Impossible," he thought, "that any danger can be to the Countess, of which this poor maiden is so certain; the extreme acuteness of her observation, and the knowledge which has escaped others?" He signed to Fenella hastily to give him the book, and the pencil which she usually carried with her. He wrote on them the question, "Is there any real danger to your mistress, that you thus stop me?" "There is danger around the Countess," was the answer instantly written down; "but there is much more danger to your own purpose."

"What?—what know you of my purpose?" "I know nothing," he answered, in his surprise, that the party concerned, had neither ear to comprehend, nor tongue to utter language. She had regained the book in the meantime, and sketched, with the pencil, on one of the leaves, a scene which was presented to Julian. To his infinite surprise he recognised Goddard Crovan's stone, a remarkable monument, of which she had given the outline with great accuracy; together with a male and female figure, which, though only indicated by a few slight strokes of the pencil, bore yet, he thought, some resemblance to himself and Alice Bridgenorth.

He had gazed on the sketch for an instant, when, to his surprise, Fenella took the book from his hand, and pointed her finger upon the drawing, and slowly and solemnly shook her head, with a frown which seemed to forbid the meeting which was there represented. Julian, however, though disconcerted, was in no way disposed to submit to the authority of his maid. By whatever means she, who so seldom came from the Countess's apartment, had become acquainted with a secret which he thought entirely confidential, he esteemed it the more necessary to keep it so. He formed the intention of seeking out Bridgenorth, and entertaining an idea that a person so reasonable and calm as he had shown himself in their late interview, might be persuaded, when he understood the Countess was aware of his intrigues, to put her to her danger and his own, by withdrawing from the island. And could he succeed in this point, he should at once, he thought, render a material benefit to the father of his beloved Alice—remove the Earl from his state of anxiety—save the Countess from a second time putting her feudal jurisdiction in opposition to that of the Crown of England—and secure quiet possession of the island to her and her family.

With this scheme of mediation in his mind, Peveril determined to rid himself of the opposition of Fenella to his departure, with less ceremony than he had hitherto observed towards her; and suddenly lifting up the damsel in his arms before she was aware of his purpose, he turned about, set her down on the steps above him, and began to descend the pass himself as speedily as possible. It was then that the dumb maiden gave full course to the vehemence of her disposition; and clapping her hands repeatedly, expressed her displeasure in a sound, or rather a shriek, so extremely dissonant, that it resembled more the cry of a wild creature, than any thing which could have been uttered by female organs. Peveril was so astounded at the scream as it rung through the living rocks, that he could not help stopping and looking back in alarm, to satisfy himself that she had not sustained some injury. He saw her, however, perfectly safe, though her face seemed inflamed and distorted with passion. She stamped at him with her foot, shook her clenched hand, and turning her back upon him, without farther adieu, ran up the rude steps as lightly as a kid could have tripped up that rugged ascent, and paused for a moment at the summit of the first flight.

Julian could feel nothing but wonder and compassion for the impotent passion of a being so unfortunately circumstanced, cut off, as it were, from the rest of mankind, and incapable of receiving in childhood that moral discipline which teaches us mastery of our wayward passions, ere yet they have attained their meridian strength and violence. He waved his hand to her, in token of amicable farewell; but she only replied by once more menacing him with her little hand clenched; and then ascending the rocky staircase with almost preternatural speed, was soon out of sight.

Julian, on his part, gave no farther consideration to her conduct or its motives, but hastening to the village on the mainland, where the stables of the Castle were situated, he again took his palfrey from the stall, and was soon mounted and on his way to the appointed place of rendezvous, much marvelling, as he ambled forward with speed far greater than was promised by the diminutive size of the animal he was mounted on, what could have happened to produce so great a change in Alice's conduct towards him, that in place of enjoining his absence as usual, or recommending his departure from the island, she should now voluntarily invite him to a meeting. Under impression of the various doubts which succeeded each other in his imagination, he sometimes pressed Fairy's sides with his legs; sometimes laid his holly rod lightly on her neck; sometimes incited her by his voice, for the mettled animal needed neither whip nor spur, and achieved the distance betwixt the Castle of Holm-Peel and the stone at Goddard Crovan, at the rate of twelve miles within the hour.

The monumental stone, designed to commemorate some feat of an ancient King of Man, which had been long forgotten, was erected on the side of a narrow lonely valley, or rather glen, secluded from observation by the steepness of its banks, upon a projection of which stood the tall, shapeless, solitary rock, frowning, like a shrouded giant, over the brawling of the small rivulet which watered the ravine.

CHAPTER XVII.

*This a love-meeting! See the maiden mourn,
And the sad suitor bend his looks on earth.
There's more bath pass'd between them than belongs,
To Love's sweet sorrows.* Old Play.

As he approached the monument of Goddard Crovan, Julian cast many an anxious glance to see whether any object visible beside the huge grey stone should apprise him, whether he was anticipated, at the appointed place of rendezvous, by her who had named it. Nor was it long before the flutter of a mantle, which the breeze slightly waved, and the motion necessary to replace it upon the wearer's shoulders, made him aware that Alice had already reached their place of meeting. One instant set the palfrey at liberty, with slackened girths and loosened reins, to pick its own way through the dell at will; another placed Julian Peveril by the side of Alice Bridgenorth.

That Alice should extend her hand to her lover, as with the ardour of a young greyhound he bounded over the obstacles of the rugged path, was as natural as that Julian, seizing on the hand so kindly stretched out, should devour it with kisses, and, for a moment or two, without reprehension; while the other hand, which should have aided in the liberation of its fellow, served to hide the blushes of the fair owner. But Alice, young as she was, and attached to Julian by such long habits of kindly intimacy, still knew well how to subdue the tendency of her own treacherous affections.

"This is not right," she said, extricating her hand from Julian's grasp, "this is not right, Julian. If I have been too rash in admitting such a meeting as the present, it is not you that should make me sensible of my folly."

Julian Peveril's mind had been early illumined with that touch of romantic fire which deprives passion of selfishness, and confers on it the high and refined tone of generous and disinterested devotion. He let go the hand of Alice with as much respect as he could have paid to that of a princess; and when she seated herself upon a rocky fragment, over which nature had stretched a cushion of moss and lichen, interspersed with wild flowers, backed with a bush of copsewood, he took his place beside her, indeed, but at such distance as to intimate the duty of an attendant, who was there only to hear and to obey. Alice Bridgenorth became more assured as she observed the power which she possessed over her lover; and the self-command which Peveril exhibited, which other damsels in her situation might have judged inconsistent with intensity of passion, she appreciated more justly, as a proof of his respectful and disinterested sincerity. She recovered, in addressing him, the tone of confidence which rather belonged to the scenes of their early acquaintance, than to those which had passed betwixt them since Peveril had disclosed his affection, and thereby had brought restraint upon their intercourse.

"Julian," she said, "your visit of yesterday—your most ill-timed visit, has distressed me much. It has misled my father—it has endangered you. At all risks, I resolved that you should know this, and blame me not if I have taken a bold and imprudent step in desiring this solitary interview, since you are aware how little poor Deborah is to be trusted."

"Can you fear misconstruction from me, Alice?" replied Peveril, warmly; "from me, whom you have thus highly favoured—thus deeply obliged?"

"Cease your protestations, Julian," answered the maiden, "they do but make me the more sensible that I have acted over boldly. But I did for the best.—I could not see you whom I have known so long—you, who say you regard me with partiality!"

"Say that I regard you with partiality!" interrupted Peveril in his turn. "Ah, Alice, what a cold and doubtful phrase you have used to express the most devoted, the most sincere affection!"

"Well, then," said Alice, sadly, "we will not quarrel about words; but do not again interrupt me. I could not, I say, see you, who, I believe, regard me with sincere though vain and fruitless attachment, rush blindfold into a snare, deceived and seduced by those very feelings towards me."

"I understand you not, Alice," said Peveril; "nor can I see any danger to which I am at present exposed. The sentiments which your father has expressed towards me, are of a nature irreconcilable with hostile purposes. If he is not offended with the bold wishes I may have formed, and his whole behaviour shows the contrary, I know not a man on earth from whom I have less cause to apprehend danger or ill-will."

"My father," said Alice, "means well by his country, and well by you; yet I sometimes fear he may rather injure than serve his good cause: still more do I dread, that in attempting to use you as an auxiliary, he may forget those ties which ought to bind you, and I am sure which will bind you, to a different line of conduct from his own."

"You lead me into still deeper darkness," answered Peveril. "That your father's spectacle of politics differs widely from mine, I know; but how many instances have occurred, even in the bloody scenes of civil warfare, of good and worthy men laying the prejudice of party aside, and regarding each other with respect, and even with friendly attachment, without being in principle on either side?"

"It may be so," said Alice; "but such is the league which my father desires to form with him, and that to which he hopes your misplaced partiality towards his daughter may afford a motive for your forming with him."

"And what is it," said Peveril, "which I must refuse, with such a prospect before me?"

"Treachery and dishonour!" replied Alice; "neither would render you unworthy of the position at which you aim—ay, were it more worthy than I confess it to be."

"Would your father," said Peveril, "willingly received the impression which he is designed to convey,—would he, whose views are so strict and severe—would he wish to see me in aught, to which such harsh epithets as treachery and dishonour can be applied with the least shadow of truth?"

"Do not mistake me, Julian," replied the maiden, "my father is incapable of requesting anything that is not to his thinking just and honourable; nay, he conceives that he only claims from me a debt, which is due as a creature to the Creator, as a man to your fellow-men."

"So guarded, where can be the danger of intercourse?" replied Julian. "If he be ready to require, and I determined to accede to, what save what flows from conviction, what have I to fear, Alice? And how is my intercourse with my father dangerous? Believe not so; his speech has already made impression on me in some particulars, and he listened with candour and patience to objections which I made occasionally. You do better Bridgenorth less than justice in confounding him with the unreasonable bigots in policy and religion, who can listen to no argument but in favour of their own prepossessions."

"Julian," replied Alice, "it is you who misjudge my father's powers, and his purpose with regard to you, and who overrate your own powers of resistance. I am but a girl, but I have been taught in circumstances to think for myself, and to consider the character of those who are around me. My father's views in ecclesiastical and civil policy are as dear to him as the life which he cherishes to advance them. They have been, with little exception, his companions through life. They brought him at one period into prosperity, and when they suited not the times, he suffered for having heeded them. They have become not only a part, but the very dearest part, of his existence. If he should leave them not to you at first, in the inflexible strength which they have acquired over his mind, do not believe that they are the less powerful. He desires to make converts must begin by degrees. But that he should sacrifice to an inexperienced young man, whose ruling motive he will not but childish passion, any part of those treasured principles which he has maintained through good report and bad reputation—O, do not dream of such an impossibility! If you meet at all, you must be the witness of the seal—you must receive—he must bestow an absolute impression."

"That," said Peveril, "were unreasonable!"

I frankly avow to you, Alice, that I am not a born bigot to the opinions entertained by my father, much as I respect his person. I could wish our Cavaliers, or whatsoever they are pleased to call themselves, would have some more charity towards those who differ from them in Church and state. But to hope that I would surrender the principles in which I have lived, were to suppose me capable of deserting my benefactress, and breaking the hearts of my parents."

"Even so I judged of you," answered Alice; and, therefore, I asked this interview, to conjure that you will break off all intercourse with our family—return to your parents—or, what will be much safer, visit the continent once more, and abide till God sends better days to England, for these are dark with many a storm."

"And can you bid me go, Alice," said the young man, taking her unresisting hand; "can you bid me go, and yet own an interest in my fate?—Can you bid me, for fear of dangers, which, as a man, as a gentleman, and a loyal one, I am bound to show my face to, meanly abandon my parents, my friends, my country—suffer the existence of evils which I might aid to prevent, forego the prospect of doing much little good as might be in my power—fall from an active and honourable station, into the condition of fugitive and time-server—Can you bid me do all this, Alice? Can you bid me do all this, and, in the same breath, bid farewell for ever to you and happiness?—It is impossible—I cannot surrender at once to love and my honour."

"There is no remedy," said Alice, but she could not suppress a sigh while she said so—"there is no remedy—none whatever. What we might have been each other, placed in more favourable circumstances, it avails not to think of now; and, circumstances as we are, with open war about to break out between our parents and friends, we can be but well-wishers—cold and distant well-wishers, who must part on this spot, and at this hour, never to meet again."

"No, by Heaven!" said Peveril, animated at the same time by his own feelings, and by the sight of the emotions which his companion in vain endeavoured to suppress—"No, by Heaven!" he exclaimed, "we part not—Alice, we part not. If I am to leave my native land, you shall be my companion in my exile. What have you to lose?—Whom have you to abandon?—Your father?—The good old cause, which it is termed, is dearer to him than a thousand daughters; and setting him aside, what tie is there between you and this barren isle—between my Alice and any spot of the British dominions, where her father does not sit by her?"

"Oh, Julian," answered the maiden, "why make me duty more painful by visionary projects, which I ought not to name, or I to listen to?—Your parents—my father—it cannot be!"

"Fear not for my parents, Alice," replied Julian, and pressing close to his companion's side, he ventured to throw his arm around her; "they love me, and they will soon learn to love, in Alice, the only being on earth who could have rendered their son happy. And for your own father, when State and Church intrigues allow him to bestow a thought upon you, will he not think that your happiness, your purity, is better cared for when you are my wife, than were you to continue under the mercenary charge of yonder foolish woman? What could his desire better for you, than the establishment which will one day be mine? Come then, Alice, and since you condemn me to banishment—since you deny me a share in those stirring achievements which are about to agitate England—come! do you, if you only can, do you reconcile me to exile and indignity, and give happiness to one, who, for your sake, is willing to resign honour!"

"It cannot—it cannot be," said Alice, faltering as she uttered her negative. "And yet," she said, "how many in my place—left alone and unprotected, I am—But I must not—I must not—for your sake, Julian, I must not!"

"Say not for my sake you must not, Alice," said

Peveril, eagerly; "this is adding insult to cruelty. If you will do aught for my sake, you will say yes; or you will suffer this dear head to drop on my shoulder—the slightest sign—the moving of an eyelid, shall signify consent. All shall be prepared within an hour; within another, the priest shall unite us; and within a third, we leave the isle behind us, and seek our fortunes on the continent." But while he spoke, in joyful anticipation of the consent which he implored, Alice found means to collect together her resolution, which, staggered by the eagerness of her lover, the impulse of her own affections, and the singularity of her situation,—seeming, in her case, to justify what would have been most blamable in another,—had more than half abandoned her.

The result of a moment's deliberation was fatal to Julian's proposal. She extricated herself from the arm which had pressed her to his side—arose, and repelling his attempts to approach or detain her, said, with a simplicity not unmingled with dignity, "Julian, I always knew I risked much in inviting you to this meeting; but I did not guess that I could have been so cruel both to you and to myself, as to suffer you to discover what you have to-day seen too plainly—that I love you better than you love me. But since you do know it, I will show you that Alice's love is disinterested—She will not bring an ignoble name into your ancient house. If hereafter, in your line, there should arise some who may think the claims of the hierarchy too exorbitant, the powers of the crown too extensive, men shall not say these ideas were derived from Alice Bridgenorth, their whig grand-dame."

"Can you speak thus, Alice?" said her lover. "Can you use such expressions? and are you not sensible that they show plainly it is your own pride, not regard for me, that makes you resist the happiness of both?"

"Not so, Julian; not so," answered Alice, with tears in her eyes; "it is the command of duty to us both—of duty, which we cannot transgress, without risking our happiness here and hereafter. Think what I, the cause of all, should feel, when your father frowns, your mother weeps, your noble friends stand aloof, and you, even you yourself, shall have made the painful discovery, that you have incurred the contempt and resentment of all to satisfy a boyish passion; and that the poor beauty, once sufficient to mislead you, is gradually declining under the influence of grief and vexation! This I will not risk. I see distinctly it is best we should here break off and part; and I thank God, who gives me light enough to perceive, and strength enough to withstand, your folly as well as my own. Farewell, then, Julian; but first take the solemn advice which I called you hither to impart to you:—Shun my father—you cannot walk in his paths, and be true to gratitude and to honour. What he doth from pure and honourable motives, you cannot aid him in, except upon the suggestion of a silly and interested passion, at variance with all the engagements you have formed at coming into life."

"Once more, Alice," answered Julian, "I understand you not. If a course of action is good, it needs no vindication from the actor's motives—if bad, it can derive none."

"You cannot blind me with your sophistry, Julian," replied Alice Bridgenorth, "any more than you can overpower me with your passion. Had the patriarch destined his son to death upon any less ground than faith and humble obedience to a divine commandment, he had meditated a murder and not a sacrifice. In our late bloody and lamentable wars, how many drew swords on either side, from the purest and most honourable motives? How many from the culpable suggestions of ambition, self-seeking, and love of plunder? Yet while they marched in the same ranks, and spurred their horses at the same trumpet-sound, the memory of the former is dear to us as patriots or loyalists—that of those who acted on mean or unworthy promptings, is either execrated or forgotten. Once more, I warn you, avoid my father—leave this island, which will be soon agitated by strange incidents—while you stay, be on your guard—distrust every thing—be jealous of every one, even of those to whom it may seem almost impossible, from circumstances, to attach a shadow of suspicion—trust not the very stones of the most secret apartment in Holm-Peel, for that which hath wings shall carry the matter."

Here Alice broke off suddenly, and with a faint shriek; for, stepping from behind the stunted copse which had concealed him, her father stood unexpectedly before them.

The reader cannot have forgotten that this was the second time in which the stolen interviews of the lovers had been interrupted by the unexpected apparition of Major Bridgenorth. On this second occasion his countenance exhibited anger mixed with solemnity, like that of the spirit to a ghost-seer, whom he upbraids with having neglected a charge imposed at their first meeting. Even his anger, however, produced no more violent emotion than a cold sternness of manner in his speech and action. "I thank you, Alice," he said to his daughter, "for the pains you have taken to traverse my designs towards this young man, and towards yourself. I thank you for the hints you have thrown out before my appearance, the suddenness of which alone has prevented you from carrying your confidence to a pitch which would have placed my life and that of others at the discretion of a boy, who, when the cause of God and his country is laid before him, has not leisure to think of them, so much is he occupied with such a baby-face as thine." Alice, pale as death, continued motionless, with her eyes fixed on the ground, without attempting the slightest reply to the ironical reproaches of her father.

"And you," continued Major Bridgenorth, turning from his daughter to her lover,—"you, sir, have well repaid the liberal confidence which I placed in you with so little reserve. You I have to thank also for some lessons, which may teach me to rest satisfied with the churl's blood which nature has poured into my veins, and with the rude nurture which my father allotted to me."

"I understand you not, sir," replied Julian Peveril, who, feeling the necessity of saying something, could not, at the moment, find any thing more fitting to say.

"Yes, sir, I thank you," said Major Bridgenorth, in the same cold sarcastic tone, "for having shown me, that breach of hospitality, infringement of good faith, and such like peccadilloes, are not utterly foreign to the mind and conduct of the heir of a knightly house of twenty descents. It is a great lesson to me, sir; for hitherto I had thought with the vulgar, that gentle manners went with gentle blood. But perhaps courtesy is too chivalrous a quality to be wasted in intercourse with a round-headed fanatic like myself."

"Major Bridgenorth," said Julian, "whatever has happened in this interview which may have displeased you, has been the result of feelings suddenly and strongly animated by the crisis of the moment—nothing was premeditated."

"Not even your meeting, I suppose?" replied Bridgenorth, in the same cold tone. "You, sir, wandered hither from Holm-Peel—my daughter strolled forth from the Black Fort; and chance, doubtless, assigned you a meeting by the stone of Goddard Crovan?—Young man, disgrace yourself by no more apologies—they are worse than useless.—And you, maiden, who, in your fear of losing your lover, could verge on betraying what might have cost a father his life—begone to your home. I will talk with you at more leisure, and teach you practically those duties which you seem to have forgotten."

"On my honour, sir," said Julian, "your daughter is guiltless of all that can offend you; she resisted every offer which the headstrong violence of my passion urged me to press upon her."

"And, in brief," said Bridgenorth, "I am not to believe that you have met in this remote place of rendezvous by Alice's special appointment?"

Peveril knew not what to reply, and Bridgenorth again signed with his hand to his daughter to withdraw.

"I obey you, father," said Alice, who had by this time recovered from the extremity of her surprise. "I obey you; but Heaven is my witness that you do me more than injustice in suspecting me capable of betraying your secrets, even had it been necessary to save my own life or that of Julian. That I am walking in a dangerous path I well know; but I do it with your eyes open, and are actuated by motives of which you can estimate the worth and value. My sole wish was, that this young man should enter blindfold on the same perils; and I had time to warn him, since the feelings by which he is actuated had a direct reference to me."

"Tis well, minion," said Bridgenorth, "you have spoken your say. Retire, and let me complete the conference which you have so considerably commenced."

"I go, sir," said Alice.—"Julian, to you my words are, and I would speak them with my last breath—Farewell, and caution!"

She turned from them, disappeared among the underwood, and was seen no more.

"A true specimen of womankind," said Bridgenorth, looking after her, "who would give her life for her lover's head.—You, Master Peveril, doubtless are of opinion, that the best love is a safe love."

"Were danger alone in my way," said Peveril, much surprised at the softened tone in which Bridgenorth made this observation, "there are many things which I would not face to—to—deserve your opinion."

"Or rather to win my daughter's hand," said Bridgenorth. "Well, young man, one thing pleased me in your conduct, though of many I have my reasons to complain—one thing has pleased me. You have surmounted that bounding wall of aristocratical pride, in which your father, and I repeat his fathers, remained imprisoned, as in the tower of a feudal fortress—you have leaped over the barrier, and shown yourself not unwilling to ally yourself with a family, whom your father spurns as born and ignoble."

However favourable this speech sounded towards success in his suit, it so broadly stated the consequences of that success so far as his parents were concerned, that Julian felt it in the last degree difficult to reply. At length, perceiving that Bridgenorth seemed resolved quietly to wait for an answer, he mustered up courage to say, "The feelings which I entertain towards your daughter, Master Bridgenorth, are of a nature to supersede all other considerations, to which, in any other case, I should feel it my duty to give the most respectful attention. I will not disguise from you, that my father's prejudices against such a match would be very strong; but I devoutly believe they will disappear when he came to know the merit of Miss Bridgenorth, and to be sensible that she only can make his son happy."

"In the meanwhile, you are desirous to complete the union which you propose without the knowledge of your parents, and take the chance of their being hereafter reconciled to it? So I understand the proposal which you made but lately to my daughter."

The turns of human nature, and of human passion, are so irregular and uncertain, that although Julian had but a few minutes before urged to Alice a private marriage, and an elopement to the continent, as measures upon which the whole happiness of his life depended, the proposal seemed not to him half so delightful when stated by the calm, cold, dictatorial accents of her father. It sounded no longer like the impulses of ardent passion, throwing all other considerations aside, but as a distinct surrender of the dignity of his house to one who seemed to consider their relative situation as the triumph of Bridgenorth over Peveril. He was mute for a moment at the vain attempt to shape his answer so as at once to intimate acquiescence in what Bridgenorth stated, and a vindication of his own regard for his parents and for the honour of his house.

This delay gave rise to suspicion, and Bridgenorth orth's eye gleamed, and his lip quivered, while he gave vent to it. "Hark ye, young man—deal openly with me in this matter, if you would not have me think you the execrable villain who would have seduced an unhappy girl under promises which he never designed to fulfil. Let me but suspect this, and you shall see, on the spot, how far your pride and your pedigree will preserve you against the just vengeance of a father."

"You do me wrong," said Peveril—"you do me infinite wrong, Major Bridgenorth. I am incapable of the infamy which you allude to. The proposal made to your daughter was as sincere as ever was offered by man to woman. I only hesitated, because you think it necessary to examine me so very closely; and to possess yourself of all my purposes and sentiments, in their fullest extent, without explaining to me the tendency of your own."

"Your proposal, then, shapes itself thus," said Bridgenorth:—"You are willing to lead my only child into exile from her native country, to give her a claim to kindness and protection from your family, which you know will be disregarded, on condition consent to bestow her hand on you, with a fortune sufficient to have matched that of your ancestors, when they had most reason to boast of their wealth. This, young man, seems no equal bargain. And yet," he continued, after a momentary pause, "so little do I value the goods of this world, that it might not be utterly beyond thy power to reconcile me to the match which you have proposed to me, however unequal it may appear."

"Show me but the means which can propitiate your favour, Major Bridgenorth," said Peveril,—"for I will not doubt that they will be consistent with my honour and duty,—and you shall soon see how eagerly I will obey your directions, or submit to your conditions."

"They are summed in few words," answered Bridgenorth. "Be an honest man, and the friend of your country."

"No one has ever doubted," replied Peveril, "that I am both."

"Pardon me," replied the Major; "No one has as yet seen you show yourself either. Interrupt me not—I question not your will to be both; but you have hitherto neither had the light nor the opportunity necessary for the display of your principles, or the service of your country. You have lived when an apathy of mind, succumbing to the agitations of the Civil War, had made men indifferent to state affairs, and more willing to cultivate their own ease, than to stand in the gap when the Lord was pleading with Israel. But we are Englishmen; and with us such unnatural lethargy cannot continue long. Already, many of those who most desired the return of Charles Stewart, regard him as a King whom Heaven, importuned by our entreaties, gave to us in His anger. His unlimited license—an example so readily followed by the young and the gay around him—has disgusted the minds of all sober and thinking men. I had not now held conference with you in this intimate fashion, were I not aware that you, Master Julian, were free from such stain of the times. Heaven, that rendered the King's course of licence fruitful, has denied issue to his bed of wedlock; and in the gloomy and stern character of his bigoted successor, we already see what sort of monarch shall succeed to the crown of England. This is a critical period, at which it necessarily becomes the duty of all men to step forward, each in his degree, and aid in rescuing the country which gave us birth."

Peveril remembered the warning which he had received from Alice, and bent his eyes on the ground, without returning any reply. "How is it, young man," continued Bridgenorth, after a pause—"so young as thou art, and bound by no ties of kindred profligacy with the enemies of your country, you can be already hardened to the claims she may form on you at this crisis?"

"It were easy to answer you generally, Major Bridgenorth," replied Peveril—"It were easy to say that my country cannot make a claim on me which I will not promptly answer at the risk of lands and life. But in dealing thus generally, we should but deceive each other. What is the nature of this call? By whom is it to be sounded? And what are to be the results? For I think you have already seen enough of the evils of civil war, to be wary of again awakening its terrors in a peaceful and happy country."

"They that are drenched with poisonous narcotics," said the Major, "must be awakened by their physicians, though it were with the sound of the trumpet. Better that men should die bravely, with their arms in their hands, like free-born Englishmen, than that they should slide into the bloodless but dishonoured grave which slavery opens for its vassals—But it is not of war that I was about to speak," he added, assuming a milder tone. "The evils of which England now complains, are such as can be remedied by the wholesome administration of her own laws, even in the state in which they are still suffered to exist. Have these laws not a right to the support of every individual who lives under them? Have they not a right to yours?"

As he seemed to pause for an answer, Peveril replied, "I have to learn, Major Bridgenorth, how the laws of England have become so far weakened as to require such support as mine. When that is made plain to me, no man will more willingly discharge the duty of a faithful liegeman to the law as well as the King. But the laws of England are under the guardianship of upright and learned judges, and of a gracious monarch."

"And of a House of Commons," interrupted Bridgenorth, "no longer doting upon restored monarchy, but awakened, as with a peal of thunder, to the perilous state of our religion, and of our freedom. I appeal to your own conscience, Julian Peveril, whether this awakening hath not been in time, since you yourself know, and none better than you, the secret but rapid strides which Rome has made to erect her Dagon of idolatry within our Protestant land."

Here Julian seeing, or thinking he saw, the drift of Bridgenorth's suspicions, hastened to exculpate himself from the thought of favouring the Roman Catholic religion. "It is true," he said, "I have been educated in a family where that faith is professed by one honoured individual, and that I have since travelled in Popish countries; but even for these very reasons I have seen Popery too closely to be friendly to its tenets. The bigotry of the laymen—the persevering arts of the priesthood—the perpetual intrigue for the extension of the forms without the spirit of religion—the usurpation of that church over the consciences of men—and her impious pretensions to infallibility, are as inconsistent to my mind as they can seem to yours, with common sense, rational liberty, freedom of conscience, and pure religion."

"Spoken like the son of your excellent mother!" said Bridgenorth, grasping his hand; "for whose sake I have consented to endure so much from your house unrequited, even when the means of requital were in my own hand."

"It was indeed from the instructions of that excellent parent," said Peveril, "that I was enabled, in my early youth, to resist and repel the insidious attacks made upon my religious faith by the Catholic priests into whose company I was necessarily thrown. Like her, I trust to live and die in the faith of the reformed Church of England."

"The Church of England!" said Bridgenorth, dropping his young friend's hand, but presently resuming it—"Alas! that church, as now constituted, usurps scarcely less than Rome herself upon men's consciences and liberties; yet, out of the weakness of this half-reformed church, may God be pleased to work out deliverance to England, and praise to Himself. I must not forget, that one whose services have been in the cause incalculable, wears the garb of an English priest, and hath had Episcopal ordination. It is not for us to challenge the instrument so that our escape is achieved from the net of the fowler. Enough, that I find thee not as yet enlightened with the purer doctrine, but profiting by it when the spark shall reach thee. In especial, that I find thee willing to accept the new mony, to cry aloud and spare not, against the errors and arts of the Church of Rome. But remember, what thou hast now said, thou wilt soon be called upon to justify, in a manner the most solemn—the most awful."

"What I have said," replied Julian Peveril, "being the unbiassed sentiments of my heart, shall, upon no proper occasion, want the support of my open avowal; and I think it strange you should doubt me so far."

"I doubt thee not, my young friend," said Bridgenorth; "and I trust to see thy name rank high amongst those by whom the prey shall be rent from the mighty. At present, thy prejudices occupy thy mind like the strong keeper of the house mentioned in Scripture. But there shall come a stronger than he, and make forcible entry, displaying on the battlements that sign of faith in which alone there is found salvation.—Watch, hope, and pray, that the hour may come!"

There was a pause in the conversation, which was first broken by Peveril. "You have spoken to me in riddles, Major Bridgenorth; and I have asked you for no explanation. Listen to a caution on my part, given with the most sincere good-will. Take a hint from me, and believe it, though it is darkly expressed. You are here—at least are believed to be here—on an errand dangerous to the Lord of the Island. That danger will be retorted on yourself, if you make Man long your place of residence. Be warned, and depart in time."

"And leave my daughter to the guardianship of Julian Peveril? Runs not your counsel so, young man?" answered Bridgenorth. "Trust my safety, Julian, to my own prudence. I have been accustomed to guide myself through worse dangers than now environ me. But I thank you for your caution, which I am willing to believe was at least partly disinterested."

"We do not, then, part in anger?" said Peveril.

"Not in anger, my son," said Bridgenorth, "but in love and strong affection. For my daughter, thou must forbear every thought of seeing her, save through me. I accept not thy suit, neither do I reject it; only this I intimate to you, that he who would be my son, must first show himself the true and loving child of his oppressed and deluded country. Farewell! Do not answer me now; thou art yet in the gall of bitterness, and it may be that strife (which I desire not) should fall between us. Thou shalt hear of me sooner than thou thinkest for."

He shook Peveril heartily by the hand, and again bid him farewell, leaving him under the confused and mingled impression of pleasure, doubt, and wonder. Not a little surprised to find himself so far in the good graces of Alice's father, that his suit was even favoured with a sort of negative encouragement, he could not help suspecting, as well from the language of the daughter as of the father, that Bridgenorth was desirous, as the price of his favour, that he should adopt some line of conduct inconsistent with the principles in which he had been educated.

"You need not fear, Alice," he said in his heart; "not even your hand would I purchase by aught which resembled unworthy or truckling compliance with tenets which my heart disowns; and well I know, were I mean enough to do so, even the authority of thy father were insufficient to compel thee to the ratification of so mean a bargain. But let me hope better things. Bridgenorth, though strong-minded and sagacious, is haunted by the fears of Popery, which are the bugbears of his sect. My residence in the family of the Countess of Derby is more than enough to inspire him with suspicions of my faith, from which, thank Heaven, I can vindicate myself with truth and a good conscience."

So thinking, he again adjusted the girths of his palfrey, replaced the bit which he had slipped out of its mouth, that it might feed at liberty, and mounting, pursued his way back to the Castle of Holm-Peel, where he could not help fearing that something extraordinary might have happened in his absence.

But the old pile soon rose before him, serene, and sternly still, amid the sleeping ocean. The banner, which indicated that the Lord of Man held residence within its ruinous precincts, hung motionless by its ensign-staff. The sentinels walked to and fro at their posts, and hummed or whistled their tunes. Leaving his faithful companion, Fairy, in the village as before, Julian entered the Castle, and found all within in the same state of quietness and good order which external appearances had announced.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Now rede me, rede me, brother dear,
Throughout Merry England,
Where will I find a messenger,
Betwixt us two to send.

Ballad of King Lear.

JULIAN's first rencounter, after re-entering the Castle, was with its young Lord, who received him with his usual kindness and lightness of heart.

"Thrice welcome, Sir Knight of Dames," said the Earl; "here you rove gallantly, and at free will, through our dominions, fulfilling of appointments and achieving amorous adventures; while we are condemned to sit in our royal hall, as dull and immovable as if our Majesty was carved on the stern of some Manx smuggling dogger, and named the King Arthur of Ramsey."

"Nay, in that case you would take the sea," said Julian, "and so enjoy travel and adventure."

"Oh, but suppose me wind-bound, or detained in harbour by a revenue pink, or ashore, if we are and lying high and dry upon the sand. Imagine the royal image in the dullest of all predicaments you have not equalled mine."

"I am happy to hear, at least, that you have no disagreeable employment," said Julian; "a morning's alarm has blown over, I suppose?"

"In faith it has, Julian; and our close inquiries cannot find any cause for the apprehended insurrection. That Bridgenorth is in the island seems certain; but private affairs of consequence are alleged as the cause of his visit; and I am not desirous to have him arrested unless I could prove some malpractices against him and his companions. In fact, it now seems we had taken the alarm too soon. My mother speaks of consulting you on the subject, Julian; I will not anticipate her solemn communication! I will be partly apologetical, I suppose; for we began to think our retreat rather unroyal, and that, being wicked, we have fled when no man pursued. The idea afflicts my mother, who, as a Queen-Dowager, a Queen-Regent, a heroine, and a woman in general, would be extremely mortified to think that her precipitate retreat hither had exposed her to the notice of the islanders; and she is disconcerted and out of humour accordingly. In the meanwhile, my amusement has been the grimaces and fantastic gestures of that ape Fenella, who is more out of humour, and more absurd, in consequence, than I ever saw her. Morris says, it is because you pushed her down stairs, Julian—how is that?"

"Nay, Morris has misreported me," answered Julian; "I did but lift her up stairs to be rid of her importunity; for she chose, in her way, to cross my going abroad in such an obstinate manner, that I had no other mode of getting rid of her."

"She must have supposed your departure at this moment so critical, was dangerous to the state of our garrison," answered the Earl; "it shows how dearly she esteems my mother's safety, how high she rates your prowess.—But, thank Heaven, she sounds the dinner-bell. I would the philosophers who find a sin and waste of time in good cheer could devise us any pastime half so agreeable."

The meal which the young Earl had thus looked for, as a means of consuming a portion of the time which hung heavy on his hands, was soon over; and soon, at least, as the habitual and stately formality of the Countess's household permitted. She herself, accompanied by her gentlewoman and attendants, retired early after the tables were drawn; and the young gentlemen were left to their own company. Wine had, for the moment, no charms for either; for the Earl was out of spirits from ennui and impatience of his monotonous and solitary course of life; and the events of the day had given Peveril too much matter for reflection, to permit his starting amusing or interesting topics of conversation. After having passed the flask in silence betwixt them once or twice, they withdrew each into a separate embrasure of the windows of the dining apartment, which, such was the extreme thickness of the wall, were deep enough to afford a solitary recess, separated, as it were, from the chamber itself. In one of these sat the Earl of Derby, busied in looking over some of the new publications which had been forwarded from London; and at intervals confessing how little power or interest these had for him, by yawning fearfully as he looked out on the solitary expanse of waters, which, save for the flight of a flock of sea-gulls, or of a solitary cormorant, offered so little of variety to engage his attention.

Peveril, on his part, held a pamphlet also in his hand, without giving, or affecting to give it, even his occasional attention. His whole soul turned upon the interview which he had had that day with Alice Bridgenorth, and with her father; while he in vain endeavoured to form any hypothesis which could explain to him why the daughter, to whom he had no reason to think himself indifferent, should have been so suddenly desirous of their eternal separation, while her father, whose opposition he so much dreaded, seemed to be at least tolerant of his addresses. He could only suppose, in explanation, that Major Bridgenorth had some plan in prospect, which it was in his own power to further or to impede; while, from the demeanour, and indeed the language, of Alice, he had but too much reason to apprehend that her father's favour could only be conciliated by something, on his own part, approaching to a dereliction of principle. But by no conjecture which he could form, could he make the least guess concerning the nature of that compliance, of which Bridgenorth seemed desirous. He could not imagine, notwithstanding Alice had spoken of treachery, that her father would dare to propose to him uniting in any plan by which the safety of the Countess, or the security of her little kingdom of Man, was to be endangered. This carried such indelible disgrace in the front, that he could not suppose the scheme proposed to him by any who was not prepared to defend with his sword, upon the spot, so flagrant an insult offered to his honour. And such a proceeding was totally inconsistent with the conduct of Major Bridgenorth in every other respect, besides his being too calm and cold-blooded to permit of his putting a mortal affront upon the son of his old neighbour, to whose mother he confessed so much of obligation.

While Peveril in vain endeavoured to extract something like a probable theory out of the hints thrown out by the father and by the daughter—not without the additional and lover-like labour of endeavouring to reconcile his passion to his honour and conscience—he felt something gently pull him by the cloak. He unclasped his arms, which, in meditation, had been folded on his bosom; and withdrawing his eyes from the vacant prospect of sea-coast and sea which they perused, without much consciousness upon what they rested, he beheld beside him the little dumb maiden, the elfin Fenella. She was seated on a low cushion or stool, with which she had nestled close to Peveril's side, and had remained there for a short space of time, expecting, no doubt, he would become conscious of her presence; until, tired of remaining unnoticed, she at length solicited his attention in the manner which we have described. Startled out of his reverie by this intimation of her presence, he looked down, and could not, without interest, behold this singular and helpless being.

Her hair was unloosened, and streamed over her shoulders in such length, that much of it lay upon the ground, and in such quantity, that it formed a dark veil, or shadow, not only around her face, but over her whole slender and minute form. From the profusion of her tresses looked forth her small and dark, but well-formed features, together with the large and brilliant black eyes; and her whole countenance was composed into the imploring look of one who is doubtful of the reception she is about to meet with from a valued friend, while she confesses a fault, pleads an apology, or solicits a reconciliation. In short, the whole face was so much alive with expression, that Julian, though her aspect was so familiar to him, could hardly persuade himself but that her countenance was entirely new. The wild, fantastic, elvish vivacity of the features, seemed totally vanished, and had given place to a sorrowful, tender, and pathetic cast of countenance, aided by the expression of the large dark eyes, which, as they were turned up towards Julian, glistened with moisture, that, nevertheless, did not overflow the eyelids.

Conceiving that her unwonted manner arose from a recollection of the dispute which had taken place betwixt them in the morning, Peveril was anxious to restore the little maiden's gayety, by making her sensible that there dwelt on his mind no unpleasant recollection of their quarrel. He smiled kindly, and shook her hand in one of his; while, with the familiarity of one who had known her from childhood, he stroked down her long dark tresses with the other. She stooped her head, as if ashamed, and, at the same time, gratified with his caresses—and he was thus induced to continue them, until, under the veil of her rich and abundant locks, he suddenly felt his other hand which she still held fast in hers, slightly touched with her lips, and, at the same time, moistened with a tear.

At once, and for the first time in his life, the danger of being misinterpreted in his familiarity with a creature to whom the usual modes of explanation were a blank, occurred to Julian's mind; and, hastily withdrawing his hand, and changing his posture, he asked of her, by a sign which custom had rendered familiar, whether she brought any message to him from the Countess. In an instant Fenella's whole deportment was changed. She started up, and arranged herself in her seat with the rapidity of lightning; and, at the same moment, with one turn of her hand, braided her length of locks into a natural head-dress of the most beautiful kind. There was, indeed, when she looked up, a blush still visible on her dark features; but their melancholy and languid expression had given place to that of wild and restless vivacity, which was most common to them. Her eyes gleamed with more than their wonted fire, and her glances were more piercingly wild and unsettled than usual. To Julian's inquiry, she answered, by laying her hand on her heart—a motion by which she always indicated the Countess—and rising, and taking the direction of her apartment, she made a sign to Julian to follow her.

The distance was not great betwixt the dining apartment and that to which Peveril now followed his mute guide; yet, in going thither, he had time enough to suffer cruelly from the sudden suspicion, that this unhappy girl had misinterpreted the uniform kindness with which he had treated her, and hence come to regard him with feelings more tender than those which belong to friendship. The misery which such a passion was likely to occasion to a creature in her helpless situation, and actuated by such lively feelings, was great enough to make him refuse credit to the suspicion which pressed itself upon his mind; while, at the same time, he formed the internal resolution so to conduct himself towards Fenella, as to check such misplaced sentiments, if indeed she unhappily entertained them towards him.

When they reached the Countess's apartment, they found her with writing implements, and many sealed letters, before her. She received Julian with her usual kindness; and having caused him to be seated, beckoned to the mute to resume her needle. In an instant Fenella was seated at an embroidering-frame; where, but, for the movement of her dexterous fingers, she might have seemed a statue, so little did she move from her work either head or eye. As her infirmity rendered her presence no bar to the most confidential conversation, the Countess proceeded to address Peveril as if they had been literally alone together.

"Julian," she said, "I am not now about to complain to you of the sentiments and conduct of Derby. He is your friend—he is my son. He has kindness of heart and vivacity of talent; and yet"——

"What I have said," replied Julian Peveril, "being the unborrowed sentiments of my heart, shall, upon no proper occasion want the support of my open avowal; and I think it strange you should doubt me so far."

"I doubt thee not, my young friend," said Bridgenorth; "and I trust to see thy name rank high amongst those by whom thy name shall be sent from the mighty. At present, thy proud name occupies thy mind like the strong keeper of the house mentioned in Scripture. "But the King," said Peveril, "the King's protestant royalists—what say they to the King's protestant?"

"Charles," replied the Countess, "is a selfish prudency, trickles in the crowd, and are do their work on the man in his downy down, rather than his pleasure in attempting their royalists, either they have caught the man which has seized on Protestantism, they stand aloof and neutral, afraid to trust in the unhappy Catholics, lest they should be such as themselves, and a fearful conspiracy in which they are engaged. In fact I cannot blame them to expect that more compassion for, or what is yet more rare, an able justice, should be powerful enough to expose themselves to the awakens whole people, for, in the present agitation, whoever believes the least enormous improbabilities which have been related by these wretched informers, is set down, as one who would smother the Plot. It is indeed an awful temptation, as we lie from its sphere, we must be led to effects."

Lord Derby already told me something said Julian; and that there were some island whose object was to excite insurrection."

"Yes," answered the Countess, and here she spoke, "and had my advice to them had been apprehended in the or so dealt with, as to be a warning to all that sought this independent principle, and grand. But my son, who is generally negligent of his own affairs, was pleased the management of them upon this crisis."

"I am happy to learn, madam," answered Peveril, "that the measures of precaution which have been adopted, have had the complete effect of averting the conspiracy."

"For the present, Julian; but they have been such as would have made the bones to think of such infringement of our rights. But Derby's present plan is fraught with danger; and yet there is something in it which has my sympathy."

"What is it, madam?" inquired Julian, "and in what can I aid it, or avert its danger?"

"He purposes," said the Countess, "to set forth for London. He is, he says, no more a feudal chief of a small island, but one of the Peers of England, who must not remain in security of an obscure and distant castle, with name or that of his mother, is slandered by prince and people. He will take his place in the House of Lords, and publicly demand for the insult thrown on his house, by persons interested witnesses."

"It is a generous resolution, and worthy friend," said Julian Peveril. "I will go with him, and share his fate be what it may."

"Alas, foolish boy!" answered the Countess, "well may you ask a hungry lion to feel compassion for a pulchre and furious people to do justice. I am like the madman at the height of strong men without compunction his best and cruel friend; and only wonders and wails over his cruelty, when he is recovered from his delusion."

"I believe you are right," answered the Countess,
-after a moment's consideration; and then added,
-"You propose, doubtless, to pass through Derbyshire,
-and visit Martindale Castle?"

"I should wish it, madam, certainly," replied Pe--veril, "did time permit, and circumstances render it -advisable."

"Of that," said the Countess, "you must yourself
-judge. Dispatch is, doubtless, desirable; on the other -hand, arriving from your own family-seat, you will be -less an object of doubt and suspicion, than if you -passed up from hence, without even visiting your

-your own prudence. Go, my dearest son; for to me
-you should be dear as a son—go, and prepare for your

-mendations to our friends and kindred, entreating
-and enjoining them to render whatever aid you may -require, either for your own protection, or the advan-

Peveril made no farther opposition to an arrange-ment, which in truth the moderate state of his own -finances rendered almost indispensable, unless with -his father's assistance, and the Countess put into his -hand bills of exchange to the amount of two hun-dred pounds upon a merchant in the city. She then -dismissed Julian for the space of an hour, after -which, she said she must again require his presence.

The preparations for his journey were not of a na-ture to divert the thoughts which speedily pressed on -him. He found that had an hour's conversation had -once more completely changed his immediate per-spective and plans for the future. He had offered to the -Countess of Derby a service, which her uniform kind-ness had well deserved at his hand; but by her ac-cepting it, he was upon the point of being separated -from Alice Bridgeman at a time when she was be-come dearer to him than ever by her anxious, distrustful
-passion. Her image rose before him, such as he had -that day pressed her to his bosom—her voice was in -his ear, and seemed to ask whether he could desert
-her in the crisis which every thing seemed to an-nounce as impending. But Julian Peveril, his youth -considered, was strict in joining his duty, and bravely
-resolved in executing it. He trusted not his imagina-tion to pursue the vision which presented itself; but -resolutely seizing his pen, wrote to Alice the follow-ing letter, explaining his situation, as far as justice to -the Countess permitted him to do so.

"I leave you, dearest Alice," thus ran the letter.—
"I leave you; and though, in doing so, I but obey the -command you have laid on me, yet I can claim little -merit for my compliance, since, without additional
-and most forcible reasons in aid of your orders, I fear
-I should have been unable to comply with them. But -family affairs of importance compel me to absent
-myself from this island, for, I fear, more than one -week. My thoughts, hopes, and wishes, will be on the moment that shall restore me to the Black Fort, and its lovely valley. Let me hope that yours will sometimes rest on the lonely exchequer, whom nothing could render rich, but the command of honour and duty. Do not fear that I mean to involve you in a private correspondence, and let not your father fear it. I could not love you so much, but for the openness and candour of your nature, and I would not that you conveyed from Major Bridgenorth one syllable of what I now say. Respecting other matters, he himself cannot desire the welfare of our common country with more zeal than I do. Differences may occur concerning the mode in which that is to be obtained, but in the principle, I am convinced there can be only one mind between us; nor can I refuse to listen to his experience and wisdom, even where they may ultimately fail to convince me. Farewell, Alice, farewell! Much might be added to that martial word, but nothing that could express the bitterness with which it is written. Yet I could transcribe it again and again, rather than conclude the last communication which I can have with you for some time. My sole comfort is, that my stay will scarce be so long as to prevent you to forget one who never can forget you.

He held the paper in his hand for a minute after he had folded it, but before he had sealed it, while he hurriedly debated in his own mind whether he had not expressed himself towards Major Bridgenorth in an conciliating manner as might create hopes of proselytism, which his conscience told him he could not realise with honour. Yet on the other hand he had no right, from what Bridgenorth had said, to conclude that those principles were diametrically irreconcilable; for though the son of a high cavalier and educated in the family of the Countess of Derby he was himself, upon principle, an enemy of prerogative, and a friend to the liberty of the subject. And with such considerations he mirrored all internal abstractions on the point of honour, although his conscience secretly whispered that these conciliatory expressions towards the father were chiefly dictated by the fear that, during his absence, Major Bridgenorth might be tempted to change the residence of his daughter, and perhaps to convey her altogether out of his reach.

Having sealed his letter, Julian called his servant, and directed him to carry it, under cover of one addressed to Mrs. Debbitch, to a house in the town of Rushin, where packets and messages intended for the family at Black Fort were usually deposited, and for that purpose to take horse immediately. He then got into a situation which might have been in some degree as good as his own. He then exchanged the dress he usually wore for one more suited to travelling, and having put a change or two of linen into a small cloak-bag, selected as arms a strong dock-shouldered sword and an excellent pair of pistols, which last he carefully loaded with double bullets. These equipped, and with heart, as in his purse, and in his pocket, he was in readiness to depart as soon as he should receive the Countess's commands.

The hour of parting at such a time, which had, for a moment, been his only hope, and dubious circumstances in which he was as well as the deprivation which he was about to undergo, now revived in full vigour. Fancy, turning from more painful anticipations, suggested to him that he was now entering upon life at a crisis when resolution and talents were almost certain to make the fortune of their possessor. How could he make a more honourable entry on the bustling scene, than sent by, and acting in behalf of, one of the noblest houses in England, and should he perform what his charge might render incumbent with the resolution and the prudence necessary to secure success, how many occurrences might take place to render his mediation necessary to Bridgenorth, and thus enable him, on the most quiet and honourable terms, to establish a claim to his gratitude and to his daughter's hand.

While he was dwelling on such pleasing, though imaginary prospects, he could not help exclaiming aloud—"Yes, Alice, I will win thee nobly!" The words had scarcely escaped his lips, when he heard at the door of his apartment, which he now left open, a sound like a deep sigh, which instantly succeeded by a gentle tap—"Come in," replied Julian, somewhat ashamed of his own tone, and not a little afraid that it had been up by some over-hearer—"Come in," he repeated; but his command was not obeyed; contrary, the knock was repeated and louder. He opened the door and Pamela stood before him.

With eyes that seemed red with weeping, and with a look of the deepest distress, the lady first touching her bosom, and darting of finger, made to him the usual sign that she desired to see him—then turned, as if to enter her apartment. As he followed her through the gloomy vaulted passages which afforded communication between the various departments of the house he could not but observe that her usual light complexion had exchanged for a deadly and morbid one, and accompanied with a low guttural moan, she was probably the less able to suppress the sobs which she could not judge how far it was expedient to wring from the hands, and other such trifling efforts.

At this moment a thought came across his mind, which, in spite of his better reason, made shudder involuntarily. As a Peckham, and resident in the Isle of Man, he was well acquainted with many a superstitious legend, and with a belief, which attached to the point of the Nianrya, for their peculiar demonstration of female spirit, who was wont to shriek "evil times," and who was generally met with and demanding herself before the dawn of day of distinction belonging to the family. Fearing Julian could scarce divert himself of such the wailing, gibbering form, which glided with a leap in her hand, was the guest mother's face came to an entrance to his mind. It instantly occurred to him an analogous reflection, that if the surprise which crossed his mind concerning Pamela was not her ill-fated attachment to him, like that of a phobic spirit to his family, could have been disaster, and lamentation, and we.

CHAPTER XIX

Now, hark the mother's voice—and let us see how these words sound to the heart and soul. Like him that was a lover—Alas!

The presence of the Countess dispelled these vague feelings, which, for an instant, had crossed on Julian's imagination, and compelled his attention to the matters of ordinary life. "For your credentials," she said, giving him a small carefully put up in a seal-skin cover; "you will not open them till you come to London. You will not be surprised to find that there are all addressed to Mrs. of my own persuasion. But all our sakes, you will observe caution in doing so. I go your messenger madam," and Pamela, whatever you desire me to charge myself with, I undertake the care. Yet allow me to dash off an intercession with Catholics will at this moment and the purposes of my mission."

"You have caught the general essence of wickedness already," said the Countess, "and are the fitter to go amongst Catholics their present mood. But, my caution from letters are no addressed, and the persons to they are no addressed as dangerous, that you will no danger in conversing with them. What I said, indeed, you will not be able to obtain the rate information you go in search of. Nor do you exactly how the wind sets, as the plot is exposed to the storm. Besides, though Protestants deny our priesthood the heresy of the dove, you are ready enough to allow us a little of the wisdom of the serpent;—in plain words, means of information are estimates, and they are deficient in the power of applying it. I therefore you to have the benefit of their intelligence as soon, if possible."

Whatever you impose on me as a part of my madam, rely on its being discharged punctually," answered Peveril. "And now, as there is use in deferring the execution of a purpose once fixed, let me know your ladyship's wishes concerning my departure."

"It must be sudden and secret," said the Countess; "the island is full of spies; and I would not wish any of them should have notice that an envoy here was about to leave Man for London. Can you be ready to go on board to-morrow?"

"To-night—this instant, if you will," said Julian,—"little preparations are complete."

"Be ready, then, in your chamber, at two hours after midnight. I will send one to summon you, for the secret must be communicated, for the present, to as few as possible. A foreign sloop is engaged to carry you over; then make the best of your way to London, by Marundale Castle or otherwise, as you find most advisable. When it is necessary to announce your absence, I will say you are gone to our parents. But stay—your journey will be on horseback, of course, from Whitehaven. You have no exchange, it is true; but are you provided with ready money to furnish yourself with a good horse?"

"I am sufficiently rich, madam," answered Julian; "good nags are plenty in Cumberland. There are those among them who know how to come by good and cheap."

"Must not to that," said the Countess. "Here is a horse I will purchase for you the best horse on the Border—Can you be simple enough to refuse it?" she asked, as she pressed on him a heavy purse, which he himself obliged to accept.

"A good horse, Julian," continued the Countess, "a good sword, next to a good heart and head, are the accomplishments of a cavalier."

"Kiss your hands, then, madam," said Peveril, "and humbly beg you to believe, that whatever may be my present undertaking, my purpose to serve my noble kinswoman and benefactress, can at no time ever swerve or falter."

"Now it, my son, I know it; and may God bless me if my anxiety for your friend has sent you through dangers which should have been his! Go—go—may saints and angels bless you! Fenella shall tell him that you sup in your own apartment. Good-night will I; for to-night I should be unable to meet my son's looks. Little will he thank me for sending you on his errand; and there will be many, whether it was like the Lady of Latham to her friend's son on the danger which should have been braved by her own. But O! Julian, I am now a widow, whom sorrow has made selfish!"

"Farewell! All blessings attend you, madam. I commend me to Derby, and make him my excuses. I expect a summons at two hours after midnight."

They took an affectionate leave of each other; the Countess, indeed, on the part of the Countess she could not entirely reconcile her generous feelings to exposing Peveril to danger on her son's behalf; and Julian betook himself to his solitary apartment.

A servant soon afterwards brought him wine and liniments; to which, notwithstanding the various matters he had to occupy his mind, he contrived to give reasonable justice. But when this needful occupation was finished, his thoughts began to stream on him like a troubled tide—at once recalling the past, and anticipating the future. It was in vain he wrapped himself in his riding cloak, and, lying down on his bed, endeavoured to compose himself to sleep. The uncertainty of the prospect before him—the doubt how Bridgenorth might dispose of his daughter during his absence—the fear that the Countess might fall into the power of the villainous Countess, besides a numerous train of vague half-formed apprehensions, agitated his blood, rendered slumber impossible. Alternately to recline in the old oaken easy-chair, and listen to the dashing of the waves under the windows, mingled, as the sound was, with the scream of the sea-birds; or to traverse the apartment with long and slow steps, pausing occasionally to look out on the sea, slumbering under the influence of a full-moon, which tipped each wave with silver—such were the only pastimes he could invent, until midnight had passed for one hour; the next was wasted in anxious expectation of the summons of departure.

At length it arrived—a tap at his door was followed by a low murmur, which made him suspect that the Countess had again employed her mute attendant as the most secure minister of her pleasure on this occasion. He felt something like impropriety in this selection; and it was with a feeling of impatience alien to the natural generosity of his temper, that, when he opened the door, he beheld the dumb maiden standing before him. The lamp which he held in his hand showed his features distinctly, and probably made Fenella aware of the expression which animated them. She cast her large dark eyes mournfully on the ground; and, without again looking him in the face, made him a signal to follow her. He delayed no longer than was necessary to secure his pistols in his belt, wrap his cloak closer around him, and take his small portmanteau under his arm. Thus accoutered, he followed her out of the Keep, or inhabited part of the Castle, by a series of obscure passages leading to a postern gate, which she unlocked with a key, selected from a bundle which she carried at her girdle.

They now stood in the castle-yard, in the open moonlight, which glimmered white and ghastly on the variety of strange and ruinous objects to which we have formerly alluded, and which gave the scene rather the appearance of some ancient cemetery, than of the interior of a fortification. The round and elevated tower—the ancient mount, with its quadrangular sides facing the ruinous edifices which once boasted the name of Cathedral—seemed of yet more antique and anomalous form, when seen by the pale light which now displayed them. To one of these churches Fenella took the direct course, and was followed by Julian; although he at once divined, and was superstitious enough to dislike, the path which she was about to adopt. It was by a secret passage through this church, that in former times the guard-room of the garrison, situated at the lower and external defences, communicated with the keep of the Castle; and through this passage were the keys of the Castle every night carried to the Governor's apartment, so soon as the gates were locked, and the watch set. The custom was given up in James the First's time, and the passage abandoned, on account of the well-known legend of the Mauthe Dog—a fiend, or demon, in the shape of a large, shaggy black mastiff, by which the church was said to be haunted. It was devoutly believed, that in former times this spectre became so familiar with mankind, as to appear almost nightly in the guard-room, issuing from the passage which we have mentioned at night, and retiring to it at daybreak. The soldiers became partly familiarized to its presence; yet not so much so as to use any license of language while the apparition was visible; until one fellow, rendered daring by intoxication, swore he would know whether it was dog or devil, and, with his drawn sword, followed the spectre when it retreated by the usual passage. The man returned in a few minutes, sobered by terror, his mouth gaping, and his hair standing on end, under which horror he died; but unhappily for the lovers of the marvellous, altogether unable to disclose the horrors which he had seen. Under the evil repute arising from this tale of wonder, the guard-room was abandoned, and a new one constructed. In like manner, the guards after that period held another and more circuitous communication with the Governor or Seneschal of the Castle; and that which lay through the ruinous church was entirely abandoned.*

* This curious legend, and many others, in which the tale of Man is perhaps richer than even Ireland, Wales, or the Highlands of Scotland, will be found in a note to Chap. xv.

In defiance of the legendary terrors which tradition had attached to the original communication, Fenella, followed by Peveril now boldly traversed the ruinous vaults through which it lay—sometimes only guided over heaps of ruins by the precarious light of the lamp borne by the dumb maiden—sometimes having the advantage of a gleam of moonlight darting into the dark abyss through the shelled windows, or through breaches made by time. As the path was by no means a straight one, Peveril could not but admire the intimate acquaintance with the maze which his singular companion displayed as well as the boldness with which she traversed them. If himself was not so utterly void of the prejudices of the time, but that he communicated with some apprehension the possibility of their attending on the last of the phantom band, of which he had heard so often, and in every remote part of the house among the ruins he thought he heard him saying of the spectral footsteps which disturbed his slumbering realm. No such terrors, however, interrupted their journey, and in the course of a few minutes they attained the deserted and now ruinous guest-house. The broken walls of the little edifice served to conceal them from the sentinels, one of whom was keeping a drowsy watch at the lower gate of the Castle, whilst another stood on the same steps which communicated with the parapet of the bounding and exterior wall, was slumbering in full security, with his musket peacefully grounded by his side. Fenella made a sign to Peveril to move with silence and caution, and then showed him, to his surprise from the window of the deserted guard room, a boat for it was now high noon, with fast currents, lurking under the cliff on which the Castle was built, and made him farther sensible that he was to have access to it by a ladder of considerable height placed at the window of the room.

Julian was both distressed and alarmed by the security and carelessness of the sentinels, who had suffered such preparations to be made without observation or alarm given, and he hesitated whether he should not call the officer of the guard to draw him with regular arms and show him how easily Helen Peel, in spite of its natural strength, and although reputed impregnable might be surprised by a few audacious men. Fenella seemed to govern his thoughts with that extreme acuteness of observation which her depressions had occasioned her possessing. She laid one hand on his arm, and a finger of the other on his lips, as if to enjoin silence, and Julian, knowing that she acted by the direct authority of the Countess, obeyed her accordingly, but with the inward resolution to lose no time in communicating his sentiments to the Earl concerning the danger to which the Castle was exposed on this point.

In the mean time, he descended the ladder with some precaution, for the steps were unequal, broken, wet, and slippery, and having placed himself in the stern of the boat made a signal to the men to push off, and turned to take farewell of his guide. To his utter astonishment Fenella rather sat down than descended regularly, the perilous ladder and the boat being already pushed off, made a spring from the last step of it with incredible agility, and seated herself beside Peveril, for he could express no other circumstance of surprise. He commanded the men once more to pull on to the precarious landing place, and throwing into his countenance a part of the displeasure which he really felt, endeavoured to make her comprehend the necessity of returning to her mistress. Fenella folded her arms and looked at him with a haughty smile, which completely expressed the derision of her purpose. Peveril was extremely embarrassed, he was afraid of offending the Countess, and interfering with her plan, by giving alarm, which otherwise he was much tempted to have done. On Fenella, it was evident no species of argument which he could employ was likely to make the least impression; and the question remained, how, if she went on with him, he was to rid himself of so singular and dangerous a companion and partner at the same time, sufficiently for her personal security.

The boatman brought the matter to a decision, for, after lying on their oars for a minute, and whispering among themselves in Low Dutch or German, began to pull steadily, and were soon at some distance from the Castle. The possibility of its being a market-day, or even a common day, was one of the suppositions which gave the momentary activity, but they left the harbor as night had approached it, unobserved, and unchallenged, a rare consequence the party being which notwithstanding that the men were so old that the men spoke little and in whispers, in Peveril's opinion, great negligence on the part of the sentinels. When they were a short distance from the Castle, the men began to row briskly, towards a small wharf at some distance. Peveril, in the mean time, began to remark, the men spoke to each other doubtfully, and he looked on Fenella, and uncertain whether he acted properly in bringing her off.

After about a quarter of an hour's rowing, reached the little wharf, where Peveril saw the object of his quest, or cap, in the quarter of an hour of quietude or refreshment. A woman, among the women withdrew the ragged and hospitable cover, and he flew to the edge of the boat to prevent Fenella from entering it. The men and he asked eagerly, a Dutchman, usually at Fenella as they spoke, what Peveril hoped the result would be, the woman should be sent ashore again. Fenella, whatever opportunity could be offered, when the accommodation ladder, as a vessel withdrawn, she stretched the end of it, and climbed on board with the despatch of a sailing ship, no means of preventing her escape by actual violence, which appeared, as a chance to have recovered. Once on deck, she was seized by the arm, and led him to the lower vessel, where they seemed to hold various important intelligible to both.

Peveril soon forgot the presence of the boat, began to muse upon a new situation, and fully that he was separated for ever from time from the object of his affection. He repeated to himself, "Conscience," and remembrance with the name of his mistress, his eyes on the pale star, which that night shone with more than ordinary brilliancy. Fenella, pensive and steady presence, the thought came as he stared its clear and unchanging light, interested and noble. To seek his reward, and secure the happiness of distressed persons, charge a bold and generous duty to his breast, from to regard his promise for Alice. Fenella, the mediator which was in guide him, were the resolutions which he brought upon him, and which resulted in a state to that state of the melancholy which perhaps is all necessary for feelings of justice, duty.

He was recalled from these contemplations something which nestled itself softly and sweetly in his mind—a woman, which resembled an ear to disturb his reverie, and as he turned his head, Fenella arose beside him, with her eyes fixed on some star which had just extinguished his rest. Her emotion was that of surprise, but not able to preserve in Fenella a being so many respects, so resembling in others, when her dark eyes were filled with dew, which gleamed in moonlight, and the sentiment which seemed to be in a part, which might well be of grace at least from him, who was the object. At the same time Julian resolved to seize the opportunity for such private actions with Fenella, the strangeness of her conduct, as the past might be able to see, and end. He took her hand with great kindness, but a short time with gravity, pointed to the boat, and to the towers and gabled walls were now visible in the distance, and he seemed to her to say of her return to Helen Peel. She looked on and shook her head, as if negating his proposal of obstinate decision. Julian renewed his expression by look and gesture, pointed to his own heart, and to the Countess—and bent his knee, to show displeasure which she must entertain. To all which, she mute only answered by her tears.

At length, as if driven to explanation by his continued remonstrances, she suddenly seized him by the arm, to arrest his attention—cast her eye hastily round, as if to see whether she was watched by any one—then drew the other hand, edgewise, across her slender throat—pointed to the boat, and to the Castle, and nodded.

On this series of signs, Peveril could put no interpretation, excepting that he was menaced with some personal danger, from which Fenella seemed to conceive that her presence was a protection. Whatever was her meaning, her purpose seemed unalterably adopted; at least, it was plain he had no power to shake it. He must therefore wait till the end of their short voyage, to disembarass himself of his companion; and in the mean while, acting on the idea of her having harboured a misplaced attachment to him, he thought he should best consult her interest, and his own character, in keeping at as great a distance from her as circumstances admitted. With this purpose, he made the sign she used for going to sleep, by leaning his head on his palm; and having thus recommended to her to go to rest, he himself desired to be conducted to his berth.

The captain readily showed him a hammock in the steer-cabin, into which he threw himself, to seek that repose which the exercise and agitation of the preceding day, as well as the lateness of the hour, made him now feel desirable. Sleep, deep and heavy, sank down on him in a few minutes, but it did not endure long. In his sleep he was disturbed by female cries; and at length, as he thought, distinctly heard the voice of Alice Bridgenorth call on his name.

He awoke, and, starting up to quit his bed, became sensible, from the motion of the vessel, and the swaying of the hammock, that his dream had deceived him. He was still startled by its extreme vivacity and liveliness. "Julian Peveril, help! Julian Peveril!" The sounds still rung in his ears—the accents were those of Alice—and he could scarce persuade himself that his imagination had deceived him. Could she be in the same vessel? The thought was not altogether inconsistent with her father's character, and the intrigues in which he was engaged; but then, if so, to what peril was she exposed, that she invoked his name so loudly?

Determined to make instant inquiry, he jumped out of his hammock, half-dressed as he was, and stumbling about the little cabin, which was as dark as pitch, at length, with considerable difficulty, reached the door. The door, however, he was altogether unable to open; and was obliged to call loudly to the watch upon deck. The skipper, or captain, as he was called, being the only person aboard who could speak English, answered to the summons, and replied to Peveril's demand, what noise that was?—that a boat was going off with the young woman—that she whimpered a little as she left the vessel—and "dat vaas all."

This explanation satisfied Julian, who thought it probable that some degree of violence might have been absolutely necessary to remove Fenella; and although he rejoiced at not having witnessed it, he could not feel sorry that such had been employed. Her pertinacious desire to continue on board, and the difficulty of freeing himself, when he should come ashore, from so singular a companion, had given him a good deal of anxiety on the preceding night, which he now saw removed by this bold stroke of the captain.

His dream was thus fully explained. Fancy had caught up the inarticulate and vehement cries with which Fenella was wont to express resistance or displeasure—had coined them into language, and given them the accents of Alice Bridgenorth. Our imagination plays wilder tricks with us almost every night.

The captain now undid the door, and appeared with a lantern; without the aid of which, Peveril could scarce have regained his couch, where he now slumbered secure and sound, until day was far advanced, and the invitation of the captain called him up to breakfast.

CHAPTER XX.

Now, what is this that haunts me like my shadow,
Frisking and mumming, like an elf in moonlight?

BEN JONSON.

PEVERIL found the master of the vessel rather less rude than those in his station of life usually are, and received from him full satisfaction concerning the fate of Fenella, upon whom the captain bestowed a hearty curse, for obliging him to lay-to until he had sent his boat ashore, and had her back again.

"I hope," said Peveril, "no violence was necessary to reconcile her to go ashore? I trust she offered no foolish resistance?"

"Resist! mein Gott," said the captain, "she did resist like a troop of horse—she did cry, you might hear her at Whitehaven—she did go up the rigging like a cat up a chimney; but dat vas ein trick of her old trade."

"What trade do you mean?" said Peveril.

"O," said the seaman, "I vas know more about her than you, Meinheer. I vas know that she vas a little, very little girl, and prentice to one seiltanzer, when my lady yonder had the good luck to buy her."

"A seiltanzer?" said Peveril; "what do you mean by that?"

"I mean a rope-danzer, a mountebank, a Hans pickel-harring. I vas know Adrian Brackel vell—he sell de powders dat empty men's stomach, and fill him's own purse. Not know Adrian Brackell, mein Gott! I have smoked many a pound of tabak with him."

Peveril now remembered that Fenella had been brought into the family when he and the young Earl were in England, and while the Countess was absent on an expedition to the continent. Where the Countess found her, she never communicated to the young men; but only intimated, that she had received her out of compassion, in order to relieve her from a situation of extreme distress.

He hinted so much to the communicative seaman, who replied, "that for distress he knew nocht's on't; only, that Adrian Brackel beat her when she would not dance on the rope, and starved her when she did, to prevent her growth." The bargain between the Countess and the mountebank, he said, he had made himself; because the Countess had hired his brig upon her expedition to the continent. None else knew where she came from. The Countess had seen her on a public stage at Ostend—compassionated her helpless situation, and the severe treatment she received—and had employed him to purchase the poor creature from her master, and charged him with silence towards all her retinue.*—"And so I do keep silence," continued the faithful confidant, "van I am in the havens of Man; but when I am on the broad seas,

* An instance of such a sale of an unfortunate dancing girl occurred in Edinburgh in the end of the seventeenth century.

"15th January, 1687.—Reid, the mountebank, pursues Scott of Harden and his lady, for stealing away from him a little girl called The tumbling lassie, that danced upon a stage, and he claimed damages, and produced a contract, by which he bought her from her mother for thirty pounds Scots, (2l. 10s. sterling.) But we have no slaves in Scotland," continues the liberal reporter, "and mothers cannot sell their bairns: and physicians attested that the employment of tumbling would kill her, and her joints were now grown stiff, and she declined to return, though she was at least an apprentice, and could not run away from her master. Yet some quoted Moses's Law, that if a servant shelter himself with thee, against his master's cruelty, thou shalt surely not deliver him up. The Lords, reluctante cancellario, absolved (i. e. acquitted) Harden."—FOUNTAINHALL'S Decisions, vol. i. p. 441.

A man may entertain some vanity in being connected with a patron of the cause of humanity; so the author may be pardoned mentioning, that he derives his own direct descent from the father of this champion of humanity.

Reid the mountebank apparently knew well how to set the sails of his own interest to whatever wind proved most likely to turn them. He failed not to avail himself of King James's rage for the conversion of heretics, on which subject Fountainhall has this sarcastic memorandum:—

"Reid the mountebank is received into the Popish church, and one of his blackamoors was persuaded to accept of baptism from the Popish priests, and to turn Christian papist, which was a great trophy. He was christened James after the King, and Chancellor, and the Apostle James!"—Ibid. p. 440.

draw my tongue in mine own, you know. Dis foolish heathens in the island, they say she is a weechal-balg—what you call a fairy elf changeling. My faith they do not never have seen us weechal balg, for I saw one myself at Cologne and it was twice as big as yonder girl, and did break the poor people, with eating them up, like de great big cuckoo in de sparrows nest; but this Ven is not no more than other girls—it was no weechal balg in the world!

By a different train of reasoning Julian had arrived at the same conclusion, in which, therefore, he heartily acquiesced. During the woman's promiscuous rambling within himself, how much of the singular flexibility of her limbs and movements the unfortunate girl must have derived from the discipline and instructions of Adrian Brackel, and also how far the germs of her wild and capricious passions might have been sown during her wandering and adventurous childhood. Answering also, as his education had been, these speculations respecting Feneela's original situation and education, rather increased his pleasure at having shaken off her company, and yet he still felt desirous to know any farther particulars which the woman could communicate on the subject. But he had already told all he knew. Of her parents he knew nothing, except that "her father must have been a damned huntsman, and a orthelin, for selling his own flesh and blood to Adrian Brackel," for by such a transaction had the mountebank become possessed of his pupil.

This conversation tended to remove any passing doubts which might have crept on Pereval's mind concerning the fidelity of the master of the vessel, who appeared from thence to have been a former acquaintance of the Countess, and to have enjoyed some share of her confidence. The threatening situation used by Feneela, he no longer considered as worthy of any notice, excepting as a new mark of the irritability of her temper.

He amused himself with walking the deck and musing on his past and future prospects, until his attention was forcibly attracted by the wind, which began to rise in gusts from the north-west, in a manner so unfavourable to the course they intended to hold, that the master, after many efforts to beat against it, declared his bark, which was by no means an excellent one, was unequal to making Whitehaven, and that he was compelled to make a fair wind of it, and run for Liverpool. To this course Pereval did not object. It saved him some land journey, in case he visited his father's castle, and the Countess's commission would be discharged as effectually the one way as the other.

The vessel was put accordingly before the wind, and ran with great steadiness and velocity. The captain, more than usual, pleading some natural hazards, chose to be off, and did not attempt the mouth of the Mersey until morning, when Pereval had at length the satisfaction of being landed upon the quay of Liverpool, which even then showed symptoms of the commercial prosperity that has since been earned to such a height.

The master, who was well acquainted with the port, pointed out to Julian a decent place of entertainment chiefly frequented by seafaring people; but, although he had been in the town formerly, he did not think it proper to go any where at present where he might have been unnecessarily recognised. Here he took leave of the woman, after pressing upon him with difficulty a small present for his crew. As for his passage, the captain declared any recompense whatever, and they parted upon the most civil terms.

The inn to which he was recommended was full of strangers, seamen and mercantile people all intent upon their own affairs, and discussing them with noise and eagerness, peculiar to the business of a thriving seaport. But although the general clamour of the public room, in which the guests mixed with each other, related chiefly to their own commercial dealings, there was a general theme mingling with them, which was alike common and interesting to all; as that, amidst disputes about freight, tonnage, demurrage, and such like, were heard the emphatic sounds of "Deep, damnable, accursed plot!"—"Bloody Papist villain!"—"The King is danger—danger too good for them," and so forth.

The fermentation excited in London had reached even this remote seaport, and was taken by the inhabitants with the peculiar spirit which invests men in their situation. In a matter of the winds and waves, with which they chiefly conversed. The commercial and maritime of England were indeed passionately catholic, although it is not perhaps, very easy to discover why they should be so. A natural logical dispute in general could scarce be more so interesting to them. But zeal, smothered in orders at least, is often in an inverse ratio to logic, and sailors were not probably the same and devoted Protestants, that they did not want the controversy between the churches. As to merchants, they were almost necessary to the entry of Lancashire and Cheshire, in whom still remained the faith of Rome, and rendered ten times more odious to the masses, as the badge of their haughty and unchristianlike pride.

From the little which Pereval heard of the sentiments of the people of Liverpool, he ought to have acted most prudently in leaving the port as possible and before any suspicion should have been having any connexion with the party and proud to have become so obnoxious.

In order to accomplish his journey, it was necessary that he should purchase a horse, and for this purpose he resolved to have recourse to the aid of a dealer well known at the time, who dwelt in the outskirts of the place, and who obtained directions to his dwelling, he set off to provide himself.

Joe Hindleby's stables exhibited a large number of good horses, but that trade was in former years more active than at present. It was an odd sort of a stranger to buy a horse for the purpose of a journey, and to sell him, as well as he could, as he had reached the point of his destination. Hence there was a constant demand and a corresponding supply; upon both of which, Hindleby, through his trade, contrived doubtless to make some profits.

Julian, who was as no despicable horse-purser, did for his purpose a strong well made horse about ten hands high, and had him led into the stable, where he gave perfect satisfaction to the owner. It remained only to settle the price with Hindleby, who of course, as his customer had paid for the best horse ever darkened the stable, and who had dealt that way; that no such horse was to be had now a days, for that the mare would not fook him, and having named a corresponding price, the usual haggling commenced, but that the owner, after some adjustment of what the French call le prix real.

The reader, if he be at all acquainted with the art of traffic, will know it to generally a horse market of wit and attracts the notice of all the idlers, loafers, who are usually very ready to give opinions, or their evidence. Amongst these on a recent occasion, was a thin man, rather over the ordinary size, and smartly dressed, but his interference was in a confident tone, and he showed himself master of the subject on what he spoke. The price of the horse being settled at fifteen pounds, which was very high for the job, that of the saddle and bridle had next to be named, and the thin man looked at persons in his neighbourhood nearly as much to say on this subject as on any other. As his remarks had a commanding and decided tendency towards the stranger, Pereval concluded it was one of those idle persons, who, unable or unwilling to supply themselves with the means of subsistence at their own cost, do not scruple to draw them at the hands of others, by a little officious interference, and considering that he might obtain some useful information from such a person, and about to offer him the courtesy of a morning drink, when he observed he had suddenly left the room.

and scarce remarked this circumstance, before a party of customers entered the place, whose haughty assumption of importance claimed the instant attention of Bridlesley, and all his militia of grooms and stable-boys.

"Three good horses," said the leader of the party, a tall bulky man, whose breath was drawn full and high, under a consciousness of fat, and of importance—"three good and able-bodied horses, for the service of the Commons of England."

Bridlesley said he had some horses which might serve the Speaker himself at need; but that, to speak Christian truth, he had just sold the best in his stable to that gentleman present, who, doubtless, would give up the bargain if the horse was needed for the service of the state.

"You speak well, friend," said the important personage; and advancing to Julian, demanded, in a very haughty tone, the surrender of the purchase which he had just made.

Peveril, with some difficulty, subdued the strong desire which he felt to return a round refusal to so unreasonable a request, but fortunately, recollecting what the situation in which he at present stood, required, on his part, much circumspection, he replied simply, that upon showing him any warrant to seize upon horses for the public service, he must of course submit to resign his purchase.

The man, with an air of extreme dignity, pulled from his pocket, and thrust into Peveril's hands, a warrant subscribed by the Speaker of the House of Commons, empowering Charles Topham, their officer of the Black Rod, to pursue and seize upon the persons of certain individuals named in the warrant; and of all other persons who are, or should be, accused by competent witnesses, of being accessory to, or favourers of, the hellish and damnable Popish Plot, at present carried on within the bowels of the kingdom; and charging all men, as they loved their allegiance, to render the said Charles Topham their readiest and most effective assistance, in execution of the duty intrusted to his care.

On perusing a document of such weighty import, Julian had no hesitation to give up his horse to this formidable functionary; whom somebody compared to a lion, which, as the House of Commons was pleased to maintain such an animal, they were under the necessity of providing for by frequent commitments; until "Take him, Topham," became a proverb, and a formidable one, in the mouth of the public.

The acquiescence of Peveril procured him some grace in the sight of the emissary; who, before selecting two horses for his attendants, gave permission to the stranger to purchase a gray horse, much inferior indeed to that which he had resigned, both in form and in action, but very little lower in price, as Mr. Bridlesley, immediately on learning the demand for horses upon the part of the Commons of England, had passed a private resolution in his own mind, augmenting the price of his whole stud, by an imposition of at least twenty per cent, ad valorem.

Peveril adjusted and paid the price with much less argument than on the former occasion; for, to be plain with the reader, he had noticed in the warrant of Mr. Topham, the name of his father, Sir Geoffrey Peveril of Martindale Castle, engrossed at full length, as one of those subjected to arrest by that officer.

When aware of this material fact, it became Julian's business to leave Liverpool directly, and carry the alarm to Derbyshire, if, indeed, Mr. Topham had not already executed his charge in that country, which he thought unlikely, as it was probable they would commence by securing those who lived nearest to the seaports. A word or two which he overheard, strengthened his hopes.

"And hark ye, friend," said Mr. Topham; "you will have the horses at the door of Mr. Shortell, the mercer, in two hours, as we shall refresh ourselves there with a cool tankard, and learn what folks live in the neighbourhood that may be concerned in my way. And you will please to have that saddle padded, for I am told the Derbyshire roads are rough.—And you, Captain Dangerfield, and Master Everett, you must put on your Protestant spectacles, and show me where there is the shadow of a priest, or of a priest's favourer; for I am come down with a broom in my cap to sweep this north country of such like cattle."

One of the persons he thus addressed, who wore the garb of a broken-down citizen, only answered, "Ay, truly, Master Topham, it is time to purge the garner."

The other, who had a formidable pair of whiskers, a red nose, and a tarnished laced coat, together with a hat of Pistol's dimensions, was more loquacious. "I take it on my damnation," said this zealous Protestant witness, "that I will discover the marks of the beast on every one of them betwixt sixteen and seventy, as plainly as if they had crossed themselves with ink, instead of holy water. Since we have a King willing to do justice, and a House of Commons to uphold prosecutions, why, damn me, the cause must not stand still for lack of evidence."

"Stick to that, noble captain," answered the officer; "but, prithee, reserve thy oaths for the court of justice; it is but sheer waste to throw them away, as you do, in your ordinary conversation."

"Fear you nothing, Master Topham," answered Dangerfield; "it is right to keep a man's gifts in use; and were I altogether to renounce oaths in my private discourse, how should I know how to use one when I needed it? But you hear me use none of your Papist abjurations. I swear not by the Mass, or before George, or by any thing that belongs to idolatry; but such downright oaths as may serve a poor Protestant gentleman, who would fain serve Heaven and the King."

"Bravely spoken, most noble Festus," said his yoke-fellow.—"But do not suppose, that although I am not in the habit of garnishing my words with oaths out of season, I shall be wanting, when called upon to declare the height and the depth, the width and the length, of this hellish plot against the King and the Protestant faith."

Dizzy, and almost sick, with listening to the undisguised brutality of these fellows, Peveril, having with difficulty prevailed on Bridlesley to settle his purchase, at length led forth his gray steed; but was scarce out of the yard, when he heard the following alarming conversation pass, of which he seemed himself the object.

"Who is that youth?" said the slow soft voice of the more precise of the two witnesses. "Methinks I have seen him somewhere before. Is he from these parts?"

"Not that I know of," said Bridlesley; who, like all the other inhabitants of England at the time, answered the interrogatories of these fellows with the deference which is paid in Spain to the question of an inquisitor. "A stranger—entirely a stranger—never saw him before—a wild young colt, I warrant him; and knows a horse's mouth as well as I do."

"I begin to bethink me I saw such a face as his at the Jesuits' consult, in the White Horse Tavern," answered Everett.

"And I think I recollect," said Captain Dangerfield—

"Come, come, master and captain," said the authoritative voice of Topham, "we will have none of your recollections at present. We all know what these are likely to end in. But I will have you know, you are not to run till the leash is slipped. The young man is a well looking lad, and gave up his horse handsomely for the service of the House of Commons. He knows how to behave himself to his betters, I warrant you: and I scarce think he has enough in his purse to pay the fees."*

This speech concluded the dialogue, which Peveril, finding himself so much concerned in the issue,

* The infamous character of those who contrived and carried on the pretended Popish Plot, may be best estimated by the account given in North's Examen, who describes Oates himself with considerable power of colouring. "He has now in his trine exaltation, his plot in full force, efficacy, and virtue; he walked about with his guards (assigned for fear of the Papists murdering him.) He had lodgings in Whitehall, and 1200*l.* per annum pension: And no wonder, after he had the impudence to say to the House of Lords, in plain terms, that, if they thought it best to hasten to an end. Now when it seemed, to get out of the town unobserved, and take the nearest way to his father's castle, seemed his wisest plan. He had settled his reckoning at the inn, and brought with him to Bridlesley the small portmanteau which contained his few necessaries, so that he had no occasion to return thither. He resolved, therefore, to ride some miles before he stopped, even for the purpose of feeding his horse; and being pretty well acquainted with the country, he hoped to be able to push forward to Martindale Castle sooner than the worshipful Minister Topham; whose saddle was, in the first place, to be peddled, and who, when mounted would, in all probability, ride with the precaution of those who require such security against the effects of a hard trot.

Under the influence of these feelings, Julian pushed for Warrington, a place with which he was well acquainted; but, without halting in the town, he crossed the Mersey, by the bridge built by an ancestor of his friend the Earl of Derby, and continued his route towards Dishley, on the borders of Derbyshire. He might have reached this latter village easily, had his horse been fitter for a forced march; but in the course of the journey, he had occasion, more than once, to curse the official dignity of the person who had robbed him of his better steed, while taking the best direction he could through a country with which he was only generally acquainted.

would not help him to more money, he must be forced to help himself. He put on an Episcopal garb, except the lawn sleeves, silk gown and cap, great hat with hat band and four long ears, and was called or most blasphemously called himself, the Minister of the nation, whoever he pointed at was taken up and committed, so that many people got out of his way, as from a blast, and glad they could prove their two last years' conversion. The very breath of him was pestiferous, and if it brought not improvement or death, more such as whom it fed, it surely sowed repulsion, and left round Protestants afraid of him, and something worse than that—in danger of being put in the plot as traitors. I put his examination before the Commons, the Lord Chief Justice Rogers was sent for to the House and there signed warrants for the imprisonment of the Roman Catholic priests, upon which they were laid up in the Tower. The voice of the House seemed to confirm the whole. A solemn form of prayer was desired upon the subject of the plot and when one was proposed, it was fixed finally, because the Papists were not named as authors of it. God surely knew whether it were so or not, however it was yielded to, that assurance might not want information. The Queen herself was accused at the Commons' bar. The city, for fear of the Papists, put up their pikes and chains, and the chamberlain, Sir Thomas Player in the Court of Aldermen, gave his reasons for the city's using that caution, which was that he did not know but the next morning they might all rise with their throats cut. The trials, convictions, and executions of the priests, Jesuits, and others, were had, and attended with vast pomp and noise. Nothing ordinary or moderate was to be heard in people's conversation, but every debate and action was high flown and tumultuous. All freedom of speech was taken away and not to believe the plot, was worse than being Turk, Jew or infidel. For this fact of Godfrey's murder the three poor men of Somerset house were as was said, convicted. The most pitiful circumstance was that of their trial under the people's prejudice against them. The Lord Chief Justice Rogers took to with the tide, and voted for the plot, leaving down Popery as scandalous, leaving the Turk, which was but little propitious to them. The other judges were positive and decided little except some that were taken in also, and particularly the good Recorder Treby, who was the Attorney General, for he seldom asked a question but one might guess he favored the answer. Some may blame the (at best) positive behavior of the judges, but really considering it was impossible to stem such a current the appearing to do it in vain had been more expeditious, because it had inflamed the great and small round down scandal on themselves and disabled them from taking in when opportunity should be more favorable. The prisoners, under these hardships, had enough to do to make any defence, for where the testimony was positive, it was conclusive, for no reasoning or improbability would move the jury. It must be as impossible or not at all. Whoever doth not well observe the power of judging may think many things in the course of justice, very strange. If one side is held to demonstration, and the other allowed presumptions for proofs, any cause may be carried by a word, anger, policy, inconsistency, and prejudice, had, at the same time a planetary conjunction of the winds of most men, and destroyed in them that golden rule, of doing as they would be done unto.

In another passage Doctor's personal appearance is thus described—He was a low man, of an ill cut, very short neck, and his visage and features were most particular. His mouth was the centre of his face, and a compass there would sweep his nose, forehead, and chin within the perimeter. Few pass him Draw neck. In a word, he was a most consummate cheat, blasphemer, rascal, perjured, insolent, and unscrupulous mouth'd wretch, and were it not for the truth of history, and the great emotions to the public he was the cause of, not his (no little deserving) to be remembered.

At length, near Altringham, a high barren, bleak, and Peveril had only to look for some quiet, sequestered place of refreshment. This he found, in the form of a small cluster of cottages, most of which united the characters of an inn and a mill, where the sign of the Cat, the most faithful ally in defence of his menaces, was as high as Gristlekin in the fairy tale, and played fiddle for the more grace, announced that John Fiddle, the craft united the two honest occupations of inn and miller, and, doubtless, took toll from the guests in both capacities.

Such a place promised a traveller who was incognito, safer, if not better accommodation, than he was like to meet with in more frequented places, and at the door of the Cat and Fiddle, Julian accordingly.

CHAPTER XXI.

In three distracted scenes, whose truth was deep.
The bloody stratagems of busy heads.

OVER

At the door of the Cat and Fiddle, Julian received the usual attention paid to the customers of a poor house of entertainment. His horse was met by a ragged lad, who acted as hostler and stableman; however, the nag was tolerably well fitted with food and litter.

Having seen the animal on which his own safety perhaps his safety depended, properly provided, he entered the kitchen, which indeed was a parlour and hall of the little hostelry, to seek refreshment he could obtain for himself. To his satisfaction, he found there was only one guest, a young man besides himself, but he was less pleased to find that he must either go without a share with that single guest the only provision, or chance to be in the house, namely, a dish of ale and cold, which their host, the miller, had just from his mill stream.

At the particular request of Julian, the miller undertook to add a substantial dish of eggs and bacon, which perhaps she would not have taken for, had not the sharp eye of Peveril caught the flick hanging in its smoky retreat, which presence could not be denied, the hostess was obliged to bring it forward as a part of her menu.

She was a buxom dame about thirty years of age, and cheerful countenance did honour to the station of the jolly miller, her loving mate, and was stationed under the shade of an old fashioned projecting chimney, within which it was her part to work the fire, and provide for the wayfarer man the good things which were to him cooking on his hearth. Although, at first, honest woman seemed little disposed to give much additional trouble on Julian's account, yet good looks, handsome figure, and easy civility to a new guest, soon bespoke the principal part of her attention; and while busy in his service, she regarded from time to time, with looks, where something gay mingled with complacency. The rich man's rasher, and the eggs with which it was already spread itself through the apartment; all hissing of these savoury viands bore down the simmering of the pan, in which the fish were engaged a slower decoction. The table was set with a clean huck-a-back napkin, and all in preparation for the meal, which Julian began expect with a good deal of impatience, when the person who was destined to share it with him, at the apartment.

At the first glance, Julian recognized, to his own surprise, the same indifferently-dressed, thin-looking man who, during the first bargain which he had made with Bridlesley, had officiously interfered with advice and opinion. Displeased at having the company of any stranger forced upon him, Peveril, still less satisfied to find one who might make a claim of acquaintance with him, however distant the circumstances in which he stood compelled him to be as reserved as possible. He therefore sat him back upon his destined messmate, and, from self by looking out of the window, devoid all intercourse until it should be ed upon him.

While the other stranger went straight ady, where she toiled on household cares manded of her, what she meant by pre-nd eggs, when he had positively charged ing ready but the fish.

jug of home-brewed ale being placed betwixt them, was warranted by Dame Whitecraft as excellent; “for,” said she, “we know by practice that too much water drowns the miller, and we spare it on our malt as we would in our mill-dam.”

“I drink to your health, in it, dame,” said the elder stranger; “and a cup of thanks for these excellent fish; and to the drowning of all unkindness between us.”

“I thank you, sir,” said the dame, “and wish you the like; but I dare not pledge you, for our Gaffer says, the ale is brewed too strong for women; so I only drink a glass of canary at a time with a gossip, or any gentleman guest that is so minded.”

“You shall drink one with me then, dame,” said Peveril, “so you will let me have a flagon.”

“That you shall, sir, and as good as ever was broached; but I must to the mill, to get the key from the goodman.”

So saying, and tucking her clean gown through the pocket-holes, that her steps might be the more alert, and her dress escape dust, off she tripped to the mill, which lay close adjoining.

“A dainty dame, and dangerous, is the miller’s wife,” said the stranger, looking at Peveril. “Is not that old Chaucer’s phrase?”

“I—I believe so,” said Peveril, not much read in Chaucer, who was then even more neglected than at present; and much surprised at a literary quotation from one of the mean appearance exhibited by the person before him.

“Yes,” answered the stranger, “I see that you, like other young gentlemen of the time, are better acquainted with Cowley and Waller, than with the ‘well of English undefiled.’ I cannot help differing. There are touches of nature about the old bard of Woodstock, that, to me, are worth all the turns of laborious wit in Cowley, and all the ornate and artificial simplicity of his courtly competitor. The description, for instance, of his country coquette,— ‘Wincing she was, as is a wanton colt,

Sweet as a flower, and upright as a bolt.’

Then again, for pathos, where will you mend the dying scene of Arcite?

‘Alas, my heartie queen! alas, my wife!
Giver at once, and ender of my life.
What is this world?—What axen men to have?
Now with his love—now in his cold grave
Alone, withouten other company.’

But I tire you, sir; and do injustice to the poet, whom I remember but by halves.”

“On the contrary, sir,” replied Peveril, “you make him more intelligible to me in your recitation, than I have found him when I have tried to peruse him myself.”

“You were only frightened by the antiquated spelling, and ‘the letters black,’” said his companion. “It is many a scholar’s case, who mistakes a nut, which he could crack with a little exertion, for a bullet, which he must needs break his teeth on; but yours are better employed.—Shall I offer you some of this fish?”

“Not so, sir,” replied Julian, willing to show himself a man of reading in his turn; “I hold with old Caius, and profess to fear judgment, to fight where I cannot choose, and to eat no fish.”

The stranger cast a startled look around him at this observation, which Julian had thrown out, on purpose to ascertain, if possible, the quality of his companion, whose present language was so different from the character he had assumed at Bridlesley’s. His countenance, too, although the features were of an ordinary, not to say mean cast, had that character of intelligence which education gives to the most homely face; and his manners were so easy and dis- embarrassed, as plainly showed a complete acquaintance with society, as well as the habit of mingling with it in the higher stages. The alarm which he had evidently shown at Peveril’s answer, was but momentary; for he almost instantly replied, with a smile, “I promise you, sir, that you are in no dangerous company; for, notwithstanding my fish dinner, I am much disposed to trifle with some of your savoury mess, if you will indulge me so far.”

Peveril accordingly reinforced the stranger's treacher with what remained of the bacon and eggs, and saw him swallow a mouthful or two with eager greed, but presently after he began to dally with his knife and fork, like one whose appetite was satiated; then took a long draught of the black jock, and handed his plate to the large mastiff dog, who attracted by the smell of the dinner, had sat down before him for some time, licking his chops, and following with his eye every movement which the guest made to his food.

"Here my good fellow," said the "treacher," had no fork, and in debt this magnificent treacher had more than I do. I cannot withstand for more supplantation any longer."

The dog, moved these words by a civil shake of the tail, while he paddled up what was assigned him by the stranger's benevolence, in the greater haste that he heard his mistress's voice at the door.

"Here is the canary gentleman," said the landlady; and the goodman has set off the mill to come to wait on you himself. He always does so, when company drink with us."

"That he may come in for the best, that is, for the best where," said the stranger looking at Peveril. "The shot is mine," said Julian, "and if mine best will share it, I will willingly bestow another quart on him, and on you, too. I never break old customs."

These words caught the ear of Gaffer Whitecraft, who had entered the room, a straggling specimen of his robust trunk, prepared to play the civil or the surly host, as his company should be acceptable or otherwise. At Julian's invitation, he doffed his dusty top-coat-brushed from his shoulders the lower part of his professional dust, and sitting down on the end of a bench, about a yard from the table, filled a glass of canary, and drank to his guests, and especially to this noble gentleman, embracing Peveril, who had ordered the canary.

Julian returned the courtesy by drinking his health, and asking what news were about in the country.

"Naught, sir, I hear on naught except this Plot as they call it, that they are pursuing the Papists about, but it brings water to my mill, as the saying is. Between a express's hurrying hither and thither, and guards and prisoners riding to and from, and a confusion of the neighbourhood, that come to speak over the news of an evening, much I say, instead of once a week, when they sit in our gentlemen, and your land thence, and then I say, as a constable, and being a known Protestant, I have tapped I may venture to say, it may be ten stands of able-bodied men. Needs a reasonable oak of wine for a country corner. Heaven make us thankful and keep all good Protestants from Plot and Pique."

"I can easily conceive, my friend," said Julian, "that curiosity is a passion which runs naturally to the alehouse; and that night, and morning, and for ever all of them thirty persons, and great consumers of home brewed. But I am a perfect stranger in these parts, and I would willingly learn from a sensible man like you, a little of this same Plot, of which men speak so much, and appear to know so little."

"Learn a little of it," said the constable, "the most damnable blood-thirsty beast of a Plot. But hold, hold, my good master, I hope in the first place, you believe there is a plot? for, otherwise, the Justice must have a word with you, as sure as my name is John Whitecraft."

"It shall not need," said Peveril, "for I assure you, mine host, I believe in the Plot as freely and fully as a man can believe in any thing he cannot understand."

"God forbid that any body should pretend to understand it," said the implicit constable, "for his worship the Justice says it is a mine-bay and him, and he be as deep as mine of them. But even mine believe, though they do not understand, and that is what the Romanists say themselves. But this I am sure of it makes mine stirring time for justice, and witnesses, and constables. So here's to your health again, gentlemen in a cup of neat canary."

"Come, come, John Whitecraft," said his wife, "do not you demean yourself by naming witnesses along with justice and constables. All the world knows how they come by their money."

"Ay, but all the world knows that they do not by it, dame; and that is a great comfort to me, in their ceremonial silk, and swags of luff and scarlet, who but they? Ay, as we say for thieves—and not so cursed neither. Is the Doctor True Oaten, the master of the name, he not live at Whitehall, and eat off plate as a pension of thousands a year for what I know is he not to be Bishop of Litchfield, or see his Dublin die?"

"Then I hope Doctor Doddridge's revenue for these twenty years, and I dare say, that that ever wished such a wish," said the landlady, "do not understand these doings, not as the good Justice came to hold a consistory court, they del at the White Horse Tavern, I saw it, it got out of the line of business to be against the good, provided they drank with their own."

"Very true, dame," said her elder son, "what I call keeping a good publican company, as I will pay more presently, and be off at once."

Peveril on his part, also demanded a second, discharged it so liberally, that the miller finished, but as he bowed, and the hostess, who sat at the ground.

The horses of both guests were brought up, they mounted, in order to depart in peace. The host and hostess stood in the doorway, to see them depart. The landlady proffered a cigarette to the guest, while the landlady offered Peveril from her own peculiar bottle. For the purpose mounted on the horse back, with flesh and hand, so that it was easy for the departing, although on horseback, to return the customary approved manner, namely by thrusting over his landlady's shoulder, and saying "porting."

John Whitecraft could not declare the truth for there is no room for transcribing upon a black and the hands which might have been for resistance, were occupied with glass and matters for previous to be thrown away. A struggle appeared, however, she had seen, she in her hand, for as after a brief absence, she returned, she perceived Peveril a face to face, she whispered in his ear, "Beware of the Plot—an awful intimation, which, in those eyes, from suspicion, and treachery, was a most interesting fire and smoke, intercourse, as a moment of 'man traps and spring-guns, and an orchard.' Pressing her hand, in return, he comprehended her hand, she shook her head, return, and bade God speed him. There was on John Whitecraft's brow, now did he feel, sound half an cordia, as that which had been within doors. But then Peveril reflected, as the same guest is not always equally acceptable to the host and landlady, and unconscious of being any thing to excite the interest and pleasure of his journey without the long further of the road."

Julian was a little surprised, and not displeased to find that his new acquaintance had some road with him. He had a great wish to travel alone, and the hostess, who was ringing in his ears. If this man, possessed such shrewdness as his countenance and conversation intimated, versatile, as he had various remark, and disguised beneath his erudite and private, as was likely to be a concealed Jesuit, or a primary priest, trayling upon their eyes, and the conversion of England, and noting as the Northern heresy, a more dangerous company, a person in his own countenance, could hardly be imagined, after keeping a society with him, seem to authorize whatever reports had been concerning the attachment of his family to the Catholic cause. At the same time it was not cult, without actual evidence, to shake off the company of one who seemed determined, whether to or not, to remain alongside of him.

eril tried the experiment of riding slow; but his companion, determined not to drop him, slackened pace, so as to keep close by him. Julian then led his horse to a full trot; and was soon satisfied that the stranger, notwithstanding the meanness of appearance, was so much better mounted than self, as to render vain any thoughts of out-riding.

He pulled up his horse to a more reasonable pace, therefore, in a sort of despair. Upon his doing so, his companion, who had been hitherto silent, observed, that Peveril was not so well qualified to try upon the road, as he would have been had he been by his first bargain of horse-flesh that morning. Peveril assented dryly, but observed, that the animal would serve his immediate purpose, though he did it would render him indifferent company for a better mounted.

"By no means," answered his civil companion; "I am one of those who have travelled so much, that I am accustomed to make my journey at any pace of motion which may be most agreeable to myself."

Peveril made no reply to this polite intimation, being desirous to tender the thanks which, in courtesy, was the proper answer.—A second pause ensued, which was broken by Julian asking the stranger whether their roads were likely to lie long together in the same direction.

"I cannot tell," said the stranger, smiling, "I do not know which way you were travelling." "I am uncertain how far I shall go to-night," said Peveril, willingly misunderstanding the purport of the stranger's reply; "but though your horse goes better than yours, I think it will be to spare him; and in case our road continues to lie the same way, we are likely to sup, as we have together."

Julian made no answer whatever to this round intimation, but continued to ride on, turning, in his own mind, whether it would not be wisest to come to a full understanding with his pertinacious attendant to explain, in so many words, that it was his wish to travel alone. But, besides that the sort of intimation which they had formed during dinner, rendered him unwilling to be directly uncivil towards a person of gentlemanlike manners, he had also to consider that he might very possibly be mistaken in Julian's character and purpose; in which case, the folly of refusing the society of a sound Protestant, would afford as pregnant matter of suspicion, as the folly of going in company with a disguised Jesuit.

After a brief reflection, therefore, he resolved to enhance the encumbrance of the stranger's society, until an opportunity should occur to rid himself of it; and in the mean time, to act with as much caution as possibly could, in any communication that might take place between them; for Dame White's parting caution still rang anxiously in his ears, and the consequences of his own arrest upon suspicion must deprive him of every opportunity of serving his father, or the Countess, or Major Bridgenorth, whose interest, also, he had promised himself to support.

While he revolved these things in his mind, they journeyed several miles without speaking; and entered upon a more waste country, and worse than they had hitherto found, being, in fact, reaching the more hilly district of Derbyshire. Travelling on a very stony and uneven lane, Peveril's horse repeatedly stumbled; and, had he not been supported by the rider's judicious use of the reins, must at length certainly have fallen under these are times which crave wary riding, sir," said his companion; "and by your seat in the saddle, and your hand on the rein, you seem to understand it so."

"I have been long a horseman, sir," answered Peveril. "I am long a traveller, too, sir, I should suppose; but by the great caution you observe, you seem to me that the human tongue requires a curb, as well as a horse's jaws."

"Wiser men than I have been of opinion," answered Peveril, "that it were a part of prudence to be silent, when men have little or nothing to say."

"I cannot approve of their opinion," answered the stranger. "All knowledge is gained by communication, either with the dead, through books, or, more pleasingly, through the conversation of the living. The deaf and dumb, alone, are excluded from improvement; and surely their situation is not so enviable that we should imitate them."

At this illustration, which awakened a startling echo in Peveril's bosom, the young man looked hard at his companion; but in the composed countenance, and calm blue eye, he read no consciousness of a farther meaning than the words immediately and directly implied. He paused a moment, and then answered, "You seem to be a person, sir, of shrewd apprehension; and I should have thought it might have occurred to you, that, in the present suspicious times, men may, without censure, avoid communication with strangers. You know not me; and to me you are totally unknown. There is not room for much discourse between us, without trespassing on the general topics of the day, which carry in them seeds of quarrel between friends, much more betwixt strangers. At any other time, the society of an intelligent companion would have been most acceptable upon my solitary ride; but at present"—

"At present!" said the other, interrupting him. "You are like the old Romans, who held that hostis meant both a stranger and an enemy. I will therefore be no longer a stranger. My name is Ganlesse—by profession I am a Roman Catholic priest—I am travelling here in dread of my life—and I am very glad to have you for a companion."

"I thank you for the information with all my heart," said Peveril; "and to avail myself of it to the uttermost, I must beg of you to ride forward, or lag behind, or take a side-path, at your own pleasure; for as I am no Catholic, and travel upon business of high concernment, I am exposed both to risk and delay, and even to danger, by keeping such suspicious company. And so, Master Ganlesse, keep your own pace, and I will keep the contrary; for I beg leave to forbear your company."

As Peveril spoke thus, he pulled up his horse, and made a full stop.

The stranger burst out a-laughing. "What!" he said, "you forbear my company for a trifle of danger? Saint Anthony! How the warm blood of the Cavaliers is chilled in the young men of the present day! This young gallant, now, has a father, I warrant, who has endured as many adventures for hunted priests, as a knight-errant for distressed damsels."

"This raillery avails nothing, sir," said Peveril. "I must request you will keep your own way."

"My way is yours," said the pertinacious Master Ganlesse, as he called himself; "and we will both travel the safer, that we journey in company. I have the receipt of fern-seed, man, and walk invisible. Besides, you would not have me quit you in this lane, where there is no turn to right or left?"

Peveril moved on, desirous to avoid open violence; for which the indifferent tone of the traveller, indeed, afforded no apt pretext; yet highly disliking his company, and determined to take the first opportunity to rid himself of it.

The stranger proceeded at the same pace with him, keeping cautiously on his bridle hand, as if to secure that advantage in case of a struggle. But his language did not intimate the least apprehension. "You do me wrong," he said to Peveril, "and you equally wrong yourself. You are uncertain where to lodge to-night—trust to my guidance. Here is an ancient hall, within four miles, with an old knightly Pantaloone for its lord—an all-be-ruffed Dame Barbara for the lady gay—a Jesuit in a butler's habit, to say grace—an old tale of Edgehill and Worster fights to relish a cold venison—~~and~~ and a flask of claret mantled with cobwebs—a bed for you in the priest's hiding-hole—and, for aught I know, pretty Mistress Betty, the dairymaid, to make it ready."

"This has no charms for me, sir," said Peveril, who, in spite of himself, could not but be amused with the ready sketch which the stranger gave of many an old mansion in Cheshire and Derbyshire, where the owners retained the ancient faith of Rome.

"Well, I see I cannot charm you in this way," continued his companion; "I must strike another key. I am no longer Guallesse, the seminary priest, but (changing his tone, and snuffing in the nose) Simon Canter, a poor preacher of the word, who travels this way to call sinners to repentance; and to strengthen, and to edify, and to fructify, among the scattered remnant who hold fast the truth. - What say you to this, sir?"

"I admire your versatility, sir, and could be entertained with it at another time. - At present, sincerity is more in request."

"Sincerity!" said the stranger; - "A child's whistle, with but two notes in it - yea, yea, and nay, nay. Why, man, the very Quakers have renounced it, and have got in its stead a gallant recorder, called Hypocrisy, that is somewhat like Sincerity in form, but of much greater compass, and combines the whole gamut. - Come, be ruled - be a disciple of Simon Canter for the evening, and we will leave the old tumble-down castle of the knight aforesaid, on the left hand, for a new brick-built mansion, erected by an eminent salt-boiler from Nantwich, who expects the said Simon to make a strong spiritual pickle for the preservation of a son, somewhat corrupted by the evil communications of this wicked world. What say you? He has two daughters - brighter eyes never beamed under a pinched hood; and for myself, I think there is more fire in those who live only to love and to devotion, than in your court beauties, whose hearts are running on twenty follies besides. You know not the pleasure of being conscience-keeper to a pretty precisian, who in one breath repeats her foibles, and in the next confesses her passion. - Perhaps, though, you may have known such in your day? Come, sir, it grows too dark to see your blushes; but I am sure they are burning on your cheek."

"You take great freedom, sir," said Peveril, as they now approached the end of the lane, where it opened on a broad common; "and you seem rather to count more on my forbearance, than you have room to do with safety. - We are now nearly free of the lane which has made us companions for this last half hour. To avoid your farther company, I will take the turn to the left, upon that common; and if you follow me, it shall be at your peril. Observe, I am well armed; and you will fight at odds."

"Not at odds," returned the provoking stranger, "while I have my brown jennet, with which I can ride round and around you at pleasure; and this text, of a handful in length," (showing a pistol which he drew from his bosom,) "which discharges very convincing doctrine on the pressure of a forefinger, and is apt to equalize all odds, as you call them, of youth and strength. Let there be no strife between us, however - the moor lies before us - choose your path on it - I take the other."

"I wish you good-night, sir," said Peveril to the stranger. "I ask your forgiveness, if I have misconstrued you in any thing; but the times are perilous, and a man's life may depend on the society in which he travels."

"True," said the stranger; "but in your case, the danger is already undergone, and you should seek to counteract it. You have travelled in my company long enough to devise a handsome branch of the Popish Plot. How will you look, when you see come forth, in comely folio form, The Narrative of Simon Canter, otherwise called Richard Guallesse, concerning the horrid Popish Conspiracy for the Murder of the King, and Massacre of all Protestants, as given on oath to the Honourable House of Commons; setting forth, how far Julian Peveril, younger of Martindale Castle, is concerned in carrying on the same?"

* There is no more odious feature of this detestable plot than that the forsworn witnesses by whose oaths the fraud was supported, claimed a sort of literary interest in their own fabrications by publications under such titles as the following: "A narrative and impartial discovery of the horrid Popish Plot, carried on for burning and destroying the cities of London and Westminster, with their suburbs, setting forth the several coun-

"How, sir? What mean you?" said Peveril, startled.

"Nay, sir," replied his companion, "do not interrupt my titlepage. Now that Oates and Bedloe have drawn the great prizes, the subordinate clue goes little but by the sale of their narrative; and James Newman, Simmons and every bookseller of note will tell you that the title is half the narrative. - May I therefore set forth the various schemes you have communicated to me, of landing ten thousand soldiers on the Isle of Man upon the coast of Lancashire, marching into Wales to join the ten thousand who are to be shipped from Spain and so cover the destruction of the Protestant religion, and the devoted city of London. Truly, I think such a narrative, well speed with a few horrors, and perhaps, viribus Parliamenti, might, though the press is somewhat overstocked, be still worth some ten or thirty pieces."

"You seem to know me, sir," said Peveril; "if so I think I may fairly ask you your name, thus bearing me company, and the measure of this rhapsody. If it be mere banter, I leave it within proper limit; although it is very much the part of a stranger. If you have any farther to speak it out; I am not to be trifled with."

"Good, now," said the stranger, "what an unprofitable chase you have been on. An Italian fuoruscito, when he despatches you, takes aim from behind a wall, with a musket, and prefixes his conference with Parliamento. So does your man-of-war fire a gun across the bows of a Hans-mogan Indiaman, just to bring her to so do I show Master Julian Peveril, that one of the honourable society of witnesses, for these two hours past, he is as much in danger now, as what he is ever likely to be. - Suddenly changing his tone to serious, and in general ironical, he added, "Young man, the pestilence is diffused through the streets, and is in vain men would avoid the disease, by solitude, and shunning the company of their sufferers."

"In what, then, consists their safety?" said Peveril, willing to ascertain, if possible, the drift of his companion's purpose.

"In following the counsels of wise physicians," such was the stranger's answer.

"And as such," said Peveril, "you offer advice?"

"Pardon me, young man," said the stranger, "I see no reason I should do so. - I am not a physician, and added, in his former tone, "your friend offers no advice - I only say it would be well to seek it."

"And from whom, or where can I obtain it?" said Peveril. "I wander in this country, like a dream; so much a few months have changed. Men who formerly occupied themselves with their own affairs, are now swallowed up in matters of policy; and those tremble under the apprehensions of some strange and sudden convulsion of empire, who were formerly only occupied by the fear of a bed supperless. And to sum up the matter, the stranger, apparently well acquainted with my affairs and concerns, who first attaches himself to me, whether I will or no; and then refuses me assistance in the prosecution of his business, while he menaces me with the most dangerous and strange accusations."

"Had I meant such infamy," said the stranger, "believe me, I had not given you the threat."

"I am not a physician, and added, in his former tone, "your friend offers no advice - I only say it would be well to seek it."

At any other period, it would have appeared equally and illegal to poison the public mind with stuff of such a nature before the witnesses had made their depositions in open court. But in this moment of frenzy, every thing which could confirm the existence of these senseless delusions, was eagerly sought for; and whatever seemed to infer doubt of the witnesses' testimony, or to cast a shadow of suspicion upon the discovery of the plot, was eagerly seized. In short, as expressed by Dryden, "'Twas worse than plotting, to suspect the plot."

But be wise, and come on with me. There is a small inn, where, if you can take a warrant for it, we shall sleep in perfect you yourself," said Peveril, "but now were to avoid observation; and in that case, how protect me."

"I did but silence that tattling landlady, say in which such people are most readily and for Topham, and his brace of night owls, at hawk at other and lesser game than I love."

could not help admiring the easy and confidence with which the stranger seemed to assume superiority to all the circumstances of danger and him; and after hastily considering the matter with himself, came to the resolution to keep with him for this night, at least; and to what possible, who he really was, and to what he estate he was attached. The boldness of his talk seemed almost inconsistent following the perilous, though at that time usual, trade of an informer. No doubt, such assumed every appearance which could insinuate into the confidence of their destined victims; and he thought he discovered in this man's manner and reckless frankness, which he could connect with the idea of sincerity in the present.

He therefore answered, after a moment's pause, "I embrace your proposal, sir, although, so, I am reposing a sudden, and perhaps an confidence."

"What am I, then, reposing in you?" said the other. "Is not our confidence mutual?"

"Much the contrary. I know nothing of you—you have named me; and, knowing me to Peveril, know you may travel with me in security."

"I level I do!" answered his companion. "I have the same security as with a lighted petard, may expect to explode every moment. Are he son of Peveril of the Peak, with whose slavery and Popery are so closely allied, that a man of either sex in Derbyshire concludes without a petition to be freed from all And do you not come from the Popish County of Derby, bringing, for aught I know, a whole Manxmen in your pocket, with full complements of arms, ammunition, baggage, and a train of lery?"

"Not very likely I should be so poorly mounted," said he, laughing, "if I had such a weight to carry. I see I must wait for your confidence, think proper to confer it; for you are already acquainted with my affairs, that I have nothing to offer you in exchange for it."

"I see, then," said his companion; "give your spur, and raise the curb rein, lest he meander ground with his nose, instead of his paces. I am not now more than a furlong or two from the inn of entertainment."

"I intended their pace accordingly, and soon entered the small solitary inn which the traveller mentioned. When its light began to twinkle in the distance, the stranger, as if recollecting something he had forgotten, "By the way, you must have passed by; for it may be ill travelling under a star, as the fellow who keeps this house is an wellian. What will you call yourself?—My name for the present—Ganlesse."

"There is no occasion to assume a name at all," said the other. "I am Julian. I do not incline to use a borrowed name, especially as I may meet with some one who calls me by my own."

"I call you Julian, then," said Master Ganlesse, "for Peveril will smell, in the nostrils of mine dog, the odour of idolatry, conspiracy, Smithfield faggots, fish-bones, the murder of Sir Edmondsbury Godfrey, and the fire of purgatory."

"I spoke thus, they alighted under the great gnarled oak-tree, that served to canopy the inn, which, at an earlier hour, had groaned under the weight of a frequent conclave of rustic s. Ganlesse, as he dismounted, whistled in a particularly shrill note, and was answered from within the house.*

CHAPTER XXII.

He was a fellow in a peasant's garb;
Yet one could censure you a woodcock's carving,
Like any courtier at the ordinary.—The Ordinary.

THE person who appeared at the door of the little inn to receive Ganlesse, as we mentioned in our last chapter, sung as he came forward, this scrap of an old ballad,—

Good even to you, Diccon;
And how have you sped?
Bring you the bonny bride
To banquet and bed?"

To which Ganlesse answered, in the same tone and tune,—

"Content thee, kind Robin;
He need little care,
Who brings home a fat buck
Instead of a hare."

"You have missed your blow, then?" said the other, in reply.

"I tell you I have not," answered Ganlesse; "but you will think of naught but your own thriving occupation—May the plague that belongs to it stick to it! though it hath been the making of thee."

"A man must live, Diccon Ganlesse," said the other.

"Well, well," said Ganlesse, "bid my friend welcome, for my sake. Hast thou got any supper?"

"Reckless like a sacrifice—Chaubert has done his best. That fellow is a treasure! give him a farthing candle, and he will cook a good supper out of it.—Come in, sir. My friend's friend is welcome, as we say in my country."

"We must have our horses looked to first," said Peveril, who began to be considerably uncertain about the character of his companions—"that done, I am for you."

Ganlesse gave a second whistle; a groom appeared, who took charge of both their horses, and they themselves entered the inn.

The ordinary room of a poor inn seemed to have undergone some alterations, to render it fit for company of a higher description. There were a banquet, a couch, and one or two other pieces of furniture, of a style inconsistent with the appearance of the place. The tablecloth, which was ready laid, was of the finest damask; and the spoons, forks, &c. were of silver. Peveril looked at this apparatus with some surprise; and again turning his eyes attentively upon his travelling companion Ganlesse, he could not help discovering, (by the aid of imagination, perhaps,) that though insignificant in person, plain in features, and dressed like one in indigence, there lurked still about his person and manners, that indefinable ease of manner which belongs only to men of birth and quality, or to those who are in the constant habit of

* It will be afterwards found, that in the supposed Richard Ganlesse, is first introduced into the story the detestable Edward Christian, a character with as few redeeming good qualities as the author's too prolific pencil has ever attempted to draw. He is a mere creature of the imagination; and although he may receive some dignity of character from his talents, energy, and influence over others, he is, in other respects, a moral monster, since even his affection for his brother, and resentment of his death, are grounded on vindictive feelings, which scruple at no means, even the foulest, for their gratification. The author will be readily believed when he affirms, that no original of the present times, or those which preceded them, has given the outline for a character so odious. The personage is a mere fancy piece. In particular the author disclaims all allusion to a gentleman named Edward Christian, who actually existed during those troublesome times, was brother of William Christian, the Dempster, and died in prison in the Isle of Man. With this unfortunate gentleman the character in the novel has not the slightest connexion, nor do the incidents of their lives in any respect agree. There existed, as already stated, an Edward Christian of the period, who was capable of very bad things, since he was a companion and associate of the robber Thomas Blood, and convicted along with him of a conspiracy against the celebrated Duke of Buckingham. This character was probably not unlike that of his namesake in the novel, at least the faults ascribed to him are laud aliis a Scroto studiis. But Mr. Christian of Unwin, if there existed a rogue of his name during that period of general corruption, has the more right to have him distinguished from his unfortunate relative, who died in prison before the period mentioned.

frequenting the best company. His companion, whom he called Will Smith, although tall, and rather good-looking, besides being much better dressed, had not, nevertheless, exactly the same ease of demeanour; and was obliged to make up for the want, by an additional proportion of assurance. Who these two persons could be, Peveril could not attempt even to form a guess. There was nothing for it, but to watch their manner and conversation.

After speaking a moment in whispers, Smith said to his companion, "We must go look after our nags for ten minutes, and allow Chaubert to do his office."

"Will he not appear, and minister before us, then?" said Ganlesse.

"What! he?—he shift a trencher—he hand a cup?—No, you forget whom you speak of. Such an order were enough to make him fall on his own sword—he is already on the borders of despair, because no craw-fish are to be had."

"Alack-a-day!" replied Ganlesse. "Heaven forbid I should add to such a calamity! To stable, then, and see we how our steeds eat their provender, while ours is getting ready."

They adjourned to the stable accordingly, which, though a poor one, had been hastily supplied with whatever was necessary for the accommodation of four excellent horses; one of which, that from which Ganlesse was just dismounted, the groom we have mentioned was cleaning and dressing by the light of a huge wax-candle.

"I am still so far Catholic," said Ganlesse, laughing, as he saw that Peveril noticed this piece of extravagance. "My horse is my saint, and I dedicate a candle to him."

"Without asking so great a favour for mine, which I see standing behind yonder old hen-coop," replied Peveril, "I will at least relieve him of his saddle and bridle."

"Leave him to the lad of the inn," said Smith; "he is not worth any other person's handling; and I promise you, if you slip a single buckle, you will so flavour of that stable duty, that you might as well eat roast-beef as ragouts, for any relish you will have of them."

"I love roast-beef as well as ragouts, at any time," said Peveril, adjusting himself to a task which every young man should know how to perform when need is; "and my horse, though it be but a sorry jade, will champ better on hay and corn, than on an iron bit."

While he was unsaddling his horse, and shaking down some litter for the poor wearied animal, he heard Smith observe to Ganlesse,—"By my faith, Dick, thou hast fallen into poor Slender's blunder; missed Anne Page, and brought us a great lubberly postmaster's boy."

"Hush! he will hear thee," answered Ganlesse; "there are reasons for all things—it is well as it is. But, prithee, tell thy fellow to help the youngster."

"What!" replied Smith, "d'ye think I am mad?—Ask Tom Beacon—Tom of Newmarket—Tom of ten thousand, to touch such a four-legged brute as that?—Why, he would turn me away on the spot—discard me, i'faith. It was all he would do to take in hand your own, my good friend; and if you consider him not the better, you are like to stand groom to him yourself to-morrow."

"Well Will," answered Ganlesse, "I will say that for thee, thou hast a set of the most useless, scoundrelly, insolent vermin about thee, that ever eat up a poor gentleman's revenues."

"Useless? I deny it," replied Smith. "Every one of my fellows does something or other so exquisitely, that it were sin to make him do any thing else—it is your jacks-of-all-trades who are masters of none.—But hark to Chaubert's signal! The coxcomb is twangling it on the lute, to the tune of Eccillez vous, belle endormie.—Come, Master What d'ye call, [addressing Peveril,]—get ye some water, and wash this filthy witness from your hand, as Betterton says in the play; for Chaubert's cookery is like Friar Bacon's head—time is—time was—time will soon be no more."

So saying, and scarce allowing Julian time to dip his hands in a bucket, and dry them on a horse cloth, he hurried him from the stable back to the supper-chamber.

Here all was prepared for their meal, with an epicurean delicacy, which rather belonged to the saloon of a palace, than the cabin in which it was displayed. Four dishes of silver, with covers of the same metal, smoked on the table; and three seats were placed for the company. Beside the lower end of the board, was a small side-table, to answer the purpose of what is now called a dumb waiter; on which several flasks reared their tall, stately, and swanlike crests, above glasses and rummers. Clean covers were also placed within reach; and a small travelling-case of morocco, hooped with silver, displayed a number of bottles, containing the most approved sauces that culinary ingenuity had then invented.

Smith, who occupied the lower seat, and seemed to act as president of the feast, motioned the two travellers to take their places and begin. "I would not stay a grace-time," he said, "to save a whole nation from perdition. We could bring no chauf-fettes with any convenience; and even Chaubert is nothing, unless his dishes are tasted in the very moment of projection. Come, uncover, and let us see what he has done for us.—Hum!—ha!—ay—squab-pigeons—wildfowl—young chickens—venison cutlets—and a space in the centre, wet, alas! by a gentle tear from Chaubert's eye, where should have been the soupe aux ecritisses. The zeal of that poor fellow is ill repaid by his paltry ten louis per month."

"A mere trifle," said Ganlesse; "but, like yourself, Will, he serves a generous master."

The repast now commenced; and Julian, though he had seen his young friend the Earl of Derby, and other gallants, affect a considerable degree of interest and skill in the science of the kitchen, and was not himself either an enemy or a stranger to the pleasures of a good table, found, that, on the present occasion, he was a mere novice. Both his companions, but Smith in especial, seemed to consider that they were now engaged in the only true and real business of life; and weighed all its minutiae with a proportional degree of accuracy. To carve the morsel in the most delicate manner—and to apportion the proper seasoning with the accuracy of the chemist,—to be aware, exactly, of the order in which one dish should succeed another, and to do plentiful justice to all—was a minuteness of science to which Julian had hitherto been a stranger. Smith accordingly treated him as a mere novice in epicurism, cautioning him to eat his soup before the bouilli, and to forget the Manx custom of bolting the boiled meat before the broth, as if Cutlar MacCulloch* and all his whingers were at the door. Peveril took the hint in good part, and the entertainment proceeded with animation.

* This alludes to a singular custom of the inhabitants of the northern coast of the Isle of Man, who used of old to eat the sodden meat before they supped the broth, lest, it is said, they should be deprived of the more substantial part of the meal, if they waited to eat it at the second course.

They account for this anomaly in the following manner:—About the commencement of the sixteenth century, the Earl of Derby, being a fiery young chief, fond of war and honour, made a furious inroad, with all his forces, into the Stewartry of Kirkcudbright, and committed great ravages still remembered in Manx song. Mr. Train, with his usual kindness, sent me the following literal translation of the verses:

"There came Thomas Derby, born king,
He it was who wore the golden crupper;
There was not one Lord in wide England itself,
With so many vassals as he had.

"On Scottishmen he avenged himself;
He went over to Kirkcudbright,
And there made such havoc of houses,
That some are uninhabitable to this day.

"Was not that fair in a youth,
To avenge himself on his foe while he was so young;
Before his beard had grown around his mouth,
And to bring home his men in safety?"

This incursion of the Earl with the golden crupper was severely revenged. The gentlemen of the name of MacCulloch, a clan then and now powerful in Galloway, had at their head, at the time, a chief of courage and activity, named Cutlar MacCulloch. He was an excellent seaman, and speedily equipped a predatory flotilla, with which he made repeated descents on the northern shores of the Isle of Man, the dominions of the Earl

At length Ganlesse paused, and declared the supper exquisite. "But, my friend Smith," he added, "are your wines curious? When you brought all that trash of plates and trumpery into Derbyshire, I hope you did not leave us at the mercy of the strong ale of the shire, as thick and muddy as the squires who drink it?"

"Did I not know that you were to meet me Dick Ganlesse?" answered their host. "And can you suspect me of such an omission? It is true, you must make champagne and claret serve, for my burgundy would not bear travelling. But if you have a fancy for sherry, or Vin de Cahors, I have a notion Chaubert and Tom Beacon have brought some for their own drinking."

"Perhaps the gentlemen would not care to impart," said Ganlesse.

"O fie!—any thing in the way of civility," replied Smith. "They are, in truth, the best-natured lads alive, when treated respectfully; so that if you would prefer"

"By no means," said Ganlesse—"a glass of champagne will serve in a scarcity of better."

"The cork shall start obsequious to my thumb."

said Smith; and as he spoke, he untwisted the wire, and the cork struck the roof of the cabin. Each guest took a large rummer glass of the sparkling beverage, which Peveril had judgment and experience enough to pronounce exquisite.

"Give me your hand, sir," said Smith; "it is the first word of sense you have spoken this evening."

"Wisdom, sir," replied Peveril, "is like the best ware in the pedlar's pack, which he never produces till he knows his customer."

"Sharp as mustard," returned the bon vivant; "but be wise, most noble pedlar, and take another rummer of this same flask, which you see I have held in an oblique position for your service—not permitting it to retrograde to the perpendicular. Nay, take it off before the bubble bursts on the rim, and the zest is gone."

"You do me honour, sir," said Peveril, taking the second glass. "I wish you a better office than that of my cupbearer."

"You cannot wish Will Smith one more congenial to his nature," said Ganlesse. "Others have a selfish delight in the objects of sense. Will thrives, and is happy, by imparting them to his friends."

"Better help men to pleasures than to pains, Master Ganlesse," answered Smith, somewhat angrily.

"Nay, wrath thee not, Will," said Ganlesse; "and speak no words in haste, lest you may have cause to repent at leisure. Do I blame thy social concern for the pleasures of others? Why, man, thou dost therein most philosophically multiply thine own. A man has of Derby, carrying off all that was not, in the Border phrase, so hot or too heavy.

The following is the deposition of John Machariotic concerning the losses he had suffered by this sea-king and his Galloway nee. It is dated at Peel Castle.—"Taken by Collard MacCulloch and his men by wrongous spoliation, Two box beddes and akin burdes, i.e. lathe, a feder boustier, a cote of Mailzie, a new burde, two kytis, five barrels, a sylt-fut, xx pipes, two ungs, three bolts of malt, a querne of rosate of vi stane, certain stes [peats] extending to i.c. load, viii bolts of threschit corn, ii unthraschin, and xl knowle."—CHALLERSON, p. 47, edit. London, 1653.

This active rover rendered his name so formidable, that the custom of eating the meat before the broth was introduced by the islanders whose festivals he often interrupted. They also remembered him in their prayers and graces; as,

"God keep the house and all within.

From Cut MacCulloch and his kin;"

as I have heard it recited.

God keep the good corn, and the sheep and the bullock.
From Satan, from sin, and from Cutlar MacCulloch."

It is said to have chanced, as the master of the house had offered one of these popular benedictions, that Cutlar in person entered the habitation with this reply:

"Gudemán, gudemán, ye pray too late, MacCulloch's ships are at the Yaite."

The Yaite is a well-known landing-place on the north side of the Isle of Man.

This redoubted corsair is, I believe, now represented by the chief of the name, James MacCulloch, Esq. of Ardwell, the author's friend and near connexion.

but one throat, and can but eat, with his best efforts, some five or six times a-day; but thou dinest with every friend that cuts up a capon, and art quaffing wine in other men's gullets, from morning to night—et sic de cateris."

"Friend Ganlesse," returned Smith, "I prithee beware—thou knowest I can cut gullets as well as tickle them."

"Ay, Will," answered Ganlesse, carelessly; "I think I have seen thee wave thy whinyard at the throat of a Hogan-mogan—a Netherlandish weasand, which expanded only on thy natural and mortal objects of aversion—Dutch cheese, rye-bread, pickled herring, onions, and Geneva."

"For pity's sake, forbear the description!" said Smith; "thy words overpower the perfumes, and flavour the apartment like a dish of salmagundi!"

"But for an epiglottis like mine," continued Ganlesse, "down which the most delicate morsels are washed by such claret as thou art now pouring out, thou couldst not, in thy bitterest mood, wish a worse fate than to be necklaced somewhat tight by a pair of white arms."

"By a tenpenny cord," answered Smith; "but not till you were dead; that thereafter you be presently imbowelled, you being yet alive; that your head be then severed from your body, and your body divided into quarters, to be disposed of at his Majesty's pleasure. How like you that, Master Richard Ganlesse?"

"E'en as you like the thoughts of dining on bran-bread and milk-porridge—an extremity which you trust never to be reduced to. But all this shall not prevent me from pledging you in a cup of sound claret."

As the claret circulated, the glee of the company increased; and Smith, placing the dishes which had been made use of upon the side table, stamped with his foot on the floor, and the table sinking down a trap, again rose, loaded with olives, sliced neat's tongue, caviare, and other provocatives for the circulation of the bottle.

"Why, Will," said Ganlesse, "thou art a more complete mechanist than I suspected; thou hast brought thy scene-shifting inventions to Derbyshire in marvellously short time."

"A rope and pulleys can be easily come by," answered Will; "and with a saw and a plane, I can manage that business in half a day. I love that knack of clean and secret conveyance—thou knowest it was the foundation of my fortunes."

"It may be the wreck of them too, Will," replied his friend.

"True, Diccon," answered Will; "but dum viximus vitamus,—that is my motto; and therewith I present you a brimmer to the health of the fair lady you wot of."

"Let it come, Will," replied his friend; and the flask circulated briskly from hand to hand.

Julian did not think it prudent to seem a check on their festivity, as he hoped in its progress something might occur to enable him to judge of the character and purposes of his companions. But he watched them in vain. Their conversation was animated and lively, and often bore reference to the literature of the period, in which the elder seemed particularly well skilled. They also talked freely of the Court, and of that numerous class of gallants who were then described as "men of wit and pleasure about town;" and to which it seemed probable they themselves appertained.

At length the universal topic of the Popish Plot was started; upon which Ganlesse and Smith seemed to entertain the most opposite opinions. Ganlesse, if he did not maintain the authority of Oates in its utmost extent, contended that at least it was confirmed in a great measure by the murder of Sir Edmondsbury Godfrey, and the letters written by Coleman to the confessor of the French King.*

* The unfortunate Coleman, executed for the Popish Plot, was secretary to the late Duchess of York, and had been a correspondent of the French King's confessor, Pere la Chaise. Their correspondence was seized, and although the papers contained nothing to confirm the monstrous fictions of the accusers, yet there was a great deal to show that he and other

With much more noise, and less power of reasoning. Will Smith hesitated not to ridicule and run down the whole discovery as one of the wildest and most countless alarms which had ever been sounded in the ears of a credulous public. "I shall never forget," he said—"Sir Godfrey's most original funeral. Two bouncing persons, well armed with sword and pistol, mounted the pulpit, to secure the third fellow who preached from being murdered in the face of the congregation. Three persons in one pulpit—three eyes in one beam—no wonder men stood aghast at such a prodigy."

"What then, Will," answered his companion, "you are one of those who think the good knight murdered himself, in order to give credit to the Plot?"

"By my faith, not I," said the other, "but some true blue Protestant might do the job for him, in order to give the thing a better colour—I will be judged by our silent friend, whether that be not the most sensible solution of the whole."

"I pray you, pardon me, gentlemen," said Julian; "I am but just landed in England, and am a stranger to the particular circumstances which have thrown the nation into such ferment. It would be the highest degree of assurance in me to give my opinion between gentlemen who argue the matter so ably, besides, to say truth, I confess weariness—your wine is more potent than I expected, or I have drank more of it than I meant to do."

"Nay, if an hour's nap will refresh you," said the elder of the strangers, "make no ceremony with us. Your bed—all we can offer as such—is that old-fashioned Dutch-built sofa, as the last new phrase calls it. We shall be early starters to-morrow morning."

"And that we may be so," said Smith, "I propose that we do not up all this night—I hate lying rough, and detest a pillow bed. So have at another flask, and the newest lampoon to help it out—

"Now a plague of those votes,
Utter Papists and Plots,
And be d—d Doctor Cresset
Tut de tut!"

"Nay, but our puritanic host," said Gentless.

"I have him in my pocket, man—his eyes, ears, nose and tongue," answered his boon companion, "are all in my possession."

"In that case, when you give him back his eyes and nose, I pray you keep his ears and tongue," answered Gentless. "Seeing and smelling are organs sufficient making Chatterbox necessary ought for and desired to find the means to bring back England to the faith of Rome." "It is certain," says Mr. Hume, "that the restless and enterprising spirit of the Catholic church, particularly of the Jesuits, merits of station and is in some degree dangerous to every other religion. Such men of extraordinary talents that are not their religious have penetrated into every region of the globe, and in one way there is a Papist plot continually carrying on against all other Protestant, Pagan and Mahomedan."—History of England, vol. vi. p. 75, edit. 1797.

This security is especially maintained by Smith. The spread was prodigious both at the procession and in and about the church, and it is true that any thing called Papists were it a cat or a dog, had probably gone to prison as a nuisance. The Catholics all kept close in their houses and lodgings, thinking it a good compensation to be safe there as far as they were from getting violently at that time. But there was a lot which upheld among the common people an artificial fright as that they are almost fearful of a Papist knife put at his throat, and at the same time, beside the single lot, two thousand five hundred dragoons in the garrison to guard him from being killed while he was preaching by the Papists. I did not see this spread, but was visibly told by some that affirmed that they did see it, and I agree not with any that did contradict it. A most portentous spectacle upon their persons to our pulpit. Enough of that, as a last sentence, to say it true in the audience. The late I speak, was over such before and probably will never be over again, and it had not been so now as it was evident, but the same streamer founded upon the uncertainty of the flesh."—London, p. 104.

It may be however remarked that the singular circumstance of the Edmonsbury Godfrey the justice before which Gates had made his deposition being found murdered, was the very first from which most men would expect a complete proof of the plot. As he was believed to have lost his life by the Papists for having taken Gates's deposition, the justice spread with remarkable rapidity, and every corner of heaven was approached every report the same about the justice caught and believed. Whether this unfortunate gentleman had his life by Papist or Protestant, by private enemies, or by his own hand, (for he was a low spirited and malicious man,) will probably never be discovered.

for such a knave—to hear and tell, ere things he should have no manner of pretensions to."

"I grant you it were well done," answered Smith; "but it were a robbing of the hangmen and the gallies; and I am an honest fellow, who would give Death and the devil his due. So,

"All joy to your Court
Long life, love, and pleasure;
May the King live for ever!
Tis no matter for us, boys!"

While the Bacchanalian scene proceeded, Julian had wrapt himself closely in his cloak, and stretched himself on the couch, which they had shown to him. He looked towards the table he had left—the lamps seemed to become hazy and dim as he gazed—he heard the sound of voices, but they ceased to convey any impression to his understanding; and in a few minutes, he was faster asleep than he had ever been in the whole course of his life.

CHAPTER XXIII.

The Goddess then has bled his blow,
And said, now, now,
The House of Rhodes will be strong,
I should it love to go—Off sailed!

When Julian awakened the next morning, all was still and vacant in the apartment. The ring on which shone through the half-closed shutters, showed some relics of the last night's banquet, which his confused and throbbing head assured him had been carried into a debauch.

Without being much of a boon companion, Julian, like other young men of the time, was not in the habit of shunning wine, which was then used in considerable quantities, and he could not help being surprised, that the few cups he had drunk over night had produced on his frame the effects of excess. He rose up, adjusted his dress, and sought in the apartment for water to perform his morning ablutions, but without success. Wine there was on the table, and beside it one stool stood and another lay as if thrown down in the heedless riot of the evening. "Surely," he thought to himself, "the wine must have been very powerful which rendered me insensible to the noise my companions must have made ere they finished their carouse."

With momentary surprise he examined his weapons, and the packet which he had recovered from the Countess, and kept in a secret pocket of his upper-coat, bound close about his person. All was safe; and the very operation reminded him of the duties which lay before him. He left the apartment where they had supped, and went into another, wretched enough, where, in a truckle-bed, were stretched two bodies covered with a rug, the heads belonging to which were amicably deposited upon the same heap of hay. The one was the black shock head of the groom, the other graced with a long thrum night-cap, showed a grizzled pair and a grave countenance, which the hook nose and lantern-jaw proclaimed to belong to the Celtic minister of god and cheer, whose praises he had heard sung forth on the preceding evening. These worthies seemed to have slumbered in the arms of Bacchus as well as of Belphegor, for there were broken flasks on the floor; and their deep snoring alone showed that they were alive.

Bent upon resuming his journey, as duty and expedience alike dictated, Julian next descended the staircase, and essayed a door at the bottom of the steps. It was fastened within. He called—no answer was returned. It must be, he thought, the apartment of the revellers, now probably sleeping as soundly as their dependants still slumbered, and as he himself had done a few minutes before. Should he awake them? To what purpose? They were men with whom accident had involved him against his own will; and, situated as he was, he thought it wise to take the earliest opportunity of breaking off from society which was suspicious, and might be perilous.

* This was the hangman of the day at Tyburn. He was one quarter of Gregory Sunden, who was by getting believed to be the man who dropped the axe upon Charles I., though others were disposed of being the actual regicide.

minating thus, he essayed another door, which admitted him to a bed-room, where lay another harmonious slumberer. The mean utensils, pewter measures, empty cans and casks, with which this room was lumbered, proclaimed it that of the host, who was surrounded by his professional implements of hospitality and stock in trade.

This discovery relieved Peveril from some delicate embarrassment which he had formerly entertained.

He put upon the table a piece of money, sufficient, he judged, to pay his share of the preceding night's reckoning; not caring to be indebted for his entertainment to the strangers, whom he was leaving without the formality of an adieu.

His conscience cleared of this gentlemanlike scruple, Peveril proceeded with a light heart, though somewhat at a dizzy head, to the stable, which he easily recognised among a few other paltry outhouses. His horse, refreshed with rest, and perhaps not unmindful of his services the evening before, neighed as his master entered the stable; and Peveril accepted the sound as an omen of a prosperous journey. He paid augury with a sieveful of corn; and, while his horse profited by his attention, walked into the fresh air to cool his heated blood, and consider what course should pursue in order to reach the Castle of Martindale before sunset. His acquaintance with the country in general, gave him confidence that he could not have greatly deviated from the nearest road; and, as his horse in good condition, he conceived he might easily reach Martindale before nightfall.

Having adjusted his route in his mind, he returned to the stable to prepare his steed for the journey, and soon led him into the ruinous court-yard of the castle, bridled, saddled, and ready to be mounted. But Peveril's hand was upon the mane, and his left foot in the stirrup, a hand touched his cloak, and the voice of Ganlesse said, "What, Master Peveril, is this your foreign breeding? or have you learned in France to take French leave of your friends?"

Julian started like a guilty thing, although a moment's reflection assured him that he was neither wrong nor in danger. "I cared not to disturb you," said, "although I did come as far as the door of your chamber. I supposed your friend and you might retire, after our last night's revel, rather sleep than remonny. I left my own bed, though a rough one, with more reluctance than usual; and as my occasions oblige me to be an early traveller, I thought it best to depart without leave-taking. I have left a key for mine host, on the table of his apartment."

"It was unnecessary," said Ganlesse; "the rascal already overpaid.—But are you not rather premature in your purpose of departing? My mind tells me that Master Julian Peveril had better proceed with care to London, than turn aside for any purpose whatever. You may see already that I am no ordinary reasoner, but a master-spirit of the time. For the blackoo I travel with, and whom I indulge in his profligate follies, he also has his uses. But you are of a different cast; and I not only would serve you, but even wish you to be my own."

Julian gazed on this singular person when he spoke. He had already said his figure was mean and slight, with very ordinary and unmarked features, unless we were to distinguish the lightnings of a keen gray eye, which corresponded, in its careless and prideful glance, with the haughty superiority which the stranger assumed in his conversation. It was not till after a momentary pause, that Julian replied, "Can you wonder, sir, that in my circumstances—if they are indeed known to you so well as they seem—I should decline unnecessary confidence on the affairs of a moment which have called me hither, or refuse the company of a stranger, who assigns no reason for airing mine?"

"Be it as you list, young man," answered Ganlesse; "only remember hereafter, you had a fair offer—it is not every one to whom I would have made it. If we could meet hereafter, on other, and on worse terms, put it to yourself, and not to me."

"I understand not your threat," answered Peveril, "a threat be indeed implied. I have done no evil—I feel no apprehension—and I cannot, in common sense, conceive why I should suffer for refusing my confidence to a stranger, who seems to require that I should submit me blindfold to his guidance."

"Farewell, then, Sir Julian of the Peak—that may soon be," said the stranger, removing the hand which he had as yet left carelessly on the horse's bridle.

"How mean you by that phrase?" said Julian; "and why apply such a title to me?"

The stranger smiled, and only answered, "Here our conference ends. The way is before you. You will find it longer and rougher than that by which I would have guided you."

So saying, Ganlesse turned his back and walked towards the house. On the threshold he turned about once more, and seeing that Peveril had not yet moved from the spot, he again smiled and beckoned to him; but Julian, recalled by that sign to recollection, spurred his horse, and set forward on his journey.

It was not long ere his local acquaintance with the country enabled him to regain the road to Martindale, from which he had diverged on the preceding evening for about two miles. But the roads, or rather the paths of this wild country, so much satirized by their native poet, Cotton, were so complicated in some places, so difficult to be traced in others, and so unfit for hasty travelling in almost all, that, in spite of Julian's utmost exertions, and though he made no longer delay upon the journey than was necessary to bait his horse at a small hamlet through which he passed at noon, it was nightfall ere he reached an eminence, from which, an hour sooner, the battlements of Martindale Castle would have been visible; and where, when they were hid in night, their situation was indicated by a light constantly maintained in a lofty tower, called the Warder's Turret; and which domestic beacon had acquired, through all the neighbourhood, the name of Peveril's Pole-star.

This was regularly kindled at curfew toll, and supplied with as much wood and charcoal as maintained the light till sunrise; and at no period was the ceremonial omitted, saving during the space intervening between the death of a Lord of the Castle and his interment. When this last event had taken place, the nightly beacon was rekindled with some ceremony, and continued till fate called the successor to sleep with his fathers. It is not known from what circumstance the practice of maintaining this light originally sprung. Tradition spoke of it doubtfully. Some thought it was the signal of general hospitality, which, in ancient times, guided the wandering knight, or the weary pilgrim, to rest and refreshment. Others spoke of it as a "love-lighted watch-fire," by which the provident anxiety of a former lady of Martindale guided her husband homeward through the terrors of a midnight storm. The less favourable construction of unfriendly neighbours of the dissenting persuasion, ascribed the origin and continuance of this practice, to the assuming pride of the family of Peveril, who thereby chose to intimate their ancient suzeraineté over the whole country, in the manner of the admiral, who carries the lantern in the poop, for the guidance of the fleet. And in the former times, our old friend, Master Solsgrace, dealt from the pulpit many a hard hit against Sir Geoffrey, as he that had raised his horn and set up his candlestick on high. Certain it is, that all the Peverils, from father to son, had been especially attentive to the maintenance of this custom, as something intimately connected with the dignity of their family; and in the hands of Sir Geoffrey, the observance was not likely to be omitted.

Accordingly, the polar-star of Peveril had continued to beam more or less brightly during all the vicissitudes of the Civil War; and glimmered, however faintly, during the subsequent period of Sir Geoffrey's depression. But he was often heard to say, and sometimes to swear, that while there was a perch of woodland left to the estate, the old beacon-grate should not lack replenishing. All this his son Julian well knew; and therefore it was with no ordinary feelings of surprise and anxiety, that looking in the direction of the Castle, he perceived that the light was not visible. He halted—rubbed his eyes—shifted his position—and endeavoured, in vain, to persuade himself that he had mistaken the point from which the polar-star of his house was visible, or that some newly intervening obstacle, the growth of a plantation, perhaps, or the erection of some building, intercepted the light of the beacon. But a moment's reflection assured him, that from the high and free situation which Martindale-Castle bore in reference to the surrounding country, this could not have taken place; and the inference necessarily forced itself upon his mind, that Sir Geoffrey, his father, was either deceased, or that the family must have been disturbed by some strange calamity under the pressure of which their wonted custom and solemn usage had been neglected.

Under the influence of undefinable apprehension, young Peveril now struck the spurs into his jaded steed, and forcing him down the broken and steep path at a pace which set safety at defiance, he arrived at the village of Martindale-Moultrassie, eagerly desirous to ascertain the cause of this ominous eclipse. The street, through which his tired horse paced slow and reluctantly, was now deserted and empty; and scarcely a candle twinkled from a casement, except from the latticed window of the little inn, called the Peveril Arms, from which a broad light shone, and several voices were heard in rude festivity.

Before the door of this inn, the jaded palfrey, guided by the instinct or experience which makes a hackney well acquainted with the outside of a house of entertainment, made so sudden and determined a pause, that, notwithstanding his haste, the rider thought it best to dismount, expecting to be readily supplied with a fresh horse by Roger Raine, the landlord, the ancient dependant of his family. He also wished to relieve his anxiety, by inquiring concerning the state of things at the Castle, when he was surprised to hear, bursting from the tap-room of the loyal old host, a well known song of the Commonwealth time, which some puritanical wag had written in reprehension of the Cavaliers, and their dissolute courses, and in which his father came in for a lash of the satirist.

"Ye thought in the world there was no power to tame ye,
So you tipp'd and drabb'd till the saints overcame ye;
'Forsooth,' and 'Ne'er stir,' sir, have vanquish'd 'G—d—n me,'

Which nobody can deny.

"There was bluff old Sir Geoffrey loved brandy and mum well,
And to see a beer glass turn'd over the thumb well;
But he fled like the wind, before Fairfax and Cromwell,
Which nobody can deny.

Some strange revolution, Julian was aware, must have taken place, both in the village, and in the Castle, ere these sounds of unseemly insult could have been poured forth in the very inn which was decorated with the armorial bearings of his family; and not knowing how far it might be advisable to intrude on these unfriendly revellers, without the power of repelling or chastising their insolence, he led his horse to a back-door, which, as he recollected, communicated with the landlord's apartment, having determined to make private inquiry of him concerning the state of matters at the Castle. He knocked repeatedly, and as often called on Roger Raine with an earnest but stilled voice. At length a female voice replied, by the usual inquiry, "Who is there?"

"It is I, Dame Raine—I, Julian Peveril—tell your husband to come to me presently."

"Alack, and a well-a-day, Master Julian, if it be really you—you are to know my poor Goodman has gone where he can come to no one; but, doubtless, we shall all go to him, as Matthew Chamberlain says."

"He is dead, then?" said Julian. "I am extremely sorry"—

"Dead six months and more, Master Julian; and let me tell you, it is a long time for a lone woman, as Matt Chamberlain says."

"Well, do you or your chamberlain undo the door. I want a fresh horse, and I want to know how things are at the Castle."

"The Castle—lack-a-day!—Chamberlain—Matthew Chamberlain—I say, Matt!"

Matt Chamberlain apparently was at no great distance, for he presently answered her call; and Peveril, as he stood close to the door, could hear them whispering to each other, and distinguish in a great measure what they said. And here it may be noticed that Dame Raine, accustomed to submit to the authority of old Roger, who vindicated as well the husband's domestic prerogative, as that of the monarch in the state, had, when left a buxom widow, been so far incommoded by the exercise of her newly acquired independence, that she had recourse, upon all occasions, to the advice of Matt Chamberlain; and as Matt began no longer to go slipshod, and in a red nightcap, but wore Spanish shoes, and a high-crowned beaver, (at least of a Sunday,) and moreover was called Master Matthew, by his fellow-servants, the neighbours in the village argued a speedy change of the name on the sign-post; nay, perhaps, of the very sign itself, for Matthew was a bit of a Puritan, and no friend to Peveril of the Peak.

"Now counsel me, an you be a man, Matt Chamberlain," said Widow Raine; "for never stir, if here be not Master Julian's own self, and he wants a horse, and what not, and all as if things were as they wont to be."

"Why, dame, an ye will walk by my counsel," said the Chamberlain, "e'en shake him off—let him be jogging while his boots are green. This is no world for folks to scald their fingers in other folks' broth."

"And that is well spoken, truly," answered Dame Raine; "but then, look you, Matt, we have eaten their bread, and, as my poor Goodman used to say"—

"Nay, nay, dame, they that walk by the counsel of the dead, shall have none of the living; and so you may do as you list; but if you will walk by mine, drop latch, and draw bolt, and bid him seek quarters farther—that is my counsel."

"I desire nothing of you, sirrah," said Peveril. "save but to know how Sir Geoffrey and his lady do?"

"Lack-a-day!—lack-a-day!" in a tone of sympathy, was the only answer he received from the landlady; and the conversation betwixt her and her chamberlain was resumed, but in a tone too low to be overheard.

At length, Matt Chamberlain spoke aloud, and with a tone of authority: "We undo no doors at this time of night, for it is against the Justices' orders, and might cost us our license; and for the Castle, the road up to it lies before you, and I think you know it as well as we do."

"And I know you," said Peveril, remounting his wearied horse, "for an ungrateful churl, whom, on the first opportunity, I will assuredly cudgel to a mummy."

To this menace Matthew made no reply, and Peveril presently heard him leave the apartment, after a few earnest words betwixt him and his mistress.

Impatient at this delay, and at the evil omen implied in these people's conversation and deportment, Peveril, after some vain spurring of his horse, which positively refused to move a step farther, dismounted once more, and was about to pursue his journey on foot, notwithstanding the extreme disadvantage under which the high riding-boots of the period laid those who attempted to walk with such encumbrances, when he was stopped by a gentle call from the window.

Her counsellor was no sooner gone, than the good-nature and habitual veneration of the dame for the house of Peveril, and perhaps some fear for her counsellor's bones, induced her to open the casement, and cry, but in a low and timid tone, "Hist! hist! Master Julian—be you gone?"

"Not yet, dame," said Julian; "though it seems my stay is unwelcome."

"Nay, but good young master, it is because men counsel so differently; for here was my poor old Roger Raine would have thought the chimney-corner too cold for you; and here is Matt Chamberlain thinks the cold court-yard is warm enough."

mind that dame," said Julian; "do but tell me what has happened at Martindale Castle? The beacon is extinguished."

"A troth?—ay, like enough—then good Sir Geoffrey is gone to Heaven with my old Roger."

"Heaven!" exclaimed Peveril; "when was he taken ill?"

"As I know of," said the dame; "but, a few hours since, arrived a party at the Castle, coats and bandoleers, and one of the Parliamentarians, like in Oliver's time. My old Roger would have shut the gates of the inn against them, as he is in the churchyard, and Matt says it is for; and so they came in and refreshed men and sent for Master Bridgenorth, that is at the Hall even now; and so they went up to the room, and there was a fray, it is like, as the old saying is, no man to take napping, as poor Roger would say. Always the officers had the best reason there is, since they had law of their side, as Matthew says. But since the pole-star is out, as your honour says, why, doubtless, a gentleman is dead."

"Heaven!—Dear Dame, for love or gold, will you send a horse to make for the Castle?"

"The Roundheads, my old Roger called them, will kill you as they kill your father! Better creep into the wood—I will send Bett with a blanket and some straw—my old Dobbin stands in the little stable the hen-coop—c'en take him, and make your way out of the country, for there is no more for you. Hear what songs some of them sing at the tap!—so take Dobbin, and do not leave your own horse instead."

"I waited to hear no farther, only, that just as he was to go off to the stable, the compassionate dame heard to exclaim,—'O Lord! what will the Chamberlain say?' but instantly added, 'say what he will, I may dispose of what's in a haste of a double-ford hostler did Julian find the equipments of his jaded brute with poor Dobbin stood quietly tugging at his rackful of straw, as if dreaming of the business which was destined for him. Notwithstanding the remoteness of the place, Julian succeeded marvellously in preparing for his journey; and leaving his horse to find its way to Dobbin's rack by instinct, upon his new acquisition, and spurred him straight to the hill, which rises steeply from the foot of the Castle. Dobbin, little accustomed to such a load, snorted, panted, and trotted as briskly as he could, until at length he brought his rider before the gate of his father's ancient seat.

The door was now rising, but the portal was hidden by its beams, being situated as we have mentioned, in a deep recess betwixt two large pillars. Peveril dismounted, turned his horse round, and advanced to the gate, which, contrary to expectation, he found open. He entered the large hall; and could then perceive that lights yet shone in the lower part of the building, although he had before observed them, owing to the height of the walls. The main door, or great hall-door, as it was called, was, since the partially decayed family, seldom opened, save on occasions of great ceremony. A smaller postern door served as an ordinary entrance; and to that Julian had come. This also was open—a circumstance which would of itself have alarmed him, had he not been so many causes for apprehension. His horse stood within him as he turned to the left, through the ward hall, towards the great parlour, which was usually occupied as a sitting apartment; but now became still greater, when, on a nearer approach, he heard proceeding from thence the murmur of voices. He threw the door of the apartment open, and the sight which was thus displayed, all the evil bodings which he had enter-of him stood the old Knight, whose arms were firmly secured, over the elbows, by a leathern belt drawn tight round them, and made fast behind; two ruffianly-looking men, apparently his guards, had hold of his doublet. The scabbardless sword which lay on the floor, and the empty sheath which hung by Sir Geoffrey's side, showed the stout old Cavalier had not been reduced to this state of bondage without an attempt at resistance. Two or three persons, having their backs turned towards Julian, sat round a table, and appeared engaged in writing—the voices which he had heard were theirs, as they murmured to each other. Lady Peveril—the emblem of death, so pallid was her countenance—stood at the distance of a yard or two from her husband, upon whom her eyes were fixed with an intenseness of gaze, like that of one who looks her last on the object which she loves the best. She was the first to perceive Julian; and she exclaimed, "Merciful Heaven!—my son!—the misery of our house is complete!"

"My son!" echoed Sir Geoffrey, starting from the sullen state of dejection, and swearing a deep oath—"thou art come in the right time, Julian. Strike me one good blow—cleave me that traitorous thief from the crown to the brisket! and that done, I care not what comes next."

The sight of his father's situation made the son forget the inequality of the contest which he was about to provoke.

"Villains," he said, "unhand him!" and, rushing on the guards with his drawn sword, compelled them to let go Sir Geoffrey, and stand on their own defence.

Sir Geoffrey thus far liberated, shouted to his lady, "Undo the belt, dame, and we will have three good blows for it yet—they must fight well that beat both father and son!"

But one of those men who had started up from the writing-table when the fray commenced, prevented Lady Peveril from rendering her husband this assistance; while another easily mastered the hampered Knight, though not without receiving several severe kicks from his heavy boots—his condition permitting him no other mode of defence. A third, who saw that Julian, young, active, and animated with the fury of a son who fights for his parents, was compelling the two guards to give ground, seized on his collar, and attempted to master his sword. Suddenly dropping that weapon, and snatching one of his pistols, Julian fired it at the head of the person by whom he was thus assailed. He did not drop, but, staggering back as if he had received a severe blow, showed Peveril, as he sunk into a chair, the features of old Bridgenorth, blackened with the explosion, which had even set fire to a part of his gray hair. A cry of astonishment escaped from Julian; and in the alarm and horror of the moment, he was easily secured and disarmed by those with whom he had been at first engaged.

"Heed it not, Julian," said Sir Geoffrey; "heed it not, my brave boy—that shot has balanced all accounts!—but how—what the devil—he lives!—Was your pistol loaded with chaff? or has the foul fiend given him proof against lead?"

There was some reason for Sir Geoffrey's surprise, since, as he spoke, Major Bridgenorth collected himself—sat up in the chair as one who recovers from a stunning blow—then rose, and wiping with his handkerchief the marks of the explosion from his face, he approached Julian, and said, in the same cold unaltered tone in which he usually expressed himself, "Young man, you have reason to bless God, who has this day saved you from the commission of a great crime."

"Bless the devil, ye crop-eared knave!" exclaimed Sir Geoffrey; "for nothing less than the father of all fanatics saved your brains from being blown about like the rinsings of Beelzebub's porridge-pot!"

"Sir Geoffrey," said Major Bridgenorth, "I have already told you, that with you I will hold no argument; for to you I am not accountable for any of my actions."

"Master Bridgenorth," said the lady, making a strong effort to speak, and to speak with calmness, "whatever revenge your Christian state of conscience may permit you to take on my husband—I—I, who have some right to experience compassion at your hand, for most sincerely did I compassionate you when the hand of Heaven was heavy on you—I implore you not to involve my son in our common ruin!—Let the destruction of the father and mother, with the ruin of our ancient house, satisfy your resentment for any wrong which you have ever received at my husband's hand."

"Hold your peace, housewife," said the Knight; "you speak like a fool, and meddle with what concerns you not.—Wrong at my hand? The cowardly knave has ever had but even too much right. Had I cudgelled the cur soundly when he first bayed at me, the cowardly mongrel had been now crouching at my feet, instead of flying at my throat. But if I get through this action, as I have got through worse weather, I will pay off old scores, as far as tough crab-tree and cold iron will bear me out."

"Sir Geoffrey," replied Bridgenorth, "if the birth you boast of has made you blind to better principles, it might have at least taught you civility. What do you complain of? I am a magistrate; and I execute a warrant, addressed to me by the first authority in the state. I am a creditor also of yours; and law arms me with powers to recover my own property from the hands of an improvident debtor."

"You a magistrate!" said the Knight; "much such a magistrate as Noll was a monarch. Your heart is up, I warrant, because you have the King's pardon; and are replaced on the bench, forsooth, to persecute the poor Papist. There was never turmoil in the state, but knaves had their vantage by it—never pot boiled, but the scum was cast uppermost."

"For God's sake, my dearest husband," said Lady Peveril, "cease this wild talk! It cannot but incense Master Bridgenorth, who might otherwise consider, that in common charity"—

"Incense him!" said Sir Geoffrey, impatiently interrupting her; "God's-death, madam, you will drive me mad! Have you lived so long in this world, and yet expect consideration and charity from an old starved wolf like that? And if he had it, do you think that I, or you, madam, as my wife, are subjects for his charity?—Julian, my poor fellow, I am sorry thou hast come so unluckily, since thy petronel was not better loaded—but thy credit is lost for ever as a marksman."

This angry colloquy passed so rapidly on all sides, that Julian, scarce recovered from the extremity of astonishment with which he was overwhelmed at finding himself suddenly plunged into a situation of such extremity, had no time to consider in what way he could most effectually act for the succour of his parents. To speak Bridgenorth fair, seemed the more prudent course; but to this his pride could hardly stoop; yet he forced himself to say, with as much calmness as he could assume, "Master Bridgenorth, since you act as a magistrate, I desire to be treated according to the laws of England; and demand to know of what we are accused, and by whose authority we are arrested?"

"Here is another howlet for ye!" exclaimed the impetuous old Knight; "his mother speaks to a Puritan of charity; and thou must talk of law to a roundheaded rebel, with a wannion to you! What warrant hath he, think ye, beyond the Parliament's or the devil's?"

"Who speaks of the Parliament?" said a person entering, whom Peveril recognised as the official person whom he had before seen at the horse-dealer's, and who now bustled in with all the conscious dignity of plenary authority,— "Who talks of the Parliament?" he exclaimed. "I promise you, enough has been found in this house to convict twenty plotters—Here be arms, and that good store. Bring them in, Captain."

"The very same," exclaimed the Captain, approaching, "which I mention in my printed Narrative of Information, lodged before the Honourable House of Commons; they were commissioned from old Vander Huys of Rotterdam, by orders of Don John of Austria, for the service of the Jesuits."

"Now, by this light," said Sir Geoffrey, "they are the pikes, musketoons, and pistols, that have been hidden in the garret ever since Naseby fight!"

"And here," said the Captain's yoke-fellow, rett, "are proper priest's trappings—antiphonera, missals, and copes, I warrant you—ay, and pictures, too, for Papists to mutter and bow over."

"Now plague on thy snuffling whine," said Geoffrey; "here is a rascal will swear my mother's old farthingale to be priest's vestments, the story book of Owlenspiegel, a Popish missal!"

"But how's this, Master Bridgenorth?" said ham, addressing the magistrate; "your honour been as busy as we have; and you have caught an knave while we recovered these toys."

"I think, sir," said Julian, "if you look into warrant, which, if I mistake not, names the per whom you are directed to arrest, you will find have no title to apprehend me."

"Sir," said the officer, puffing with importunity, "I do not know who you are; but I would you the best man in England, that I might teach you respect due to the warrant of the House. Sir, steps not the man within the British seas, but I arrest him on authority of this bit of parchment; I do arrest you accordingly.—What do you at him of, gentlemen?"

Dangerfield swaggered forward, and peeping up Julian's hat, "Stop my vital breath," he exclaimed, "but I have seen you before, my friend, an I c but think where; but my memory is not worth a l since I have been obliged to use it so much of la the behalf of the poor state. But I do know the low; and I have seen him amongst the Papists take that on my assured damnation."

"Why, Captain Dangerfield," said the Captain, "smoother, but more dangerous associate,— "ver is the same youth whom we saw at the horse-chant's yesterday; and we had matter against then, only Master Topham did not desire us to l it out."

"Ye may bring out what ye will against him n said Topham, "for he hath blasphemed the wai of the House. I think ye said ye saw him a where?"

"Ay, verily," said Everett, "I have seen amongst the seminary pupils at Saint Omer's was who but he with the regents there."

"Nay, Master Everett, collect yourself," said ham; "for, as I think, you said you saw him consult of the Jesuits in London."

"It was I said so, Master Topham," said the daunted Dangerfield; "and mine is the tongue will swear it."

"Good Master Topham," said Bridgenorth, "may suspend farther inquiry at present, as it but fatigue and perplex the memory of the K witnesses."

"You are wrong, Master Bridgenorth—cl wrong. It doth but keep them in wind-breathes them like greyhounds before a cou match."

"Be it so," said Bridgenorth, with his usual i ference of manner; "but at present this youth stand committed upon a warrant, which I will sently sign, of having assaulted me while in discl of my duty as a magistrate, for the rescue of a son legally attached. Did you not hear the rep a pistol?"

"I will swear to it," said Everett.

"And I," said Dangerfield. "While we making search in the cellar, I heard something like a pistol-shot; but I conceived it to be the d ing of a long-corked bottle of sack, to see wh there were any Popish relics, in the inside on't."

"A pistol-shot!" exclaimed Topham; "here r have been a second Sir Edmondsbury Godfrey's ter.—Oh, thou real spawn of the red old dragon he too would have resisted the House's wai had we not taken him something at unawares.— ter Bridgenorth, you are a judicious magistrate, worthy servant of the state—I would we had i such sound Protestant justices. Shall I have young fellow away with his parents—what you?—or will you keep him for re-examination?"

"Master Bridgenorth," said Lady Peveril, in of her husband's efforts to interrupt her, "for C sake, if ever you knew what it was to love one of the many children you have lost, or her who is now left to you, do not pursue your vengeance to the blood of my poor boy! I will forgive you all the rest—all the distress you have wrought—all the yet greater misery with which you threaten us; but do not be extreme with one who never can have offended you! Believe, that if your ears are shut against the cry of a despairing mother, those which are open to the complaint of all who sorrow, will hear my petition and your answer!"

The agony of mind and of voice with which Lady Peveril uttered these words, seemed to thrill through all present, though most of them were but too much inured to such scenes. Every one was silent, when, ceasing to speak, she fixed on Bridgenorth her eyes, glistening with tears, with the eager anxiety of one whose life or death seemed to depend upon the answer to be returned. Even Bridgenorth's inflexibility seemed to be shaken; and his voice was tremulous, as he answered, "Madam, I would to God I had the present means of relieving your great distress, otherwise than by recommending to you a reliance upon Providence; and that you take heed to your spirit, that it murmur not under this crook in your lot. For me, I am but as a rod in the hand of the strong man, which smites not of itself, but because it is wielded by the arm of him who holds the same."

"Even as I and my black rod are guided by the Commons of England," said Master Topham, who seemed marvellously pleased with the illustration.

Julian now thought it time to say something in his own behalf; and he endeavoured to temper it with as much composure as it was possible for him to assume. "Master Bridgenorth," he said, "I neither dispute your authority, nor this gentleman's warrant."

"You do not?" said Topham. "O ho, master youngster, I thought we should bring you to your senses presently!"

"Then, if you so will it, Master Topham," said Bridgenorth, "thus it shall be. You shall set out with early day, taking with you, towards London, the persons of Sir Geoffrey and Lady Peveril; and that they may travel according to their quality, you will allow them their coach, sufficiently guarded."

"I will travel with them myself," said Topham; "for these rough Derbyshire roads are no easy riding; and my very eyes are weary with looking on these bleak hills. In the coach I can sleep as sound as if I were in the House, and Master Bodderbrains on his legs."

"It will become you so to take your ease, Master Topham," answered Bridgenorth. "For this youth, I will take him under my charge, and bring him up myself."

"I may not be answerable for that, worthy Master Bridgenorth," said Topham, "since he comes within the warrant of the House."

"Nay, but," said Bridgenorth, "he is only under custody for an assault, with the purpose of a rescue; and I counsel you against meddling with him, unless you have stronger guard. Sir Geoffrey is now old and broken, but this young fellow is in the flower of his youth, and hath at his beck all the debauched young Cavaliers of the neighbourhood—You will scarce cross the country without a rescue."

Topham eyed Julian wistfully, as a spider may be supposed to look upon a stray wasp which has got into his web, and which he longs to secure, though he fears the consequences of attempting him.

Julian himself replied, "I know not if this separation be well or ill meant on your part, Master Bridgenorth; but on mine, I am only desirous to share the fate of my parents; and therefore I will give my word of honour to attempt neither rescue nor escape, on condition you do not separate me from them."

"Do not say so, Julian," said his mother; "abide with Master Bridgenorth—my mind tells me he cannot mean so ill by us as his rough conduct would now lead us to infer."

"And I," said Sir Geoffrey, "know, that between the doors of my father's house and the gates of hell, there steps not such a villain on the ground! And if I wish my hands ever to be unbound again, it is because I hope for one downright blow at a gray head, that has hatched more treason than the whole Long Parliament."

"Away with thee!" said the zealous officer; "is Parliament a word for so foul a mouth as thine?—Gentlemen," he added, turning to Everett and Dangerfield, "you will bear witness to this."

"To his having reviled the House of Commons—by G—d, that I will!" said Dangerfield; "I will take it on my damnation."

"And verily," said Everett, "as he spoke of Parliament generally, he hath even contemned the House of Lords also."

"Why, ye poor insignificant wretches," said Sir Geoffrey, "whose very life is a lie—and whose bread is perjury—would you pervert my innocent words almost as soon as they have quitted my lips? I tell you the country is well weary of you; and should Englishmen come to their senses, the jail, the pillory, the whipping-post, and the gibbet, will be too good preferment for such base blood-suckers.—And now, Master Bridgenorth, you and they may do your worst; for I will not open my mouth to utter a single word while I am in the company of such knaves."

"Perhaps, Sir Geoffrey," answered Bridgenorth, "you would better have consulted your own safety in adopting that resolution a little sooner—the tongue is a little member, but it causes much strife.—You, Master Julian, will please to follow me, and without remonstrance or resistance; for you must be aware that I have the means of compelling."

Julian was, indeed, but too sensible, that he had no other course but that of submission to superior force; but ere he left the apartment, he kneeled down to receive his father's blessing, which the old man bestowed not without a tear in his eye, and in the emphatic words, "God bless thee, my boy; and keep thee good and true to Church and King, whatever wind shall bring foul weather!"

His mother was only able to pass her hand over his head, and to implore him, in a low tone of voice, not to be rash or violent in any attempt to render them assistance. "We are innocent," she said, "my son—we are innocent—and we are in God's hands. Be the thought our best comfort and protection."

Bridgenorth now signed to Julian to follow him, which he did, accompanied, or rather conducted, by the two guards who had first disarmed him. When they had passed from the apartment, and were at the door of the outward hall, Bridgenorth asked Julian whether he should consider him as under parole; in which case, he said, he would dispense with all other security but his own promise.

Peveril, who could not help hoping somewhat from the favourable and unresentful manner in which he was treated by one whose life he had so recently attempted, replied, without hesitation, that he would give his parole for twenty-four hours, neither to attempt to escape by force nor by flight.

"It is wisely said," replied Bridgenorth; "for though you might cause bloodshed, be assured that your utmost efforts could do no service to your parents.—Horses there—horses to the court-yard!"

The trampling of the horses was soon heard; and in obedience to Bridgenorth's signal, and in compliance with his promise, Julian mounted one which was presented to him, and prepared to leave the house of his fathers, in which his parents were now prisoners, and to go, he knew not whither, under the custody of one known to be the ancient enemy of his family. He was rather surprised at observing, that Bridgenorth and he were about to travel without any other attendants.

When they were mounted, and as they rode slowly towards the outer gate of the court-yard, Bridgenorth said to him, "It is not every one who would thus unreservedly commit his safety, by travelling at night, and unaided, with the hot-brained youth who so lately attempted his life."

"Master Bridgenorth," said Julian, "I might tell you truly that I knew you not at the time when I directed my weapon against you; but I must also add, that the cause in which I used it might have rendered me even had I known you, a slight respecter of your person. At present, I do know you; and have neither malice against your person, nor the liberty of a parent to fight for. Besides, you have my word; and when was a Peveril known to break it?"

"Ay," replied his companion, "a Peveril—a Peveril of the Peak!—a name which has long sounded like a war-trumpet in the land; but which has now perhaps sounded its last note. Look back, young man, on the darksome turrets of your father's house, which uplift themselves as proudly on the brow of the hill, as their owners raised themselves above the sons of their people. Think upon your father, a captive—yourself, in some sort, a fugitive—your light quenched—your glory abased—your estate wrecked and impoverished. Think that Providence has subjected the destinies of the race of Peveril to one, whom, in their aristocratic pride, they held as a plebeian upstart.—Think of this; and when you again boast of your ancestry, remember, that he who raiseth the lowly, can also abase the high in heart."

Julian did indeed gaze for an instant, with a swelling heart, upon the dimly-seen turrets of his paternal mansion, on which poured the moonlight, mixed with long shadows of the towers and trees. But while he sadly acknowledged the truth of Bridgenorth's observation, he felt indignant at his ill-timed triumph. "If fortune had followed worth," he said, "the Castle of Martindale, and the name of Peveril, had afforded no room for their enemy's vainglorious boast. But those who have stood high on Fortune's wheel, must abide by the consequence of its revolutions. Thus much I will at least say for my father's house, that it has not stood unhonoured; nor will it fall—if it is to fall—unlamented. Forbear, then, if you are indeed the Christian you call yourself, to exult in the misfortunes of others, or to confide in your own prosperity. If the light of our house be now quenched, God can rekindle it in his own good time."

Peveril broke off in extreme surprise; for as he spoke the last words, the bright red beams of the family beacon began again to glimmer from its wonted watch-tower, checkering the pale moon-beam with a ruddier glow. Bridgenorth also gazed on this unexpected illumination with surprise, and not, as it seemed, without disquietude. "Young man," he resumed, "it can scarcely be but that Heaven intends to work great things by your hand, so singularly has that augury followed on your words."

So saying, he put his horse once more in motion; and looking back, from time to time, as if to assure himself that the beacon of the Castle was actually rekindled, he led the way through the well-known paths and alleys, to his own house of Moultrassie, followed by Peveril, who, although sensible that the light might be altogether accidental, could not but receive as a good omen an event so intimately connected with the traditions and usages of his family.

They alighted at the hall-door, which was hastily opened by a female; and while the deep tone of Bridgenorth called on the groom to take their horses, the well-known voice of his daughter Alice was heard to exclaim in thanksgiving to God, who had restored her father in safety.

CHAPTER XXIV.

We meet, as men see phantoms in a dream,
Which glide, and sigh, and sign, and move their lips,
But make no sound—or if they utter voice,
'Tis but a low and undistinguish'd moaning,
Which has nor word nor sense of utter'd sound.

The Chieftain.

We said, at the conclusion of the last chapter, that a female form appeared at the door of Moultrassie-Hall; and that the well-known accents of Alice Bridgenorth were heard to hail the return of her father, from what she naturally dreaded as a perilous visit to the Castle of Martindale.

Julian, who followed his conductor with a throbbing heart into the lighted hall, was therefore prepared to see her, whom he best loved, with her arms thrown around her father. The instant she had quitted his paternal embrace, she was aware of the unexpected guest who had returned in his company. A deep blush, rapidly succeeded by deadly paleness, and again by a slighter suffusion, showed plainly to her lover that his sudden appearance was any thing but indifferent to her. He bowed profoundly—a courtesy which she returned with equal formality, but did not venture to approach more nearly, feeling at once the delicacy of his own situation and of hers.

Major Bridgenorth turned his cold, fixed, gray, melancholy glance, first on the one of them, and then on the other. "Some," he said, gravely, "would, in my case, have avoided this meeting; but I have confidence in you both, although you are young, and beset with the snares incidental to your age. There are those within who should not know that ye have been acquainted. Wherefore, be wise, and be as strangers to each other."

Julian and Alice exchanged glances as her father turned from them, and lifting a lamp which stood in the entrance-hall, led the way to the interior apartment. There was little of consolation in this exchange of looks; for the sadness of Alice's glance was mingled with fear, and that of Julian clouded by an anxious sense of doubt. The look also was but momentary; for Alice, springing to her father, took the light out of his hand, and, stepping before him, acted as the usher of both into the large oaken parlour, which has been already mentioned as the apartment in which Bridgenorth had spent the hours of dejection which followed the death of his consort and family. It was now lighted up as for the reception of company; and five or six persons sat in it, in the plain, black, stiff dress, which was affected by the formal Puritans of the time, in evidence of their contempt of the manners of the luxurious Court of Charles the Second; amongst whom, excess of extravagance in apparel, like excess of every other kind, was highly fashionable.

Julian at first glanced his eyes but slightly along the range of grave and severe faces which composed this society—men, sincere perhaps in their pretensions to a superior purity of conduct and morals, but in whom that high praise was somewhat chastened by an affected austerity in dress and manners, allied to those Pharisees of old, who made broad their phylacteries, and would be seen of men to fast, and to discharge with rigid punctuality the observances of the law. Their dress was almost uniformly a black cloak and doublet, cut straight and close, and undecorated with lace or embroidery of any kind, black Flemish breeches and hose, square-toed shoes, with large roses made of serge ribbon. Two or three had huge loose boots of calf-leather, and almost every one was begirt with a long rapier, which was suspended by leathern thongs, to a plain belt of buff, or of black leather. One or two of the elder guests, whose hair had been thinned by time, had their heads covered with a skullcap of black silk or velvet, which being drawn down betwixt the ears and the skull, and permitting no hair to escape, occasioned the former to project in the ungraceful manner which may be remarked in old pictures, and which procured for the Puritans the term of "prickeared Roundheads," so unceremoniously applied to them by their contemporaries.

These worthies were ranged against the wall, each in his ancient, high-backed, long-legged chair; neither looking towards, nor apparently discoursing with each other; but plunged in their own reflections, or awaiting, like an assembly of Quakers, the quickening power of divine inspiration.

Major Bridgenorth glided along this formal society with noiseless step, and a composed severity of manner, resembling their own. He paused before each in succession, and apparently communicated, as he passed, the transactions of the evening, and the circumstances under which the heir of Martindale Castle was now a guest at Moultrassie-Hall. Each seemed to stir at his brief detail, like a range of statues in an enchanted hall, starting into something like life, as a talisman is applied to them successively. Most of them, as they heard the narrative of their host, cast upon Julian a look of curiosity, blended with haughty scorn and the consciousness of spiritual superiority; in one or two instances, the milder influences of passion were sufficiently visible.—Peveril would undergo this gauntlet of eyes with more impudence, had not his own been for the time engaged by the motions of Alice, who glided through the apartment; and only speaking very briefly, and sparingly, to one or two of the company who addressed her, took her place beside a treble-hooded old woman, the only female of the party, and addressed her in such earnest conversation, as might have been with her raising her head, or looking at any one in the company.

Her father put a question, to which she was obliged to give an answer—"Where was Mistress Deborah?"

"She had gone out," Alice replied, "early after noon, to visit some old acquaintances in the neighbourhood, and she had not yet returned."

Mr. Bridgenorth made a gesture indicative of assent; and, not content with that, expressed his determined resolution that Dame Deborah should no longer remain a member of his family. "I will have her go," he said aloud, and without regarding the presence of his guests, "and those only, around me, who will keep within the sober and modest bounds of a Christian family. Who pretends to more freedom, to go out from among us, as not being of us."

A low and emphatic humming noise, which was the time the mode in which the Puritans signified applause, as well of the doctrines expressed by the minister in the pulpit, as of those delivered at the society, ratified the approbation of the assembly, and seemed to secure the dismissal of the intruder.

The mate governante, who stood thus detected of having strayed out of bounds. Even Peveril, although he reaped considerable advantages, in his early acquaintance with Alice, from the mercenary and unkind disposition of her governess, could not hear her dismissal without approbation, so much was it true, that, in the hour of difficulty, which might approach, Alice might have the benefit of counsel and advice from one of her own sex, of better nature, and less suspicious probity, than Mistress Deborah.

Almost immediately after this communication had taken place, a servant in mourning showed his thin, wrinkled visage in the apartment, announcing with a voice more like a passing bell than the herald of a banquet, that refreshments were provided in an adjoining apartment. Gravely leading the way, with his daughter on one side, and the principal female whom we have distinguished on the other, Bridgenorth himself ushered his company, followed, with little attention to order or ceremony, into the eating-room, where a substantial repast was provided.

In this manner, Peveril, although entitled, according to the ordinary ceremonial, to some degree of precedence—higher at that time considered of much importance, though now little regarded—was left among the last of those who quitted the parlour; and might have brought up the rear of all, had not he been the company, who was himself late in the room, bowed and resigned to Julian the rank in the room which had been usurped by others.

The act of politeness naturally induced Julian to observe the features of the person who had offered him civility; and he started to observe, under the velvet cap, and above the short band, the countenance of Ganlesse, as he called him—his companion on the preceding evening. He looked again and again, especially when all were seated at the supper board, and when, consequently, he had frequent opportunities of observing this person. He did not, without any breach of good manners, waver in his belief, and was much disposed to doubt the reality of his recollection; for the difference of dress was such as to effect a complete change of appearance; and the countenance far from exhibiting any thing marked or memorable, was one of those ordinary visages which we most forget without remarking them, and which we do not remember so soon as the object is withdrawn from our eyes. But the impression upon his mind returned, and became stronger, until it induced him to watch with peculiar attention the manners of the individual who had thus attracted his notice.

During the time of a very prolonged grace before meat, which was delivered by one of the company—who from his Geneva band and serge doublet, presided, as Julian supposed, over some dissenting congregation—he noticed that this man kept the same demure and severe cast of countenance usually affected by the Puritans, which rather caricatured the reverence unquestionably due upon such occasions. His eyes were turned upward, and his huge penthouse hat, with a high crown and broad brim, held in both hands before him, rose and fell with the cadences of the speaker's voice; thus marking time, as it were, to the periods of the benediction. Yet when the slight bustle took place which attends the adjusting of chairs, &c., as men sit down to table, Julian's eye encountered that of the stranger; and as their looks met, there glanced from those of the latter, an expression of satirical humour and scorn, which seemed to intimate internal ridicule of the gravity of his present demeanour.

Julian again sought to fix his eye, in order to ascertain that he had not mistaken the tendency of this transient expression, but the stranger did not allow him another opportunity. He might have been discovered by the tone of his voice; but the individual in question spoke little, and in whispers, which was indeed the fashion of the whole company, whose demeanour at table resembled that of mourners at a funeral feast.

The entertainment itself was coarse, though plentiful; and must, according to Julian's opinion, be distasteful to one so exquisitely skilled in good cheer, and so capable of enjoying, critically and scientifically, the genial preparations of his companion Smith, as Ganlesse had shown himself on the preceding evening. Accordingly, upon close observation, he remarked that the food which he took upon his plate, remained there unconsumed; and that his actual supper consisted only of a crust of bread with a glass of wine.

The repast was hurried over with the haste of those who think it shame, if not sin, to make mere animal enjoyments the means of consuming time or of receiving pleasure; and when the men wiped their mouths and mustaches, Julian remarked, that the object of his curiosity used a handkerchief of the finest cambric—an article rather inconsistent with the exterior plainness, not to say coarseness, of his appearance. He used also several of the more minute refinements, then only observed at tables of higher rank; and Julian thought he could discern, at every turn, something of courtly manners and gestures, under the precise and rustic simplicity of the character which he had assumed.*

But if this were indeed that same Ganlesse with whom Julian had met on the preceding evening, and who had boasted the facility with which he could assume any character which he pleased to represent for the time, what could be the purpose of his present disguise? He was, if his own words could be credited, a person of some importance, who dared to defy the danger of those officers and informers, before whom all ranks at that time trembled; nor was he likely, as Julian conceived, without some strong purpose, to subject himself to such a masquerade as the present, which could not be otherwise than irksome to one whose conversation proclaimed him of light life and free opinions. Was his appearance here for good or for evil? Did it respect his father's house, or his own person, or the family of Bridgenorth? Was the real character of Ganlesse known to the master of the house, inflexible as he was in all which concerned morals as well as religion? If not, might not the machinations of a brain so subtle, affect the peace and happiness of Alice Bridgenorth?

These were questions which no reflection could enable Peveril to answer. His eyes glanced from Alice to the stranger; and new fears, and undefined suspicions, in which the safety of that beloved and lovely girl was implicated, mingled with the deep anxiety which already occupied his mind, on account of his father, and his father's house.

He was in this tumult of mind, when after a thanksgiving as long as the grace, the company arose from the table, and were instantly summoned to the exercise of family worship. A train of domestics, grave, sad, and melancholy as their superiors, glided in to assist at this act of devotion, and ranged themselves at the lower end of the apartment. Most of these men were armed with long tucks, as the straight stabbing swords, much used by Cromwell's soldiery, were then called. Several had large pistols also; and the corselets or cuirasses of some were heard to clank, as they seated themselves to partake in this act of devotion. The ministry of him whom Julian had supposed a preacher, was not used on this occasion. Major Bridgenorth himself read and expounded a chapter of Scripture, with much strength and manliness of expression, although so as not to escape the charge of fanaticism. The nineteenth chapter of Jeremiah was the portion of Scripture which he selected; in which, under the type of breaking a potter's vessel, the prophet presages the desolation of the Jews. The lecturer was not naturally eloquent; but a strong, deep, and sincere conviction of the truth of what he said, supplied him with language of energy and fire, as he drew a parallel between the abominations of the worship of Baal, and the corruptions of the Church of Rome—so favourite a topic with the Puritans of that period; and denounced against the Catholics, and those who favoured them, that hissing and desolation which the prophet directed against the city of Jerusalem. His hearers made a yet closer application than the lecturer himself suggested; and many a dark proud eye intimated, by a glance on Julian, that on his father's house were already, in some part, realized those dreadful maledictions.

The lecture finished, Bridgenorth summoned them to unite with him in prayer; and on a slight change of arrangements amongst the company, which took place as they were about to kneel down, Julian found his place next to the single-minded and beautiful object of his affection, as she knelt, in her loveliness, to adore her Creator. A short time was permitted for mental devotion; during which, Peveril could hear her half-breathed petition for the promised blessings of peace on earth, and good will towards the children of men.

The prayer which ensued was in a different tone. It was poured forth by the same person who had officiated as chaplain at the table; and was in the tone of a Boanerges, or Son of Thunder—a denouncer of crimes—an invoker of judgments—almost a prophet of evil and of destruction. The testimonies and the sins of the day were not forgotten—the mysterious murder of Sir Edmondsbury Godfrey was insisted upon—and thanks and praise were offered, that the very night on which they were assembled, had not seen another offering of a Protestant magistrate, to the blood-thirsty fury of the revengeful Catholics.

Never had Julian found it more difficult, during an act of devotion, to maintain his mind in a frame befitting the posture and the occasion; and when he heard the speaker return thanks for the downfall and devastation of his family, he was strongly tempted to have started upon his feet, and charged him with offering a tribute, stained with falsehood and calumny, at the throne of truth itself. He resisted, however, an impulse which it would have been insanity to have yielded to, and his patience was not without its reward, for when his fair neighbour arose from her knees, the lengthened and prolonged prayer being at last concluded, he observed that her eyes were streaming with tears; and one glance with which she looked at him in that moment, showed more of affectionate interest for him in his fallen fortunes and precarious condition, than he had been able to obtain from her when his worldly estate seemed so much the more exalted of the two.

Cheered and fortified with the conviction that one bosom in the company, and that in which he most eagerly longed to secure an interest, sympathized with his distress, he felt strong to endure whatever was to follow, and shrunk not from the stern still smile with which, one by one, the meeting regarded him, as gliding to their several places of repose. They indulged themselves at parting with a look of triumph on one, whom they considered as their captive enemy.

Alice also passed by her lover, her eyes fixed on the ground, and answered his low obeisance without raising them. The room was now empty, but for Bridgenorth and his guest, or prisoner; for it is difficult to say in which capacity Peveril ought to regard himself. He took an old brazen lamp from the table, and, leading the way, said at the same time, "I must be the uncourtly chamberlain, who am to usher you to a place of repose, more rude, perhaps, than you have been accustomed to occupy."

Julian followed him, in silence, up an old-fashioned winding staircase, within a turret. At the landing-place on the top, was a small apartment, where an ordinary pallet bed, two chairs, and a small stone table, were the only furniture. "Your bed," continued Bridgenorth, as if desirous to prolong their interview, "is not of the softest; but innocence sleeps as sound upon straw as on down."

"Sorrow, Major Bridgenorth, finds little rest on either," replied Julian. "Tell me, for you seem to await some question from me, what is to be the fate of my parents, and why you separate me from them?"

Bridgenorth, for answer, indicated with his finger the mark which his countenance still showed from the explosion of Julian's pistol.

"That," replied Julian, "is not the real cause of your proceedings against me. It cannot be, that you, who have been a soldier, and are a man, can be surprised or displeased by my interference in the defence of my father. Above all, you cannot, and I must needs say you do not, believe that I would have raised my hand against you personally, had there been a moment's time for recognition."

"I may grant all this," said Bridgenorth; "but what the better are you for my good opinion, or for the ease with which I can forgive you the injury which you aimed at me? You are in my custody as a magistrate, accused of abetting the foul, bloody, and heathenish plot, for the establishment of Popery, the murder of the King, and the general massacre of all true Protestants."

"And on what grounds, either of fact or suspicion, dare any one accuse me of such a crime?" said Julian. "I have hardly heard of the plot, save by the mouth of common rumour, which, while it speaks of nothing else, takes care to say nothing distinctly even on that subject."

"It may be enough for me to tell you," replied Bridgenorth, "and perhaps it is a word too much—that you are a discovered intriguer—a spied spy—who carries tokens and messages betwixt the Popish Countess of Derby, and the Catholic party in London. You have not conducted your matters with such discretion, but that this is well known, and can be sufficiently proved. To this charge, which you are well aware you cannot deny, these men, Everett and Dangerfield, are not unwilling to add, from the recollection of your face, other passages, which will certainly cost you your life when you come before a Protestant jury."

"They lie like villains," said Peveril, "who hold me accessory to any plot either against the King, the nation, or the state of religion; and for the Countess, her loyalty has been too long, and too highly proved, to permit her being implicated in such injurious suspicions."

"What she has already done," said Bridgenorth, his face darkening as he spoke, "against the faithful champions of pure religion, hath sufficiently shown of what she is capable. She hath betaken herself to her rock, and sits, as she thinks, in security, like the eagle reposing after his bloody banquet. But the arrow of the fowler may yet reach her—the shaft is

Instigated, doubtless, by the pristine reminiscences of former times, no sooner had that most prudent and considerate dame found herself in the vicinity of the scenes of her earlier days, than she bethought herself of a visit to the ancient housekeeper of Martindale Castle, Dame Ellesmere by name, who long retired from active service, resided at the keeper's lodge, in the west thicket, with her nephew, Lance Outram, subsisting upon the savings of her better days, and on a small pension allowed by Sir Geoffrey to her age and faithful services.

Now, Dame Ellesmere and Mistress Deborah had not by any means been formerly on so friendly a footing, as this haste to visit her might be supposed to intimate. But years had taught Deborah to forget and forgive; or perhaps she had no special objection, under cover of a visit to Dame Ellesmere, to take the chance of seeing what changes time had made on her old admirer the keeper. Both inhabitants were in the cottage, when, after having seen her master set forth on his expedition to the Castle, Mistress Debbitch, dressed in her very best gown, footed it through gutter, and over stile, and by pathway green, to knock at their door, and to lift the latch at the hospitable invitation which bade her come in.

Dame Ellesmere's eyes were so dim, that, even with the aid of spectacles, she failed to recognise, in the portly and mature personage who entered their cottage, the tight well-made lass, who, presuming on her good looks and flippant tongue, had so often provoked her by insubordination; and her former lover, the redoubted Lance, not being conscious that ale had given rotundity to his own figure, which was formerly so slight and active, and that brandy had transferred to his nose the colour which had once occupied his cheeks, was unable to discover that Deborah's French cap, composed of sarsenet and Brussels lace, shaded the features which had so often procured him a rebuke from Dr. Dummerar, for suffering his eyes during the time of prayers, to wander to the maid-servant's bench.

In brief, the blushing visiter was compelled to make herself known; and when known, was received by aunt and nephew with the most sincere cordiality.

The home-brewed was produced; and, in lieu of more vulgar food, a few slices of venison presently hissed in the frying-pan, giving strong room for inference that Lance Outram, in his capacity of keeper, neglected not his own cottage when he supplied the larder at the castle. A modest sip of the excellent Derbyshire ale, and a taste of the highly-seasoned hash, soon placed Deborah entirely at home with her old acquaintance.

Having put all necessary questions, and received all suitable answers, respecting the state of the neighbourhood, and such of her own friends as continued to reside there, the conversation began rather to flag, until Deborah found the art of again renewing its interest, by communicating to her friends the dismal intelligence that they must soon look for deadly bad news from the Castle; for that her present master, Major Bridgenorth, had been summoned, by some great people from London, to assist in taking her old master, Sir Geoffrey; and that all Master Bridgenorth's servants, and several other persons whom she named, friends and adherents to the same interest, had assembled a force to surprise the Castle; and that as Sir Geoffrey was now so old, and gouty withal, it could not be expected he should make the defence he was wont; and then he was known to be so stout-hearted, that it was not to be supposed that he would yield up without stroke of sword; and then if he was killed, as he was like to be, amongst them that liked never a bone of his body, and now had him at their mercy, why, in that case, she, Dame Deborah, would look upon Lady Peveril as little better than a dead woman; and undoubtedly there would be a general mourning through all that country, where they had such great kin; and silks were likely to rise on it, as Master Lutestring, the mercer of Chesterfield was like to feel in his purse bottom. But for her part, let matters wag how they would, an if Master Julian Peveril was to come to his own, she could reimbursed upon him as a faithful servant, which he had not specially deserved, and which, in consideration of his aunt, he should not have done. "I would," he said at last, "that old Whitaker were here now, with his long stories about Marston Moor and Edge-hill, that made us all yawn our jaws off their hinges in spite of broiled fashers and gooseberries! When a man is killed, he is mourned, as they say; and I would rather than a broadsword cut my head off here to have sorted this matter, for it is out of my way as a woodsman, that have no skill of war. But dang it, if old Sir Geoffrey go to the wall without a knock for it! Here you, Nell!"—(speaking to one of the fugitive maidens from the Castle)—"but now you have not the heart of a cat, and are afraid of your own shadowly moonlight! But, Cis, you are a stout-hearted wench, and know a black from a white. Hark thee, Cis, as you would wish to be married, get up to the Castle again, and get thee in the best thou knowest where—for thou hast oft gotten out of hostelry to a dance, or junketing, to my knowledge. Get thee back to the Castle, as we hope to be married—See my lady—they cannot hinder thee, of that my lady has a head worth twenty of ours. If I can, I will gather force, light up the beacon for a sturdy rascal; are not a far barrel on't. Thou mayst count safe enough. I warrant the Roundheads busy with spoil and plunder. And hark thee, say to my lady I am gone down to the miners' houses at Barmoor. The rogues were mutinying for their wages yesterday; they will be all ready for good or bad. Let her send orders down to me; or do you come yourself, if your legs are long enough."

"Whether they are or not, Master Lance, (and, as you know nothing of the matter,) they shall do your errand to-night, for love of the old Knight and his lady."

So Cisly Selk, a kind of Derbyshire Captain, who had won the smock at the foot-race at Astbury, sprung forward towards the Castle, with a speed which few could have equalled.

"There goes a mettled wench," said Lance; "and now, maunt, give me the old broadsword—it is a cure for the bed-head—and my wood-knife; and I shall do well enough."

"And what is to become of me?" bleated the unfortunate Mistress Deborah Deblatch.

"You must remain here with my aunt, Mistress Deb; and, for old acquaintance' sake, she will take care no harm befalls you; but take heed how you attempt to break bounds."

So saying, and pondering in his own mind the task which he had undertaken, the hardy forster strode down the moonlight glade, scarcely hearing the blessings and cautions which Dame Ellismere kept showering after him. His thoughts were not altogether warlike. "What a tight ankle the maid hath—she trips it like a doe in summer over the dew. Well, but here are the huts—Let us to this gear.—Are ye asleep, ye damners, sinkers, and drift-drivers? tin out, ye subterranean badgers. Here is your master, Sir Geoffrey, dead, for aught you know or care. Do not you see the beacon is light, and you sit there like so many asses?"

"Why," answered one of the miners, who now began to come out of their huts,

"As he be dead,

He will eat no more bread."

"And you are like to eat none neither," said Lance, "for the works will be presently stopped, and all of you turned off."

"Well, and what of it, Master Lance? As good play for naught as work for naught. Here is for weeks we have scarce seen the colour of Sir Geoffrey's com; and you ask us to care whether he be dead or alive! For you, that goes about, trotting upon a horse, and doing for work what all men do for pleasure, it may be well enough; but it is another matter to be leaving God's light, and burrowing all day and night in darkness, like a toad in a hole—that's not to be done for naught, I trow; and if Sir Geoffrey, dead, his soul will suffer for't; and if he's alive, we have him in the Barmoot Court."

claimed Dame Ellismere, with a twinge of apprehension and a look of this instant, or I will be very hide from thee with thy noble master's bread, and fly from his service, like an ill-omened bird as his downfall?"

Deborah, over whom the violence had obtained a certain pre-eminence, said only the warrant

"Come with their warrants ever since my month of May," said the old woman to the Castle; "but this I tell you, that I have seen such warrants word's point, down the throats of them; and so shall this be, if there be any to drink of the Dove."

Lance Outram re-entered the cottage, looking in dismay. "I doubt it is true," he said.

"The beacon tower is as black as the pale star of Peveril. What does that mean, and captivity," exclaimed old Ellismere, "Make for the Castle, thou knave. Trust in thy sword."

"Strike for the house that bred thee," said she, "and if thou art buried under the ruins, it shall be a man's death."

"Nay, maunt, I shall not be slack," answered Lance. "But here come folks that I warrant can tell more on't."

One or two of the female servants, who had fled from the Castle during the alarm, now rushed in with various reports of the case; but all agreeing that a body of armed men were in possession of the Castle, and that Major Bridgenorth had taken young Master Julian prisoner, and conveyed him down to Moultrasie-Hall, with his feet tied under the belly of the nag—a shameful sight to be seen—and he so well born and so handsome.

"Hark ye, gaffer," said Lance, "and take notice, my mates, all of you," for a considerable number of the rude and subterranean people had now assembled to hear the discussion—"Has Sir Geoffrey, think ye, ever put a penny in his pouch out of this same Bonadventure mine?"

"I cannot say as I think he has," answered old Ditchley, the party who maintained the controversy.

"Answer on your conscience, though it be but a laden one, Do not you know that he hath lost a good penny?"

"Why, I believe he may," said Gaffer Ditchley. "What then?—lose to-day, win to-morrow—the miner must eat in the mean time."

"True; but what will you eat when Master Bridgenorth gets the land, that will not hear of a mine being wrought on his own ground? Will he work on at all loss, think ye?" demanded trusty Lance.

"Bridgenorth?—he of Moultrassie-Hall, that stopped the great Felicity Work, on which his father laid out, some say, ten thousand pounds, and never got in a penny? Why, what has he to do with Sir Geoffrey's property down here at Bonadventure? It was never his trow."

"Nay, what do I know?" answered Lance, who saw the impression he had made. "Law and debt will give him half Derbyshire, I think, unless you stand by old Sir Geoffrey."

"But if Sir Geoffrey be dead," said Ditchley, cautiously, "what good will our standing by do to him?"

"I did not say he was dead, but only as bad as dead; in the hands of the Roundheads—a prisoner up yonder, at his own castle," said Lance; "and will have his head cut off, like the good Earl of Derby's, at Bolton-le-Moors."

"Nay, then, comrades," said Gaffer Ditchley, "and as Master Lance says, I think we should bear a hand for stout old Sir Geoffrey, against a low-born, ran-spirited fellow like Bridgenorth, who shut up a left had cost thousands, without getting a penny off on't. So hurra for Sir Geoffrey, and down with the Rump! But hold ye a blink—hold!"—(and the waving of his hand stopped the commencing cheer)—"Hark ye, Master Lance, it must be all over, for the moon is as black as night; and you know yourself it marks the Lord's death."

"It will kindle again in an instant," said Lance; earnestly adding, "I pray to God it may!—It will idle in an instant—lack of fuel and the confusion of the family."

"Ay, like enow, like enow," said Ditchley; "but I canna budge till I see it blazing."

"Why then, there a goes!" said Lance. "Thank ye, Cis—thank thee, my good wench.—Believe your own eyes, my lada, if you will not believe me; and w hurra for Peveril of the Peak—the King and his ends—and down with Rumps and Roundheads!"

The sudden rekindling of the beacon had all the effect which Lance could have desired upon the minds of his rude and ignorant hearers, who, in their superstitious humour, had strongly associated the Peveril of Peveril with the fortunes of the family. Once roused, according to the national character of their untrymen, they soon became enthusiastic; and once found himself at the head of thirty stout fellows and upwards, armed with their pick-axes and ready to execute whatever task he should impose on them.

Trusting to enter the Castle by the postern, which had served to accommodate himself and other domestics upon an emergency, his only anxiety was to keep his march silent; and he earnestly recommended his followers to reserve their shouts for the moment of the attack. They had not advanced far on their road to the Castle, when Cisly Sellok met them, so fearless with haste, that the poor girl was obliged to throw herself into Master Lance's arms.

"Stand up, my mettled wench," said he, giving her a kiss at the same time, "and let us know what you are going on up at the Castle."

"My lady bids you, as you would serve God and your master, not to come up to the Castle, which can make bloodshed; for she says Sir Geoffrey is lawfully in hand, and that he must bide the issue; and that he is innocent of what he is charged with, and is going up to speak for himself before King and Council, and she goes up with him. And besides, they have found out the postern, the roundhead rogues; for two of them saw me when I went out of door, and chased me; but I showed them a fair pair of heels."

"As ever dashed dew from the cowslip," said Lance. "But what the foul fiend is to be done? for if they have secured the postern, I know not how the dickens we can get in."

"All is fastened with bolt and staple, and guarded with gun and pistol, at the Castle," quoth Cisly; "and so sharp are they, that they nigh caught me coming with my lady's message, as I told you. But my lady says, if you could deliver her son, Master Julian, from Bridgenorth, that she would hold it good service."

"What!" said Lance, "is young master at the Castle? I taught him to shoot his first shaft. But how to get in!"

"He was at the Castle in the midst of the ruffle, but old Bridgenorth has carried him down prisoner to the Hall," answered Cisly. "There was never faith nor courtesy in an old Puritan, who never had pipe and tabor in his house since it was built."

"Or who stopped a promising mine," said Ditchley, "to save a few thousand pounds, when he might have made himself as rich as the Lord of Chatsworth and fed a hundred good fellows all the whilst."

"Why, then," said Lance, "since you are all of a mind, we will go draw the cover for the old badger; and I promise you that the Hall is not like one of your real houses of quality, where the walls are as thick as whinstone-dikes, but foolish brick-work, that your pick-axes will work through as if it were cheese. Huzza once more for Peveril of the Peak! down with Bridgenorth, and all upstart cuckoldy Roundheads!"

Having indulged the throats of his followers with one buxom huzza, Lance commanded them to cease their clamours, and proceeded to conduct them, by such paths as seemed the least likely to be watched, to the court-yard of Moultrassie-Hall. On the road they were joined by several stout yeoman farmers, either followers of the Peveril family, or friends to the High Church and Cavalier party; most of whom, alarmed by the news which began to fly fast through the neighbourhood, were armed with sword and pistol.

Lance Outram halted his party, at the distance, as he himself described it, of a flight-shot from the house, and advanced alone, and in silence, to reconnoitre; and having previously commanded Ditchley and his subterranean allies to come to his assistance whenever he should whistle, he crept cautiously forward, and soon found that those whom he came to surprise, true to the discipline which had gained their party such decided superiority during the Civil War, had posted a sentinel, who paced through the court-yard piously chanting a psalm tune, while his arms, crossed on his bosom, supported a gun of formidable length.

"Now, a true soldier," said Lance Outram to himself, "would put a stop to thy snivelling ditty, by making a broad arrow quiver in your heart, and no great alarm given. But, dang it, I have not the right spirit for a soldier—I cannot fight a man till my blood's up; and for shooting him from behind a wall, it is cruelly like to stalking a deer. I'll e'en face him and try what to make of him."

With this doughty resolution, and taking no farther care to conceal himself, he entered the court-yard boldly, and was making forward to the front door of the Hall, as a matter of course. But the old Cromwellian, who was on guard, had not so learned his duty. "Who goes there?—Stand, friend—stand; or, verily, I will shoot thee to death!" were challenges which followed each other quick, the last being enforced by the levelling and presenting the said long-barrelled gun with which he was armed.

"Why, what a murrain!" answered Lance. "Is it your fashion to go a-shooting at this time o' night? Why, this is but a time for bat-fowling."

"Nay, but hark thee, friend," said the experienced continued, "I am none of those who do this work negligently. Thou canst not make me with thy crafty speech, though thou wouldst make it to sound simple in mine ear. Of a verity I will shoot, unless thou tell thy name and business."

"Name," said Lance; "why, what a dickens should it be but Robin Round-hoofed Robin of Ratham, and for business, as you must needs know, I come on a message from some Parliament man up yonder at the Castle, with letters for worshipful Master Bridgenorth of Mountrose-Hall, and this for the place, as I think; though why so, he marching up and down at his door like the sign of the Red Man, with your old frock there, I cannot so well guess."

"Give me the letters, my friend," said the sentinel, to whom this explanation seemed very natural and probable; "and I will cause them forthwith to be delivered into his worship's own hand."

Running in his pockets, as if to pull out the letters which were cited, Master Lance approached within the sentry's pace, and, before he was aware, suddenly seized him by the collar, whistled sharp and shrill, and exerting his skill as a wrestler, for which he had been distinguished in his youth, he stretched his antagonist on his back—the market for which they struggled going off in the fall.

The miners rushed into the court yard at Lance's signal, and heaving any longer of prosecuting his design in silence, Lance commanded two of them to secure the prisoner, and the rest to charge loudly, and attack the door of the house. Instantly the court yard of the mansion rang with the cry of "Peveril of the Peak for ever!" with all the shout which the Rhyolite had devoted to roar upon the Roundheads, during so many years of contention; and at the same time, while some assailed the door with their mining implements, others directed their attack against the angle where a kind of porch joined to the main front of the building; and there in some degree protected by the projection of the wall, and of a balcony which overhung the porch, wrought in more security, as well as with more effect, than the others; for the doors being of oak, thickly studded with nails, offered a more effectual resistance to violence than the brick work.

The noise of this hubbub on the outside, soon excited wild alarm and tumult within. Lights flew from window to window, and voices were heard demanding the cause of the attack, to which the party crew of those who were in the court yard afforded all a sufficient, or at least the only answer, which was vouchsafed. At length the window of a projecting staircase opened, and the voice of Bridgenorth himself demanded authoritatively what the tumult meant, and commanded the miners to desist, upon their own proper and immediate peril.

"We want our young master, you cunning old thief," was the reply; "and if we have him not instantly, the topmost stone of your house shall be as low as the foundation!"

"We will try that presently," said Bridgenorth, "for if there is another blow struck against the walls of my peaceful home, I will fire my carbine among you, and your blood be upon your own head. I have a score of friends, well armed with musket and pike, to defend my house; and we have both the means and heart, with Heaven's assistance, to repel any violence you can offer."

"Master Bridgenorth," replied Lance, who, though no soldier, was sportsman enough to comprehend the advantage which these words were, and using firmness most agreeably have over his party exposed to their aim, in a great measure, and without means of answering their fire,—"Master Bridgenorth, let us agree parley with you, and fair conditions. We do not to do you no evil, but will have back our young master; it is enough that you have got our old one and his lady. It is food chasing, to kill hart, hind, and fawn; and we will give you some light on the subject at an instant."

This speech was followed by a great crash amongst the lower windows of the house, according to a new species of attack which had been suggested by some of the assailants.

"I would take the honest fellow's word, and let young Peveril go," said one of the garrison, who, carelessly yawning, approached on the inside the post at which Bridgenorth had stationed himself.

"Are you mad?" said Bridgenorth; "or do you think me gone enough in spirit to give up the advantage I now possess over the family of Peveril, in the case of a parcel of rascals, whom the first discharge will scatter like chaff before the whirlwind?"

Not answered the speaker, who was the same individual that had struck Julian by his recumbency in the man who called himself Ganthorpe. "I have a dire revenge but we shall buy a somewhat too dear if these rascals set the house on fire, as they are like to do, while you are parleying from the window. They have thrown stones or fire-brands into the hall; and it is all our friends can do to keep the flame from catching the tapestries, which is all and dry."

"Now, may Heaven judge thee for thy lightness of spirit," answered Bridgenorth; "one would think mischief was so properly thy element, that to thee I was indifferent whether friend or foe was the subject."

So saying he ran hastily down stairs towards the hall, into which, through broken casements, and to twist the iron bars, which prevented human entrance, the assailants had thrust lighted straw, sufficient to excite much smoke and some fire, and to throw the defenders of the house into great confusion. No more, that of several shots fired hastily from the windows, little or no damage followed to the besiegers, who, getting warm in the onset, answered the hostile charges with loud shouts of "Peveril for ever!" and had already made a practicable breach through the brick-wall of the tenement, through which Lance, Ditchley, and several of the most adventurous among their followers, made their way into the hall.

The complete capture of the house remained, however no far off as ever. The defenders made such much coolness and skill, that solemn and deep spirit of enthusiasm which sets life at less than nothing, or compulsion to real or supposed duty. From the hall opened doors which led into the hall, they maintained a fire which began to grow fatal. One miner was shot dead; three or four were wounded; and Lance scarce knew whether he should draw his forces from the house, and leave it a prey to the flames, or making a desperate attack on the posts occupied by the defenders, try to obtain unmolested possession of the place. At this moment his course of conduct was determined by an unexpected occurrence, of which it is necessary to trace the cause.

John Peveril had been, like other inhabitants of Mountrose-Hall on that momentous night awakened by the report of the sentinel's musket, followed by the shouts of his father's valets and followers, of which he collected enough to guess that Bridgenorth's house was attacked with a view to his liberation. Very doubtful of the issue of such an attempt, dally with the slumber from which he had been so suddenly awakened, and confounded with the rapid succession of events to which he had been lately a witness, he quickly put on a part of his clothes, and hastened to the window of his apartment. From this he could see nothing to relieve his anxiety, for it looked towards a quarter different from that on which the attack was made. He attempted his door, it was locked on the outside, and his perplexity and anxiety became extreme, when suddenly the lock was turned, and in an undress, hastily assumed in the moment of alarm, he saw streaming on her shoulders, her eye gleaming between fear and resolution, Alice Bridgenorth rushed into his apartment, and seized his hand with the fervent exclamation, "Julian, save thy father!"

The light which she bore in her hand served to show those features which could rarely have been viewed by any one without emotion, but which had an expression irrepressible to a lover.

"Alice," he said, "what means this? What is the danger? Where is your father?"

"Do not stay to question," she answered; "but if you would save him, follow me!"

at the same time she led the way, with great speed, way down the turret staircase which led to his room, thence turning through a side door, along a gallery, to a larger and wider stair, at the bottom of which stood her father, surrounded by four or five of his friends, scarce discernible through the smoke of the fire which began to take hold in the hall, as well as that which arose from the repeated discharge of their own fire-arms.

Julian saw there was not a moment to be lost, if he meant to be a successful mediator. He rushed through Bridgenorth's party ere they were aware of his approach, and throwing himself amongst the assistants who occupied the hall in considerable number, he assured them of his personal safety, and conducted them to depart.

Not without a few more slices at the Rump, master answered Lance. "I am principally glad to see you safe and well; but here is Joe Rimegap shot as if as a buck in season, and more of us are hurt; we'll have revenge, and roast the Puritans like lambswool!"

"Then you shall roast me along with them," said Julian; "for I vow to God, I will not leave the hall, I am bound by parole of honour to abide with Major Bridgenorth till lawfully dismissed."

"Now out on you, an you were ten times a Peveril," said Ditchley; "to give so many honest fellows work and labour on your behalf, and to show them kinder countenance.—I say, beat up the fire, and pull all together!"

"Nay, nay; but peace, my masters, and hearken to me," said Julian; "we are all here in evil condition, and you will only make it worse by contention. Let me help to put out this same fire, which will else burn us all dear. Keep yourselves under arms. Let Master Bridgenorth and me settle some grounds of accommodation, and I trust all will be favourably disposed on both sides; and if not, you shall have my sword and countenance to fight it out; and come what will, I will never forget this night's good service."

He then drew Ditchley and Lance Outram aside, while the rest stood suspended at his appearance and words, and expressing the utmost thanks and gratitude for what they had already done, urged them, as the greatest favour which they could do towards him, to his father's house, to permit him to negotiate the terms of his emancipation from thralldom; at the same time forcing on Ditchley five or six gold pieces, and the brave lads of Bonadventure might drink his health; whilst to Lance he expressed the warmest sense of his active kindness, but protested he could not consider it as good service to his house, if he were allowed to manage the matter after his own opinion.

"Why," answered Lance, "I am well out on it, master Julian; for it is matter beyond my mastery. What that I stand to is, that I will see you safe out of this same Moultrassie-Hall; for our old naunt Ellesmere will else give me but cold comfort when I come home. Truth is, I began unwillingly; but when I saw the poor fellow Joe shot beside me, why, I thought I should have some amends. But I put it all in my honour's hands."

During this colloquy both parties had been amicably employed in extinguishing the fire, which might otherwise have been fatal to all. It required a general effort to get it under; and both parties agreed on the necessary labour, with as much unanimity, as if the water they brought in leathern buckets from the well brow upon the fire, had had some effect in slaking their mutual hostility.

CHAPTER XXVI.

*Necessity—thou best of peacemakers,
As well as surest prompter of invention—
Help us to composition.—Anonymous.*

WHILE the fire continued, the two parties laboured in active union, like the jarring factions of the Jews during the siege of Jerusalem, when compelled to unite in resisting an assault of the besiegers. But when the last bucket of water had hissed on the few embers that continued to glimmer—when the sense of mutual hostility, hitherto suspended by a feeling of common danger, was in its turn rekindled—the parties, mingled as they had hitherto been in one common exertion, drew off from each other, and began to arrange themselves at opposite sides of the hall, and handle their weapons as if for a renewal of the fight.

Bridgenorth interrupted any further progress of this menacing hostility. "Julian Peveril," he said, "thou art free to walk thine own path, since thou wilt not walk with me that road which is more safe, as well as more honourable. But if you do by my counsel, you will get soon beyond the British seas."

"Ralph Bridgenorth," said one of his friends, "this is but evil and feeble conduct on thine own part. Wilt thou withhold thy hand from the battle, to defend, from these sons of Belial, the captive of thy bow and of thy spear? Surely we are enow to deal with them in the security of our good old cause; nor should we part with this spawn of the old serpent, until we essay whether the Lord will not give us victory therein."

A hum of stern assent followed; and had not Ganelasse now interfered, the combat would probably have been renewed. He took the advocate for war apart into one of the window recesses, and apparently satisfied his objections; for as he returned to his companions, he said to them, "Our friend hath so well argued this matter, that, verily, since he is of the same mind with the worthy Major Bridgenorth, I think the youth may be set at liberty."

As no further objection was offered, it only remained with Julian to thank and reward those who had been active in his assistance. Having first obtained from Bridgenorth a promise of indemnity to them for the riot they had committed, a few kind words conveyed his sense of their services; and some broad pieces, thrust into the hand of Lance Outram, furnished the means for affording them a holiday. They would have remained to protect him, but, fearful of farther disorder, and relying entirely on the good faith of Major Bridgenorth, he dismissed them all excepting Lance, whom he detained to attend upon him for a few minutes, till he should depart from Moultrassie. But ere leaving the Hall he could not repress his desire to speak with Bridgenorth in secret; and advancing towards him, he expressed such a desire.

Tacitly granting what was asked of him, Bridgenorth led the way to a small summer saloon adjoining to the Hall, where, with his usual gravity and indifference of manner, he seemed to await in silence what Peveril had to communicate.

Julian found it difficult, where so little opening was afforded him, to find a tone in which to open the subjects he had at heart, that should be at once dignified and conciliating. "Major Bridgenorth," he said at length, "you have been a son, and an affectionate one—You may conceive my present anxiety—My father!—What has been designed for him?"

"What the law will," answered Bridgenorth. "Had he walked by the counsels which I procured to be given to him, he might have dwelt safely in the house of his ancestors. His fate is now beyond my control—far beyond yours. It must be with him as his country shall decide."

"And my mother?" said Peveril.

"Will consult, as she has ever done, her own duty; and create her own happiness by doing so," replied Bridgenorth. "Believe, my designs towards your family are better than they may seem through the mist which adversity has spread around your house. I may triumph as a man; but as a man I must also remember, in my hour, that mine enemies have had theirs.—Have you aught else to say?" he added, after a momentary pause. "You have rejected once, yea and again, the hand I stretched out to you. Methinks little more remains between us."

These words, which seemed to cut short farther discussion, were calmly spoken; so that though they appeared to discourage farther question, they could not interrupt that which still trembled on Julian's tongue. He made a step or two towards the door, then suddenly returned. "Your daughter?" he said. "Major Bridgenorth—I should ask—I do ask forgiveness for mentioning her name—but may I not inquire after her? May I not express my wishes for her future happiness?"

"Your interest in her is but too flattering," said Bridgenorth; "but you have already chosen your part; and you must be in future, strangers to each other. I may have wished it otherwise, but the hour of grace is passed, during which your compliance with my advice might. I will speak it plainly—have I to my shame. For her happiness—if such a word belongs to a mortal pilgrimage—I shall care for it sufficiently. She leaves this place to-day, under the guardianship of a sure friend."

"Not of——?" exclaimed Feveril, and stopped short, for he felt he had no right to pronounce the name which came to his lips.

"Why do you pause?" said Bridgenorth; "a sudden thought is often a wise, almost always an honest one. With whom did you suppose I meant to intrust my child, that the idea called forth so anxious an expression?"

"Again I should ask your forgiveness," said Julian, "for meddling where I have little right to interfere. But I saw a face here that is known to me—the person calls himself Gentleman—is it with him that you mean to intrust your daughter?"

"Even to the person who calls himself Gentleman," said Bridgenorth, without expressing either anger or surprise.

"And do you know to whom you commit a charge so precious to all who know her, and so dear to yourself?" said Julian.

"Do you know, who ask me the question?" answered Bridgenorth.

"I own I do not," answered Julian; "but I have seen him in a character so different from what he now wears, that I feel it my duty to warn you, how you intrust the charge of your child to one who can alternately play the profligate or the hypocrite, as it suits his own interest or humour."

Bridgenorth smiled contemptuously. "I might be angry," he said, "with the officious zeal which supposes that its given conceptions can instruct my grey hairs; but, good Julian, I do but only ask from you the liberal construction, that I who have had much converse with mankind, know with whom I trust what is dearest to me. He of whom thou speakest hath one traitor to his friends, though he may have others to the world, living amongst those before whom honest features should be concealed under a grotesque vizard, even as in the awful sports of the day, called masquerade and mummeries, where the wise, if he show himself at all, must be contented to play the squish and fantastic fool."

"I would only pray your wisdom to beware," said Julian, "of one who, as he has a vizard for others, may also have one which can disguise his real features from yourself."

"This is being over careful, young man," replied Bridgenorth, more shortly than he had hitherto spoken; "if you would walk by my counsel, you will attend to your own affairs, which, credit me, deserve all your care, and leave others to the management of others."

This was too plain to be misunderstood; and Feveril was compelled to take his leave of Bridgenorth, and of Mountsteeple-Hall, without farther parley or explanation. The reader may imagine how oft he looked back, and tried to guess, amongst the lights which continued to twinkle in various parts of the building, which sparkle it was that gleamed from the brow of Alice. When the road turned into another direction, he sunk into a deep reverie, from which he was at length roused by the voice of Lance, who demanded where he intended to quarter for the night. He was unprepared to answer the question, but the honest knave himself prompted a solution of the problem, by requesting that he would occupy a spare bed in the Lodge; to which Julian willingly agreed. The rest of the inhabitants had retired to rest when they entered; but Dame Elmsmere, apprized by a mumm-get of her nephew's hospitable intent, had every thing in the best readiness she could for the son of her ancient patron. Feveril betook himself to rest; notwithstanding so many subjects of anxiety, and soundly till the morning was far advanced.

His slumbers were first broken by Lance, who had been long up, and already active in his service. He informed him, that his horse, arms, and small eld bag, had been sent from the Castle by one of Major Bridgenorth's servants, who brought a letter, charging from the Major's service the unfortunate Deborah Debbitch, and prohibiting her return to Hall. The officer of the House of Commons, escorted by a strong guard, had left Mountsteeple-Hall the morning early, travelling in Mr. Geoffrey's carriage, his lady being also permitted to attend on him. This he had to add, that the property at the Castle was taken possession of by Master Win the fight, attorney from Chesterfield, with other officers of law in name of Major Bridgenorth, a large creditor of the unfortunate knight.

Having told these Julian's tidings, Lance paused; and after a moment's hesitation, declared he was resolved to quit the country, and go up to London along with his young master. Julian argued the point with him; and insisted he had better stay to take charge of his aunt, in case she should be disturbed by the strangers. Lance replied, "she would have one with her, who would protect her well enough, for this was wherewithal to buy protection amongst them. But for himself, he was resolved to follow Master Julian to the death."

Julian heartily thanked him for his love.

"Nay it is not altogether out of love neither," said Lance, "though I am as loving as another; but it is as it were partly out of fear, lest I be called over the coals for last night's matter; for as for the women they will never trouble them, as the creatures will act after their kind."

"I will write in your behalf to Major Bridgenorth who is bound to afford you protection, if you have such fear," said Julian.

"Nay, for that matter, it is not altogether for more than altogether love," answered the cynical keeper; "although it hath a tainting of both."

And, to speak plain truth, thus it is—Dame Deborah and Naunt Elmsmere have resolved to set up their business together, and have made up all their quarrels. And of all ghosts in the world, the worst is, when an old true love comes back to haunt a poor fellow like me. Mistress Deborah, though distressed now for the loss of her place, has been already speaking of a broken marriage, or some such whim, as if a man could remember such things for so many years, even if she had not gone over seas, like a woodcock, in the mean while.

Julian could scarce forbear laughing. "I thought you too much of a man, Lance, to fear a woman marrying you whether you would or no."

"It has been many an honest man's luck, for all that," said Lance; "and a woman in the very hour has so many dured opportunities. And then there would be two upon one; for Naunt, though high enough when any of your folks are concerned, hath some look to the main chance; and it seems Mistress Deb is as rich as a Jew."

"And you, Lance," said Julian, "have no mind to marry for cake and pudding?"

"No, truly, master," answered Lance, "unless I knew of what dough they were baked. How the devil do I know how the jade came by so much? And then if she speaks of tokens and love-passages, let her be the same right lass I broke the marriage with, and I will be the same true lad to her. But I never heard of true love lasting ten years; and how, if it lives at all, must be never twenty."

"Well, then, Lance," said Julian, "once you are resolved on the thing, we will go to London together; where, if I cannot retain you in my service, and if my father recovers not from his misfortune, I will endeavour to promote you elsewhere."

"Nay, nay," said Lance, "I trust to be back to bonny Mountsteeple before it is long, and to keep the greenwood, as I have been wont to do; for, as to Dame Debbitch, when they have not me for their common butt, Naunt and she will soon bend bows on each other. So here comes old Dame Ellesmere with your breakfast. I will but give some directions about the deer to Rough Ralph, my helper, and saddle my forest pony, and your honour's horse, which is no prime one, and we will be ready to trot."

Julian was not sorry for this addition to his establishment; for Lance had shown himself, on the preceding evening, a shrewd and bold fellow, and attached to his master. He therefore set himself to reconcile his aunt to parting with her nephew for some time. Her unlimited devotion for "the family," readily induced the old lady to acquiesce in his proposal, though not without a gentle sigh over the ruins of a castle in the air, which was founded on the well-saved purse of Mistress Deborah Debbitch. "At any rate," she thought, "it was as well that Lance should be out of the way of that bold, long-legged, beggarly trollop, Cis Sellok." But to poor Deb herself, the expatriation of Lance, whom she had looked to as a sailor to a port under his lee, for which he can run, if weather becomes foul, was a second severe blow, following close on her dismissal from the profitable service of Major Bridgenorth.

Julian visited the disconsolate damsel, in hopes of gaining some light upon Bridgenorth's projects regarding his daughter—the character of this Ganlesse—and other matters, with which her residence in the family might have made her acquainted; but he found her by far too much troubled in mind to afford him the least information. The name of Ganlesse she did not seem to recollect—that of Alice rendered her hysterical—that of Bridgenorth, furious. She numbered up the various services she had rendered in the family—and denounced the plague of swartness to the linen—of leanness to the poultry—of dearth and dishonour to the housekeeping—and of lingering sickness and early death to Alice;—all which evils, she averred, had only been kept off by her continued, watchful, and incessant cares.—Then again turning to the subject of the fugitive Lance, she expressed such a total contempt of that mean-spirited fellow, in a tone between laughing and crying, as satisfied Julian it was not a topic likely to act as a sedative; and that, therefore, unless he made a longer stay than the urgent state of his affairs permitted, he was not likely to find Mistress Deborah in such a state of composure as might enable him to obtain from her any rational or useful information.

Lance, who good-naturedly took upon himself the whole burden of Dame Debbitch's mental alienation, or "taking on," as such fits of passio hysterica are usually termed in the country, had too much feeling to present himself before the victim of her own sensibility, and of his obduracy. He therefore intimated to Julian, by his assistant Ralph, that the horses stood saddled behind the Lodge, and that all was ready for their departure.

Julian took the hint, and they were soon mounted, and clearing the road, at a rapid trot, in the direction of London; but not by the most usual route. Julian calculated that the carriage in which his father was transported would travel slowly; and it was his purpose, if possible, to get to London before it should arrive there, in order to have time to consult with the friends of his family, what measures should be taken in his father's behalf.

In this manner, they advanced a day's journey towards London; at the conclusion of which, Julian found his resting-place in a small inn upon the road. No one came, at the first call, to attend upon the guests and their horses, although the house was well lighted up; and there was a prodigious chattering in the kitchen, such as can only be produced by a French cook, when his mystery is in the very moment of projection. It instantly occurred to Julian—so rare was the ministry of these Gallic artists at that time—that the clamour he heard must necessarily be produced by the Sieur Chaubert, on whose plats he had lately feasted, along with Smith and Ganlesse.

One, or both of these, were therefore probably in the little inn; and if so, he might have some opportunity to discover their real purpose and character.—

How to avail himself of such a meeting, he knew not; but chance favoured him more than he could have expected.

"I can scarce receive you, gentlefolks," said the landlord, who at length appeared at the door; "here be a sort of quality in my house to-night, whom less than all will not satisfy; nor all neither, for that matter."

"We are but plain fellows, landlord," said Julian; "we are bound for Moscley-market, and can get no farther to-night. Any hole will serve us, no matter what."

"Why," said the honest host, "if that be the case, I must e'en put one of you behind the bar, though the gentlemen have desired to be private; the other must take heart of grace, and help me at the tap."

"The tap for me," said Lance, without waiting his master's decision. "It is an element which I could live and die in."

"The bar, then, for me," said Peveril; and stepping back, whispered to Lance to exchange cloaks with him, desirous, if possible, to avoid being recognised.

The exchange was made in an instant; and presently afterwards the landlord brought a light; and as he guided Julian into his hostelry, cautioned him to sit quiet in the place where he should stow him; and if he was discovered, to say that he was one of the house, and leave him to make it good. "You will hear what the gallants say," he added; "but I think thou wilt carry away but little on it; for when it is not French, it is Court gibberish; and that is as hard to construe."

The bar, into which our hero was inducted on these conditions, seemed formed, with respect to the public room, upon the principle of a citadel, intended to observe and bridle a rebellious capital. Here sat the host on the Saturday evenings, screened from the observation of his guests, yet with the power of observing both their wants and their behaviour, and also that of overhearing their conversation—a practice which he was much addicted to, being one of that numerous class of philanthropists, to whom their neighbour's business is of as much consequence, or rather more, than their own.

Here he planted his new guest, with a repeated caution not to disturb the gentleman by speech, or motion; and a promise that he should be speedily supplied with a cold buttock of beef, and a tankard of home-brewed. And here he left him, with no other light than that which glimmered from the well-illuminated apartment within, through a sort of shuttle which accommodated the landlord with a view into it.

This situation, inconvenient enough in itself, was, on the present occasion, precisely what Julian would have selected. He wrapped himself in the weather-beaten cloak of Lance Outrain, which had been stained, by age and climate, into a thousand variations of its original Lincoln green; and with as little noise as he could, set himself to observe the two inmates, who had engrossed to themselves the whole of the apartment, which was usually open to the public. They sat by a table, well covered with such costly rarities, as could only have been procured by much forecast, and prepared by the exquisite Mons. Chaubert; to which both seemed to do much justice.

Julian had little difficulty in ascertaining, that one of the travellers was, as he had anticipated, the master of the said Chaubert, or, as he was called by Ganlesse, Smith; the other, who faced him, he had never seen before. This last was dressed like a gallant of the first order. His periwig, indeed, as he travelled on horseback, did not much exceed in size the bar-wig of a modern lawyer, but then the essence which he shook from it with every motion, impregnated a whole apartment, which was usually only perfumed by that vulgar herb, tobacco. His riding-coat was laced in the newest and most courtly style; and Grammont himself might have envied the embroidery of his waistcoat, and the peculiar cut of his breeches, which buttoned above the knee, permitting the shape of a very handsome leg to be completely seen. This, by the proprietor thereof, had been stretched out upon a stool, and he contemplated its proportions, from time, with infinite satisfaction.

The conversation between these worthies was so interesting, that we propose to assign to it another chapter.

CHAPTER XXVII.

— This is some creature of the elements,
Most like your sea-gull. He can wheel and whistle
His screaming song, e'en when the storm is loudest—
Take for his sheeted couch the restless foam
Of the wild wave-crest—slumber in the calm,
And dally with the storm. Yet 'tis a gull,
An arrant gull, with all this.—The Chieftain.

"AND here is to thee," said the fashionable gallant whom we have described, "honest Tom; and a cup of welcome to thee out of Lobby-land. Why, thou hast been so long in the country, that thou hast got a bumpkinly clod-compelling sort of look thyself. That greasy doublet fits thee as if it were thine reserved Sunday's apparel; and the points seem as if they were stay-laces bought for thy true-love Marjory. I marvel thou canst still relish a ragout. Methinks now, to a stomach bound in such a jacket, eggs and bacon were a diet more conforming."

"Rally away, my good lord, while wit lasts," answered his companion; "yours is not the sort of ammunition which will bear much expenditure. Or rather, tell me news from Court, since we have met so opportunely."

"You would have asked me these an hour ago," said the lord, "had not your very soul been under Chaubert's covered dishes. You remembered King's affairs will keep cool, and entremets must be eaten hot."

"Not so, my lord; I only kept common talk whilst that eavesdropping rascal of a landlord was in the room; so that, now the coast is clear once more, I pray you for news from Court."

"The Plot is nonsuited," answered the courtier—"Sir George Wakeman acquitted*—the witnesses discredited by the jury—Scroggs, who ranted on one side, is now ranting on t'other."

"Rat the Plot, Wakeman, witnesses, Papists, and Protestants, all together! Do you think I care for such trash as that?—Till the Plot comes up the palace hack-stair, and gets possession of old Rowley's own imagination, I care not a farthing who believes or disbelieves. I hang by him will bear me out."

"Well, then," said my lord, "the next news is Rochester's disgrace."

"Disgraced!—How, and for what? The morning I came off, he stood as fair as any one."

"That's over—the epitaph has broken his neck—and now he may write one for his own Court favour, for it is dead and buried."

"The epitaph!" exclaimed Tom; "why, I was by when it was made; and it passed for an excellent good jest with him whom it was made upon."

"Ay, so it did, among ourselves," answered his companion; "but it got abroad, and had a run like a mill-race. It was in every coffeehouse, and in half the diurnals. Grammont translated it into French

* The first check received by Doctor Oates and his colleagues in the task of supporting the Plot by their testimony, was in this manner:—After a good deal of prevarication, the prime witness at length made a direct charge against Sir George Wakeman, the Queen's physician, of an attempt to poison the King, and even connected the Queen with this accusation, whom he represented as Wakeman's accomplice. This last piece of effrontery recalled the King to some generous sentiments. "The villains," said Charles, "think I am tired of my wife; but they shall find I will not permit an innocent woman to be persecuted." Scroggs, the Lord Chief-Justice, accordingly received instructions to be favourable to the accused; and, for the first time, he was so. Wakeman was acquitted, but thought it more for his safety to retire abroad. His acquittal, however, indicated a turn of the tide, which had so long set in favour of the Plot, and of the witnesses by whom it had hitherto been supported.

† The epitaph alluded to is the celebrated epigram made by Rochester on Charles II. It was composed at the King's request, who nevertheless resented its poignancy.

The lines are well known:—

"Here lies our sovereign lord the King, Whose word no man relies on:
Who never said a foolish thing,
And never did a wise one."

too; and there is no laughing at so sharp a jest, when it is dinned into your ears on all sides. So, disgraced is the author; and but for his Grace of Buckingham, the Court would be as dull as my Lord Chancellor's wig."

"Or as the head it covers.—Well, my lord, the fewer at Court, there is the more room for those that can bustle there. But there are two mainstrings of Shaftesbury's fiddle broken—the Popish Plot fallen into discredit—and Rochester disgraced. Changeful times—but here is to the little man who shall mend them."

"I apprehend you," replied his lordship; "and meet your health with my love. Trust me, my lord loves you, and longs for you. Nay, I have done you reason.—By your leave, the cup is with me. Here is to his buxom Grace of Bucks."

"As blithe a peer," said Smith, "as ever turned night to day. Nay, it shall be an overflowing bumper, an you will; and I will drink it super naculum.—And how stands the great Madam?"

"Stoutly against all change," answered my lord—"Little Anthony† can make naught of her."

"Then he shall bring her influence to naught. Hark in thine ear. Thou knowest"—(Here he whispered so low that Julian could not catch the sound.)

"Know him?" answered the other—"Know Ned of the Island?—To be sure I do."

"He is the man that shall knot the great fiddle-strings that have snapped. Say I told you so; and thereupon I give thee his health."

"And thereupon I pledge thee," said the young nobleman, "which on any other argument I were loath to do—thinking of Ned as somewhat the cut of a villain."

"Granted, man—granted," said the other,—"a very thorough-paced rascal; but able, my lord, able and necessary; and, in this plan, indispensable. Pahaw!—This champagne turns stronger as it gets older, I think."

"Hark, mine honest fellow," said the courtier; "I would thou wouldst give me some item of all this mystery. Thou hast it, I know; for whom do men intrust but trusty Chiffinch?"

"It is your pleasure to say so, my lord," answered Smith, (whom we shall hereafter call by his real name of Chiffinch,) with much drunken gravity, for his speech had become a little altered by his copious libations in the course of the evening—"few men know more, or say less, than I do; and it well becomes my station. Conticere omnes, as the grammar hath it—all men should learn to hold their tongue."

"Except with a friend, Tom—except with a friend. Thou wilt never be such a dog-bolt as to refuse a hint to a friend? Come, you get too wise and statesmanlike for your office—The ligatures of thy most peasantly jacket there are like to burst with thy secret. Come, undo a button, man; it is for the health of thy constitution—Let out a reef; and, let thy chosen friend know what is meditating. Thou knowest I am as true as thyself to little Anthony, if he can but get uppermost."

"If, thou lordly infidel!" said Chiffinch—"talk'st thou to me of ifs?—There is neither if nor and in the matter. The great Madam shall be pulled a peg down—the great plot screwed a peg or two up. Thou knowest Ned?—Honest Ned had a brother's death to revenge."

"I have heard so," said the nobleman; "and that his persevering resentment of that injury was one of the few points which seemed to be a sort of heathenish virtue in him."

"Well," continued Chiffinch, "in manœuvring to bring about this revenge, which he hath laboured at many a day, he hath discovered a treasure."

"What!—In the Isle of Man?" said his companion.

"Assure yourself of it.—She is a creature so lovely, at she needs but be seen to put down every one of the favourites, from Portsmouth and Cleaveland down to that three-penny baggage, Mistress Nelly." "By my word, Chiffinch," said my lord, "that is an inforcement after the fashion of thine own best cuts. But bethink thee, man! To make such a request, there wants more than a cherry-cheek and bright eye—there must be wit—wit, man, and manners, and a little sense besides, to keep influence when is gotten."

"Pshaw! will you tell me what goes to this vocation?" said Chiffinch. "Here, pledge me her health a brimmer.—Nay, you shall do it on knees, too.—ever such a triumphant beauty was seen—I went church on purpose, for the first time these ten years. Yet I lie, it was not to church neither—it was to chapel."

"To chapel!—What the devil, is she a puritan?" claimed the other courtier.

"To be sure she is. Do you think I would be necessary to bringing a Papist into favour in these times, when, as my good Lord said in the House, ere should not be a Popish man-servant, nor a Popish maid-servant, not so much as dog or cat left, bark or mew about the King!"

"But consider, Chiffie, the dislikelihood of her raising," said the noble courtier.—"What! old Rowley, with his wit, and love of wit—his wildness, and love of wildness—he form a league with a silly, rumpulous, unidea'd Puritan!—not if she were Venus."

"Thou knowest naught of the matter," answered Chiffinch. "I tell thee, the fine contrast between a seeming saint and falling sinner will give zest to the old gentleman's inclinations. If I do not know him, who does?—Her health, my lord, on our bare knee, as you would live to be of the bed-chamber!"

"I pledge you most devoutly," answered his friend. "But you have not told me how the acquaintance is to be made; for you cannot, I think, carry her to the hall."

"Aha, my dear lord, you would have the whole creature! but that I cannot afford—I can spare a friend to peep at my ends, but no one must look on the means by which they are achieved."—So saying, he took his drunken head most wisely.

The villanous design which this discourse implied, and which his heart told him was designed against the Bridgenorth, stirred Julian so extremely, that he involuntarily shifted his posture, and laid his hand on his sword hilt.

Chiffinch heard a rustling, and broke off, exclaiming. "Hark!—Zounds, something moved—I trust I have told the tale to no ears but thine."

"I will cut off any which have drunk in but a syllable of thy words," said the nobleman; and raising a candle, he took a hasty survey of the apartment. Seeing nothing that could incur his menaced resentment, he replaced the light and continued:—"Well, suppose the Belle Louise de Querouaillet shoots from her high station in the firmament, how will you rear up the down-fallen Plot again—for without that me plot, think of it as thou wilt, we have no range of hands—and matters remain as they were, with a Protestant courtesan instead of a Papist—little Anthony can but little speed without that Plot of his—I believe, in my conscience, he begot it himself."

"Whoever begot it," said Chiffinch, "he hath adopted it; and a thriving babe it has been to him. Well, then, though it lies out of my way, I will play saint Peter again—up with t'other key, and unlock other mystery."

"Now thou speakest like a good fellow; and I will, with my own hands, unwire this fresh flask, to begin a brimmer to the success of thy achievement."

"Well, then," continued the communicative Chiffinch, "thou knowest that they have long had a bbling at the old Countess of Derby.—So Ned was sent down—he owes her an old account, thou knowest—with private instructions to possess himself of the island, if he could, by help of some of his old friends. He hath ever kept up spies upon her; and happy man was he, to think his hour of vengeance was come so nigh. But he missed his blow; and the old girl being placed on her guard, was soon in a condition to make Ned smoke for it. Out of the island he came with little advantage for having entered it; when, by some means—for the devil, I think, stands ever his friend—he obtained information concerning a messenger, whom her old Majesty of Man had sent to London to make party in her behalf. Ned stuck himself to this fellow—a raw, half-bred lad, son of an old blundering Cavalier of the old stamp, down in Derbyshire—and so managed the swain, that he brought him to the place where I was waiting in anxious expectation of the pretty one I told you of. By Saint Anthony, for I will swear by no meaner oath, I stared when I saw this great lout—not that the fellow is so ill looked neither—I stared like—like—good now, help me to a simile."

"Like Saint Anthony's pig, an it were sleek," said the young lord; "your eyes, Chiffie, have the very blink of one. But what hath all this to do with the Plot. Hold—I have had wine enough."

"You shall not baulk me," said Chiffinch; and a jingling was heard, as if he were filling his comrade's glass with a very unsteady hand. "Hey—What the devil is the matter?—I used to carry my glass steady—very steady."

"Well, but this stranger?"

"Why, he swept at game and ragout as he would at spring beef or summer mutton. Never saw so unmannered a cub—Knew no more what he eat than an infidel—I cursed him by my gods when I saw Chauder's chef-d'œuvres gluttoned down so indifferent a throat. We took the freedom to spice his goblet a little, and ease him of his packet of letters; and the fool went on his way the next morning with a budget artificially filled with gray paper. Ned would have kept him, in hopes to have made a witness of him, but the boy was not of that mettle."

"How will you prove your letters?" said the courtier.

"La you there, my lord," said Chiffinch; "one may see with half an eye, for all your laced doublet, that you have been of the family of Furnival's, before your brother's death sent you to Court. How prove the letters?—Why, we have but let the sparrow fly with a string round his foot—We have him again so soon as we list."

"Why, thou art turned a very Machiavel, Chiffinch," said his friend. "But how if the youth proved restiff?—I have heard these Peak men have hot heads and hard hands."

"Trouble not yourself—that was cared for, my lord," said Chiffinch—"his pistols might bark, but they could not bite."

"Most exquisite Chiffinch, thou art turned micher as well as padder—Canst both rob a man and kidnap him?"

"Micher and padder—what terms be these?" said Chiffinch. "Methinks these are sounds to lug out upon. You will have me angry to the degree of falling foul—robber and kidnapper!"

"You mistake verb for noun-substantive," replied his lordship; "I said rob and kidnap—a man may do either once and away without being professional."

"But not without spilling a little foolish noble blood, or some such red-coloured gear," said Chiffinch, starting up.

"Oh yes," said his lordship; "all this may be without these direful consequences, and so you will find to-morrow, when you return to England; for at present you are in the land of Champagne, Chiffie; and that you may continue so, I drink thee this parting cup to line thy nightcap."

"I do not refuse your pledge," said Chiffinch; "but I drink to thee in dudgeon and in hostility—It is a cup of wrath and a gage of battle. To-morrow, by dawn, I will have thee at point of fox, wert thou the last of the Savilles.—What the devil! think you I fear you because you are a lord?"

"Not so, Chiffchaff," answered his companion. "I know thou hast nothing but brains and bacon, washed down with bump, & like here - Adieu, sweet Chiffchaff - to bed - 4 bottles, & - to bed."

So saying, he lifted a candle, and left the apartment. And Cuthbert, whom the late drought had nearly overpowered, had just strength enough left to do the same muttering, as he staggered out, "Yes, he shall answer it. Dawn of day! D-a-n-m! It is coming, coming—the dawn—No, d-n-m, no, no the fire glancing on the curved red lattice—I am whistled drunk I think—This corner of a country inn! It is the smell of the brandy in this corner room. It could not be the wine. Well, old Rowley shall send me no more errands to the country again. Steady, steady."

By saying he rolled out of the apartment, leaving Power to think over the extraordinary conversation he had just heard.

The name of Chiffinch the well-known minister of Charles's pleasure, was nearly allied to the part which he seemed about to play in the present intrigue; but that Chiffinch, whom he had always supposed a Puritan as strict as his brother-in-law Bridgworth, should be associated with him in a plot so infamous, seemed alike unnatural and monstrous. The new relationship might blind Bridgworth, and warrant him in committing his daughter to such a man's charge; but what a wretch he must be that could easily graduate such an ignominious abuse of his trust! In doubt whether he could credit for a moment the tale which Chiffinch had revealed, he hastily examined his pocket and found that the envelope came in which it had been wrapt up, now only contained an equal quantity of waste paper. If he had required further confirmation, the failure of the sheet which he had found at Bridgworth, and of which the wedding only struck him, showed that his guess had been tinged with truth. He examined the packet which still remained charged, and found that the ball had been drawn. "May I perish," said he to himself, "and three villainous intrigues, but thou shalt be more surely loaded, and to better purpose!" The contents of these papers may undo my benefactors—their having been hunted on me, may ruin my father—that I have been the bearer of them, may cost, on three fiery times, my own life—that I now bear for—they form a branch of the scheme laid against the honour and happiness of a creature so innocent, that it is almost sin to think of her within the neighbourhood of such infamous knaves. I will recover the letters at all risks—But how?—that is to be thought on—Lance is stout and trusty, and when a hard deed is once resolved upon, there never yet lacked the means of executing it.

His host now entered, with an apology for his long absence, and after proffering Percival with some refreshments, invited him to accept, for his night quarters, the accommodation of a remote hay loft, which he was to share with his comrade, promising at the same time he could hardly have afforded them this courtesy, but out of deference to the exquisite talents of Lance Quirran, as eminent at the top, where, indeed, it seems probable that he, as well as the adorning landlord, did that evening contrive to drain nearly as much liquor as they drew.

But Lance was a grounded vessel, on whom liquor made no lasting impression, so that when Perceval swished that trinity halfway at dawn, he found him cool enough to comprehend and enter into the dream which he expressed of recovering the letters which had been abstracted from his person.

Having considered the whole matter with much attention, Lange shrugged, grinned, and scratched his head; and at length manfully expressed his conclusion. "Well, my nauti speaks truth in her old saw.—

Jeremy gave Jonathan the packet with a smile; and the disappointed grocer turned his head suddenly towards London, while Ian and the rest of his retinue, rode briskly off pursued by the benedictions and his family, who stood bowing and on the door a gratitude, doubtless, for the unwelcome visitor's rejection.

It was half three in the afternoon, and after the usual parson, Smith hurried into the room in which the lady is in a blue nightgown and green velvet cap up with the most costly Brussels lace. He is but half awake, and it was with a dreamy he called for a cup of cold small beer. His look and appearance were those of a man who had had a throe on the forehead, and he had more perceived the effects of his own the jolly good. "Lance" murmured by him, watch the motions of the curtain. "Oh, what with the reading, however," he called for plaid again to the landlord, his wish to see a in his morning gown and cap.

"What the devil!" exclaimed Chuffinch; "is never civil - What's off for the rovers with you?"

"All but one," replied Latour, "whom I must bring back to London with letters."

"To London with letters!" said Chubb. "I am for London, and could have saved him about that stage fight. I don't recollect you'd have blabbed? I have. I have. I've all now. I have blabbed, and to the very the Court who make the rule out of our street. I dare and live that my afternoon run my meetings there. I must turn down and and and to live in my cage, and have silence and my private. My friends and my with a plague to me, so if any one could I much good or harm but his own self. He cannot be stopped, though—I will put a question. Hark ye, drawer fellow—call my butler, call Tom Benson."

Lance agreed, but insisted that, when he reached the dominator, to remain in the car in order to hear what should pass between the master.

"Hark ye, Tom," said Chiffinch, "here are five pieces for you."

"What's to be done now, I trow?" said Tom, without even the ceremony of returning thanks, which he was probably well aware would not be received even in part payment of the debt he was incurring.

"Mount your fleet nag, Tom—ride like the devil—wreak the groom whom Lord Saville despatched to London this morning—lame his horse—break his neck—fill him as drunk as the Baltic sea; or do whatever may best and most effectually stop his journey.—Why does the lout stand there without answering me? Don't you understand me?"

"Why, ay, Master Chiffinch," said Tom; "and so am I thinking doth this honest man here, who need not have heard quite so much of your counsel, as it had been your will."

"I am bewitched this morning," said Chiffinch to himself, "or else the champagne runs in my head still. My brain has become the very lowlands of Holland; a gill cup would inundate it—Hark thee, fellow," he cried, addressing Lance, "keep my counsel—there is a wager betwixt Lord Saville and me, which of us shall first have a letter in London. Here is to drink to my health, and bring luck on my side. Say nothing of it; but help Tom to his nag.—Tom, ere thou startest, come for thy credentials—I will give thee a letter from the Duke of Bucks, that may be evidence thou wert in town."

Tom Beacon ducked and exit; and Lance, after having made some show of helping him to horse, ran back to tell his master the joyful intelligence, that a lucky accident had abated Chiffinch's party to their former number.

Peveril immediately ordered his horses to be got ready; and, so soon as Tom Beacon was despatched towards London on a rapid trot, had the satisfaction to observe Chiffinch, with his favourite Chaubert, bent to pursue the same journey, though at a more moderate rate. He permitted them to attain such a distance, that they might be dogged without suspicion; he paid his reckoning, mounted his horse, and followed, keeping his men carefully in view, until he could come to a place proper for the enterprise which he meditated.

It had been Peveril's intention, that when they came to some solitary part of the road, they should gradually mend their pace, until they overtook Chaubert—at Lance Outram should then drop behind, in order to assail the man of spits and stoves, while he himself, hurrying onward, should grapple with Chiffinch. But his scheme presupposed that the master and servant could travel in the usual manner—the latter riding a few yards behind the former. Whereas, such and so interesting were the subjects of discussion betwixt Chiffinch and the French cook, that, without heeding the rules of etiquette, they rode on together, amicably seated, carrying on a conversation on the mysteries of the table, which the ancient Comus, or a modern astronomer, might have listened to with pleasure. It was, therefore, necessary to venture on them both at once.

For this purpose, when they saw a long tract of road before them, unvaried by the least appearance of man, beast, or human habitation, they began to mend their pace, that they might come up to Chiffinch, without giving him any alarm, by a sudden and suspicious increase of haste. In this manner, they lessened the distance which separated them till they were within about twenty yards, when Peveril, afraid that Chiffinch might recognise him at a nearer approach, did so trust to his horse's heels, made Lance the signal to charge.

At the sudden increase of their speed, and the noise with which it was necessarily attended, Chiffinch looked around, but had time to do no more, for Lance, who had pricked his pony (which was much more ready than Julian's horse) into full gallop, pushed, without ceremony, betwixt the courtier and his attendant; and ere Chaubert had time for more than one exclamation, he upset both horse and Frenchman; voilà! thrilling from his tongue as he rolled on the ground amongst the various articles of his occupation, which, escaping from the budget in which he bore them, lay tumbled upon the highway in strange disorder; while Lance, springing from his palfrey, commanded his foeman to be still, under no less a penalty than that of death, if he attempted to rise.

Before Chiffinch could avenge his trusty follower's downfall, his own bridle was seized by Julian, who presented a pistol with the other hand, and commanded him to stand or die.

Chiffinch, though effeminate, was no coward. He stood still as commanded, and said, with firmness, "Rogue, you have taken me at surprise. If you are a highwayman, there is my purse. Do us no bodily harm, and spare the budget of spices and sauces."

"Look you, Master Chiffinch," said Peveril, "this is no time for dallying. I am no highwayman, but a man of honour. Give me back that packet which you stole from me the other night; or, by all that is good, I will send a brace of balls through you, and search for it at leisure."

"What night?—What packet?" answered Chiffinch, confused; yet willing to protract the time for the chance of assistance, or to put Peveril off his guard. "I know nothing of what you mean. If you are a man of honour, let me draw my sword, and I will do you right, as a gentleman should do to another."

"Dishonourable rascal!" said Peveril, "you escape not in this manner. You plundered me when you had me at odds; and I am not the fool to let my advantage escape, now that my turn is come. Yield up the packet; and then, if you will, I will fight you on equal terms. But first," he reiterated, "yield up the packet, or I will instantly send you where the tenor of your life will be hard to answer for."

The tone of Peveril's voice, the fierceness of his eye, and the manner in which he held the loaded weapon, within a hand's-breadth of Chiffinch's head, convinced the last there was neither room for compromise, nor time for trifling. He thrust his hand into a side-pocket of his cloak, and with visible reluctance produced those papers and despatches, with which Julian had been intrusted by the Countess of Derby.

"They are five in number," said Julian; "and you have given me only four. Your life depends on full restitution."

"It escaped from my hand," said Chiffinch, producing the missing document—"There it is. Now sir, your pleasure is fulfilled, unless," he added, sulkily, "you design either murder or farther robbery."

"Base wretch!" said Peveril, withdrawing his pistol, yet keeping a watchful eye on Chiffinch's motions, "thou art unworthy any honest man's sword; and yet, if you dare draw your own, as you proposed but now, I am willing to give you a chance upon fair equality of terms."

"Equality!" said Chiffinch, sneeringly; "yes, a proper equality—sword and pistol against single rapier, and two men upon one, for Chaubert is no fighter. No, sir; I shall seek amends upon some more fitting occasion, and with more equal weapons."

"By backbiting, or by poison, base pander!" said Julian; "these are thy means of vengeance. But mark me—I know your vile purpose respecting a lady who is too worthy that her name should be uttered in such a worthless ear. Thou hast done me one injury, and thou seest I have repaid it. But prosecute this farther villany, and be assured I will put thee to death like a foul reptile, whose very slaver is fatal to humanity. Rely upon this, as if Machiavel had sworn it; for so surely as you keep your purpose, so surely will I prosecute my revenge.—Follow me, Lance, and leave him to think on what I have told him."

Lance had, after the first shock, sustained a very easy part in this rencontre; for all he had to do, was to point the butt of his whip, in the manner of a gun, at the intimidated Frenchman, who, lying on his back, and gazing at random on the skies, had as little the power or purpose of resistance, as any pig which had ever come under his own slaughter-knife.

Summoned by his master from the easy duty of guarding such an unresisting prisoner, Lance remounted his horse, and they both rode off, leaving their discomfited antagonists to console themselves for their misadventure as they best could. But con-

"My Lord Duke—I crave pardon—but your traced."

"I would have it so, you blockhead. Have you lived with me so long, and cannot discover that the eclat of an intrigue is, with me, worth all the rest of it?"

"But the danger, my Lord Duke?" replied Jerningham. "There are husbands, brothers, friends, whose revenge may be awakened."

"And beaten to sleep again," said Buckingham, haughtily. "I have Black Will and his cudgel for plebeian grumblers; and those of quality I can deal with myself. I lack breathing and exercise of late."†

"But yet your Grace"——

"Hold your peace, fool! I tell you that your poor dwarfish spirit cannot measure the scope of mine. I tell thee I would have the course of my life a torrent
—I am weary of easy achievements, and wish for obstacles, that I can sweep before my irresistible course."

Another gentleman now entered the apartment.

"I humbly crave your Grace's pardon," he said;

"but Master Christian is so importunate for admission instantly, that I am obliged to take your Grace's pleasure."

"Tell him to call three hours hence. Damn his politic pate, that would make all men dance after his pipe!"

"I thank you for the compliment, my Lord Duke," said Christian, entering the apartment in somewhat a more courtly garb, but with the same unpretending and undistinguished mien, and in the same placid and indifferent manner with which he had accosted Julian Peveril upon different occasions during his journey to London. "It is precisely my present object to pipe to you; and you may dance to your own profit, if you will."

"On my word, Master Christian," said the Duke, haughtily. "the affair should be weighty, that removes ceremony so entirely from betwixt us. If it relates to the subject of our last conversation, I must request our interview be postponed to some further opportunity. I am engaged in an affair of some weight."† Then turning his back on Christian, he went on with his conversation with Jerningham. "Find the person you wot of, and give him the papers; and hark ye, give him this gold to pay for the shaft of his arrow—the steel-head and peacock's wing we have already provided."

"This is all well, my lord," said Christian, calmly, and taking his seat at the same time in an easy chair at some distance; "but your Grace's levity is no

* Elkana Settle, the unworthy scribbler whom the envy of Rochester and others tried to raise to public estimation, as a rival to Dryden; a circumstance which has been the means of elevating him to a very painful species of immortality.

† It was the unworthy distinction of men of wit and honour about town, to revenge their own quarrels with inferior persons by the hands of bravoos. Even in the days of chivalry, the knights, as may be learned from Don Quixote, turned over to the chastisement of their squires such adversaries as were not dubb'd; and thus it was not unusual for men of quality in Charles II.'s time, to avenge their wrongs by means of private assassination. Rochester writes composedly concerning a satire imputed to Dryden, but in reality composed by Mulgrave, "If he falls upon me with the blunt, which is his very good weapon in wit, I will forgive him, if you please, and leave the repartee to Black Will with a cudgel." And, in conformity with this cowardly and brutal intimation, that distinguished poet was waylaid and beaten severely in Rose Street, Covent Garden, by ruffians who could not be discovered, but whom all concluded to be the agents of Rochester's mean revenge.

Christian smiled and shook his head. "My lord," he said, "I know your Grace as well, or better perhaps, than you know yourself. To spoil a well-concerted intrigue by some cross stroke of your own, would give you more pleasure than to bring it to a successful termination according to the plans of others. But Shaftesbury, and all concerned, have determined that our scheme shall at least have fair play. We reckon, therefore, on your help; and—excuse me when I say so—we will not permit ourselves to be impeded by your levity and fickleness of purpose."

"Who?—I light and fickle of purpose?" said the Duke. "You see me here as resolved as any of you, to dispossess the mistress, and to carry on the Plot; these are the only two things I live for in this world. No one can play the man of business like me, when I please, to the very filing and labelling of my letters. I am regular as a scrivener."

"You have Chiffinch's letter from the country; he told me he had written to you about some passages twixt him and the young Lord Saville."

"He did so—he did so," said the Duke, looking through his letters; "but I see not his letter just now. I scarcely noted the contents—I was busy when it came—but I have it safely."

"You should have acted on it," answered Christian. "The fool suffered himself to be choused out of his secret, and prayed you to see that my lord's messenger got not to the Dutchess with some despatches which he sent up from Derbyshire, betraying the mystery."

The Duke was now alarmed, and rang the bell loudly. Jerningham appeared. "Where is the letter sent from Master Chiffinch some hours since?"

"If it be not amongst those your Grace has before you, I know nothing of it," said Jerningham. "I saw none such arrive."

"You lie, you rascal," said Buckingham; "have you a right to remember better than I do?"

"If your Grace will forgive me reminding you, you have scarce opened a letter this week," said his gentleman.

"Did you ever hear such a provoking rascal?" said the Duke. "He might be a witness in the Plot. He has knocked my character for regularity entirely on his head with his damned counter-evidence."

"Your Grace's talent and capacity will at least remain unimpeached," said Christian; "and it is one that must serve yourself and your friends. If I might advise, you will hasten to Court, and lay some foundation for the impression we wish to make. If your Grace can take the first word, and throw out a hint to crossbite Saville, it will be well. But above all, keep the King's ear employed, which no one can do so well as you. Leave Chiffinch to fill his heart with a proper object. Another thing is, there is a rickhead of an old Cavalier, who must needs be a stiler in the Countess of Derby's behalf—he is fast bold, with the whole tribe of witnesses at his uncles."

"Nay, then, take him, Topham."

"Topham has taken him already, my lord," said Christian; "and there is, besides, a young gallant, son of the said Knight, who was bred in the household of the Countess of Derby, and who has brought letters from her to the Provincial of the Jesuits, and hers in London."

"What are their names?" said the Duke, dryly.

"Sir Geoffrey Peveril of Martindale Castle, in Derbyshire, and his son Julian."

"What! Peveril of the Peak?" said the Duke,—"a stout old Cavalier as ever swore an oath—A Worcester-man, too—and, in truth, a man of all work, when our wars were going? I will not consent to his ruin, Christian. These fellows must be flogged off such base scents—flogged in every sense, they must, and will be, when the nation comes to its eye-sight again."

"It is of more than the last importance, in the mean time, to the furtherance of our plan," said Christian, "that your Grace should stand for a space between them and the King's favour. The youth hath influence with the maiden, which we should find scarceavourable to our views; besides, her father holds him as high as he can any one who is no such puritanic fool as himself."

"Well, most Christian Christian," said the Duke, "I have heard your commands at length. I will endeavour to stop the earths under the throne, that neither the lord, knight, nor squire in question, shall find it possible to burrow there. For the fair one, I must leave Chiffinch and you to manage her introduction to her high destinies, since I am not to be trusted. Adieu, most Christian Christian."

He fixed his eyes on him, and then exclaimed, as he shut the door of the apartment,—"Most profligate and damnable villain! And what provokes me most of all, is the knave's composed insolence. Your Grace will do this—and your Grace will condescend to do that—A pretty puppet I should be, to play the second part or rather the third, in such a scheme! No, they shall all walk according to my purpose, or I will cross them. I will find this girl out in spite of them, and judge if their scheme is likely to be successful. If so, she shall be mine—mine entirely, before she becomes the King's; and I will command her who is to guide Charles.—Jerningham,"* (his gentleman entered,) "cause Christian to be dogged wherever he goes, for the next four-and-twenty hours, and find out where he visits a female newly come to town.—You smile, you knave?"

* The application of the very respectable old English name of Jerningham to the valet-de-chambre of the Duke of Buckingham, has proved of force sufficient to wake the resentment of the dead, who had in early days worn that illustrious surname,—for the author received by post the following expostulation on the subject:—

"To the learned Clerk and worshipful Knight, Sir Walter Scott give these:

"My mortal frame has long since mouldered into dust, and the young sapling that was planted on the day of my funeral, is now a doddered oak, standing hard by the mansion of the family. The winds do whistle thro' its leaves, moaning among its moss-covered branches, and awakening in the souls of my descendants, that pensive melancholy which leads back to the contemplating those that are gone!—I, who was once the courtly dame, that held high revelry in these gay bowers, am now light as the blast!"

"If I essaye, from vain affection, to make my name be thought of by producing the noise of rustling silks, or the slow tread of a midnight foot along the chapel floor, alas! I only scare the simple maidens, and my wearie efforts (how wearie none alive can tell) are derided and jested at, by my knightlie descendants. Once indeed—but it boots not to burthen your ear with this particular, nor why I am still sad and aching, between earth and heaven! Know only, that I still walk this place (as my playmate, your great-grandmother, does here.) I sit in my wonted chair, tho' now it stands in a dusty garret. I frequent my lady's room, and I have hushed her wailing babes, when all the cunning of the nurse has failed. I sit at the window where so long a succession of honourable dames have presided their days, and are passed away! But in the changes that centuries brought, honor and truth have remained; and, as adherents to King Harry's eldest daughter, as true subjects to her successors, as faithful followers of the unfortunate Charles and his posterity, and as loyal and attached servants of the present royal stock, the name of Jerningham has ever remained unsullied in honour, and uncontaminated in aught unfitting its ancient knightlie origin. You, noble and learned sir, whose quill is as the trumpet arousing the slumbering souls to feelings of lofty chivalrie,—you, Sir Knight, who feel and do honour to your noble lineage, wherefore did you say, in your chronicle or historie of the brave knight, Peveril of the Peake, that my lord of Buckingham's servant was a Jerningham!!! a vile varlet to a viler noble! Many honourable families have, indeed, shot and spread from the parent stock into wilde entangled mazes, and reached perchance beyond the confines of gentle blood; but it so pleased Providence, that my worshipful husband, good Sir Harry's line, has flowed in one confined, but clear deep stream, down to my well-beloved son, the present Sir George Jerningham (by just claim Lorde Stafford:) and if any of your courtly ancestors that hover round your bed, could speak, they would tell you that the Duke's valet was not Jerningham, but Sayer or Sims—Act as you shall think mete hereon, but defend the honoured names of those whose champion you so well deserve to be."

"J. JERNINGHAM."

Having no mode of knowing how to reply to this ancient dignitary, I am compelled to lay the blame of my error upon wicked example which has misled me; and to plead that I should never have been guilty of so great a misnomer, but for the authority of one Oliver Goldsmith, who, in an elegant dialogue between the Lady Blarney and Miss Carolina Wilhelmina Amelia Skeggs, makes the former assure Miss Skeggs as a fact, that the next morning my lord called out three times to his valet-de-chambre, "Jernizan. Jernizan. Jernigan! bring me my garters!" Some inaccurate recollection of this passage has occasioned the offence rendered, for which I make this imperfect, yet respectful apology.

"I did but suspect a French rival to Araminta and the little Countess," said Jerningham.

"Away to your business, leave," said the Duke, "and let me think of mine. To subdue a Puntian in Kato—a King's favourite in Poono—the very master of western beauty—that is point first. The importance of this Mann mongrel to be converted—the pride of Madame la Duchesse to be pulled down, an important state intrigue to be furthered, or baffled, its circumstances render most to my own honour and glory—I wished for business but now, and I have got enough of it. But Buckingham will keep his own strange way through shoal and through weather."

CHAPTER XXIX.

—What you did, Christian—
The devil can quote scripture for his purpose.
Shakespeare's Titus

AFTER leaving the proud mansion of the Duke of Buckingham, Christian, full of the deep and treacherous schemes which he meditated, hastened to the city, where, in a decent inn, kept by a person of his own persuasion, he had been unexpectedly summoned to meet with Ralph Bridgenorth of Montserrat. He was not disappointed: the Major had arrived that morning, and anxiously expected him. The usual gloom of his countenance was darkened into a yet deeper shade of anxiety, which was warmly relieved, even while, in answer to his inquiry after his daughter, Christian gave the most favourable account of her health and spirits, naturally and unaffectedly intermingled with such praise of her beauty and her disposition, as were likely to be most grateful to a father's ear.

But Christian had too much cunning to expatiate on this theme, however soothing. He stopped short quietly at the point where, as an affectionate relative, he might be supposed to have said enough. "The lady," he said, "with whom he had placed Alice, was delighted with her aspect and manners, and undertook to be responsible for her health and happiness. He had not, he said, deserved so little confidence at the hand of his brother Bridgenorth, so that the Major should, contrary to his purpose, and to the plan which they had adjusted together, have hurried up from the country as if his own presence were necessary for Alice's protection."

"Brother Christian," said Bridgenorth in reply, "I must see my child—I must see this person with whom she is intrusted."

"To what purpose?" answered Christian. "Have you not often confessed that the over excess of the paternal affection which you have entertained for your daughter, hath been a snare to you?—Have you not more than once been on the point of resigning those great dangers which should place righteousness on a moment's tenure the throne, because you desired to gratify your daughter's childish passion for this descendant of your old persecutor—the Julian Peveril?"

"I owe it," said Bridgenorth, "and worlds would I have given, and would yet give, to clop that youth to my bosom, and call him my son. The spirit of his father looks from his eye, and his stately step is as that of his father, when he daily spoke comfort to me in my distress, and said, 'The child leech!'"

"But the youth walks," said Christian, "after his own lights, and mistakes the meteor of the marsh for the Polar star. Ralph Bridgenorth, I will speak to thee in friendly sincerity. Thou must not think to serve both the good cause and Basil. Obey if thou wilt, thine own carnal affections, summon this Julian Peveril to thy house, and let him wed thy daughter—But mark the reception she will meet with from the proud old knight, whose spirit is now, even now, as little broken with his chains, as after the sword of the Saints had prevailed at Worcester. Thou wilt see thy daughter scorned from his feet like an outcast."

"Christian," said Bridgenorth, interrupting him, "thou dost urge me hard, but thou dost it in love, my brother, and I forgive thee. Alice shall never be married.—But this friend of thine—this lady—thou art my child's uncle; and after me, thou art next to her in love and affection—Will, thou art not her father—hast not thy father's faith. Art thou sure of the character of this woman to whom my child is intrusted?"

"Am I sure of my own?—Am I sure that my name is Christian—your Bridgenorth?—Is it a thing I am likely to be insecure in?—Have I not dwelt for many years in this city?—Do I not know this Court?—Am I likely to be imposed upon? For I will not think you can lead me imposing upon you."

"Thou art my brother," said Bridgenorth—"the blood and bone of my departed Aunt—and I am determined that I will trust thee in this matter."

"Thus dost well," said Christian, "and who knows what reward may be in store for thee?—I cannot look upon Alice, but it is strongly borne in on my mind that there will be work for a creature as excellent beyond ordinary women. Courageous Judith freed the child by her valour, and the comely features of Judith made her a safeguard and a defence to her people's life, and of captivity when she found favour in the sight of King Abimelech."

"Be it with her as Heaven wills," said Bridgenorth, "and now tell me what progress there is in the great work."

"The people are weary of the injustice of this Court," said Christian, "and if this man will continue to reign, it must be by calling to his councils men of another stamp. The storm excited by the damnable practices of the Papists, has called up men's souls, and awakened their eyes to the dangers of their state. He himself, for he will give up brother and wife to save himself, is not over to a change of measures, and though we cannot at first see the Court purged with a sweeping fan, yet there will be enough of the good to control the bad—enough of the nobler party to compel the grant of that universal toleration, for which we have sighed so long, as a reward for her services. Time and opportunity will lead the way to still thorough reformation, and that will be done a step at a time, which our friends failed to establish in a sure foundation, even when their victorious blades were in their hands."

"May I not grant it?" said Bridgenorth, "for I am not I should scruple to do ought which should owe more weakness to the civil sword, but welcome all that comes in a peaceful and parliamentary way."

"Ay," said Christian, "and which will bring with it the bitter antidote, which our enemies have so long merited at our hands. How long hath our brother's blood cried for vengeance from the altar? Now shall that cruel Frenchwoman find that neither arms of peers, nor her powerful friends, nor the name of Stanley, nor the Sovereignty of Man, shall stop the sure course of the purgation of blood. Her name shall be struck from the rolls, and her heritage shall another take."

"Nay, but, brother Christian," said Bridgenorth, "art thou not over eager in pursuing this theme?—Is it thy duty as a Christian to forgive those enemies?"

"Ay, but not the enemies of Heaven—not those who shed the blood of the saints," said Christian, his eyes kindling with that vehemence and fiery expression which at times gave to his countenance the only character of passion which ever exhibited. "No, Bridgenorth," he continued, "I esteem this purpose of revenge holy—I esteem it a propitiatory sacrifice for what may have been evil in my life. I have submitted to be scorned by the haughty—I have humbled myself to be a servant, but in my breast was the proud thought, I who do this—do it that I may avenge my brother's blood."

"Well, my brother," said Bridgenorth, "although I participate thy purpose, and have aided thee against this Montebith woman, I cannot but think thy revenge is more after the law of Moses than after the law of love."

"Thou comest well from this, Ralph Bridgenorth," answered Christian, "from thee, who hast so moulded over the downfall of thine own enemy?"

"If you mean Sir Geoffrey Peveril," said Bridgenorth, "I could not on his run. It is well he is absent; but if it lies with me, I may humble him, but will never run his house."

"You know your purpose best," said Christian; "and I do justice, brother Bridgenorth, to the purity of your principles; but men who see with but worldly eyes, would discern little purpose of mercy in the strict magistrate and severe creditor—and such have you been to Peveril."

"And, brother Christian," said Bridgenorth, his colour rising as he spoke, "neither do I doubt your purpose, nor deny the surprising address with which you have procured such perfect information concerning the purposes of yonder woman of Ammon. But it is free to me to think, that in your intercourse with the Court, and with courtiers, you may, in your carnal and worldly policy, sink the value of those spiritual gifts, for which you were once so much celebrated among the brethren."

"Do not apprehend it," said Christian, recovering his temper, which had been a little ruffled by the previous discussion. "Let us but work together as heretofore; and I trust each of us shall be found doing the work of a faithful servant to that good old cause for which we have heretofore drawn the sword."

So saying, he took his hat, and bidding Bridgenorth farewell, declared his intention of returning in the evening.

"Fare thee well," said Bridgenorth; "to that use wilt thou find me ever a true and devoted adherent. I will act by that counsel of thine, and will not even ask thee—though it may grieve my heart as parent—with whom, or where, thou hast intrusted thy child. I will try to cut off, and cast from me, even my right hand, and my right eye; but for thee, Christian, if thou dost deal otherwise than prudently and honestly in this matter, it is what God and man will require at thy hand."

"Fear not me," said Christian, hastily, and left the place, agitated by reflections of no pleasant kind.

"I ought to have persuaded him to return," he said, as he stepped out into the street. "Even his lingering in this neighbourhood may spoil the plan, which depends the rise of my fortunes—ay, and of his child's. Will men say I have ruined her, when I shall have raised her to the dazzling height of the Duchess of Portsmouth, and perhaps made her mother to a long line of Princes? Chiffinch hath watched for opportunity; and the voluptuary's fortune depends on his gratifying the taste of his master for variety. If she makes an impression, it must be a deep one; and once seated in his affections, I fear of her being supplanted.—What will her father say? Will he, like a prudent man, put his shame in his pocket, because it is well gilded? or will he think it wrong to make a display of moral wrath and parental frenzy? I fear the latter—He has ever kept too strict course to admit his conniving at such license. But what will his anger avail?—I need not be seen in the matter—those who are, will care little for the resentment of a country Puritan. And after all, what I am labouring to bring about is best for himself, the duchess, and, above all, for me, Edward Christian."

With such base opiates did this unhappy wretch lull his own conscience, while anticipating the disgrace of his friend's family, and the ruin of a near relative, committed in confidence to his charge. The character of this man was of no common description; nor was it by an ordinary road that he had arrived at the present climax of unfeeling and infamous selfishness.

Edward Christian, as the reader is aware, was the father of that William Christian, who was the principal instrument in delivering up the Island of Man to the Republic, and who became the victim of the Countess of Derby's revenge on that account. Both had been educated as Puritans, but William was a soldier, which somewhat modified the strictness of his religious opinions; Edward, a civilian, seemed to maintain these principles in the utmost rigour. But it was only seeming. The exactness of deportment, which procured him great honour and influence among the sober party, as they were wont to term themselves, covered a voluptuous disposition, the gratification of which was sweet to him as stolen waters, and pleasant as bread eaten in secret. While, therefore, his seeming godliness brought him worldly gain, his secret pleasures compensated for his outward austerity; until the restoration, and the Countess's violent proceedings against his brother, interrupted the course of both. He then fled from his native island, burning with the desire of revenging his brother's death—the only passion foreign to his own gratification which he was ever known to cherish, and which was also at least partly selfish, since it concerned the restoration of his own fortunes.

He found easy access to Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, who, in right of his Duchess, claimed such of the Derby estates as had been bestowed by the Parliament on his celebrated father-in-law, Lord Fairfax. His influence at the Court of Charles, where a jest was a better plea than a long claim of faithful service, was so successfully exerted, as to contribute greatly to the depression of that loyal and ill-rewarded family. But Buckingham was incapable, even for his own interest, of pursuing the steady course which Christian suggested to him; and his vacillation probably saved the remnant of the large estates of the Earl of Derby.

Mean time, Christian was too useful a follower to be dismissed. From Buckingham, and others of the stamp, he did not affect to conceal the laxity of his morals; but, towards the numerous and powerful party to which he belonged, he was able to disguise them by a seeming gravity of exterior, which he never laid aside. Indeed, so wide and absolute was then the distinction betwixt the Court and the city, that a man might have for some time played two several parts, as in two different spheres, without its being discovered in the one that he exhibited himself in a different light in the other. Besides, when a man of talent shows himself an able and useful partisan, his party will continue to protect and accredit him, in spite of conduct the most contradictory to their own principles. Some facts are, in such cases, denied—some are glossed over—and party zeal is permitted to cover at least as many defects as ever doth charity.

Edward Christian had often need of the partial indulgence of his friends; but he experienced it, for he was eminently useful. Buckingham, and other courtiers of the same class, however dissolute in their lives, were desirous of keeping some connexion with the Dissenting or Puritanic party, as it was termed; thereby to strengthen themselves against their opponents at Court. In such intrigues, Christian was a notable agent; and at one time had nearly procured an absolute union between a class which professed the most rigid principles of religion and morality, and the latitudinarian courtiers, who set all principle at defiance.

Amidst the vicissitudes of a life of intrigue, during which Buckingham's ambitious schemes and his own repeatedly sent him across the Atlantic, it was Edward Christian's boast that he never lost sight of his principal object—revenge on the Countess of Derby. He maintained a close and intimate correspondence with his native island, so as to be perfectly informed of whatever took place there; and he stimulated, on every favourable opportunity, the cupidity of Buckingham to possess himself of this petty kingdom, by procuring the forfeiture of its present Lord. It was not difficult to keep his patron's wild wishes alive on this topic, for his own mercurial imagination attached particular charms to the idea of becoming a sort of sovereign even in this little island; and he was, like Catiline, as covetous of the property of others, as he was profuse of his own.

But it was not until the pretended discovery of the Papist Plot that the schemes of Christian could be brought to ripen; and then, so odious were the Catholics in the eyes of the credulous people of England, that, upon the accusation of the most infamous of mankind, common informers, the scourings of jails, and the refuse of the whipping-post, the most atrocious charges against persons of the highest rank and fairest character, were readily received and credited.

This was a period which Christian did not fail to improve. He drew close his intimacy with Bridgenorth, which had indeed never been interrupted, and the same time bent her brows, and shook her head sternly.

After a moment's consideration, Julian could place but one interpretation upon Fenella's appearance and conduct, and that was, by supposing her lady had come up to London, and had despatched this mute attendant, as a confidential person, to apprise him of some change of her intended operations, which might hinder the delivery of her letters to Harman, alias Penwiche, superintendent, or perhaps dangerous. He made signs to Fenella, demanding to know whether she had any commission from the Countess. She nodded. Had she any letter? he continued, by the same mode of inquiry. She shook her head impatiently and, waiting heavily along the passage, made a sign to him to follow. He did so, having little doubt that he was about to be conducted into the Countess's presence, but his surprise, at first excited by Fenella's appearance, was increased by the rapidity and ease with which she seemed to work the dusty and decayed wires of the dilapidated heavy grate, so that with which he had seen her formerly lead the way through the gloomy vaults of Castle Blyden, in the Isle of Man.

When he recollected, however, that Fenella had accompanied the Countess on a long visit to London, it appeared not improbable that she might then have acquired this kind of knowledge, which seemed so accurate. Many foreigners, dependent on the Queen or Queen Dowager, had apartments in the Savoy. Many Catholic priests also found refuge in its towers, under various disguises, and in defiance of the severity of the laws against Popery. What was more likely than that the Countess of Derby's Catholic and a Frenchwoman, should have had secret communications among such people, and that the execution of such should be intrusted, at least occasionally, to Fenella?

Thus reflecting, Julian continued to follow her light and active footsteps as she glided from the Strand to Spring Garden, and thence into the Park.

It was not early in the morning, and the Mall was unobscured, save by a few walkers, who frequented those shades for the wholesome purpose of air and exercise. Spirited gayety and display did not come forth, at that period, until noon was approaching. All readers have heard that the whole space where the Horse Guards are now built, made, in the time of Charles II., a part of St. James's Park; and that the old building, now called the Treasury, was a part of the ancient Palace of Whitehall, which was thus immediately connected with the Park. The canal had been constructed, by the celebrated Le Notre, for the purpose of draining the Park; and it communicated with the Thames by a decayed arch with a quantity of the river waterflow. It was towards this decay that Fenella bent her way with unabated speed, and they were approaching a group of two or three gentlemen who gathered by its banks, when, on looking closely at him who appeared to be the chief of the party, Julian felt his heart beat uncommonly thick, as if conscious of approaching some one of the highest consequence.

The person whom he looked upon was past the middle age of life of a dark complexion, corresponding with the long, black, full bottomed perwig, which he wore instead of his own hair. His dress was plain black velvet, with a diamond star however on his cloak, which hung carelessly over one shoulder. His features, strongly lined even to harshness, had yet an expression of dignified good humour; he was well and strongly built, walked upright and yet easily, and had upon the whole the air of a person of the highest consideration. He kept rather in advance of his companions, but turned and spoke to them, from time to time, with much affability and probably with some liveliness, judging by the smiles and sometimes the merriment and laughter, by which some of his ladies were received by his attendants. They also wore only morning dresses, but their looks and manner were those of men of rank, in presence of one in position still more elevated. They shared the attention of their principal in common with seven or eight little black curly-haired spaniels, or rather, as they are now called, corgies, which attended their master a cluster, and perhaps with as deep movements of attachment as the hounds of the group, and whose gambols, which seemed to afford him much amusement, must be sometimes checked, and sometimes encouraged. In addition to this party, a lackey, a groom, was also in attendance, with one or two little baskets and bags, from which the gentlemen would have descended took from time to time a handful of seeds, and amused himself with throwing them to the waterfowl.

That the King's favourite occupation, together with his remarkable countenance, and the deportment of the rest of the company towards him, satisfied John Peveril that he was approaching perhaps indeed surely, next to the person of Charles Stewart, the second of that unhappy name.

While he hesitated to follow his dumb guide to near, and felt the embarrassment of being unable to communicate to her his repugnance to further intimacy, a person in the royal retinue touched a light and lively air on the flagolet, at a signal from the King who desired to have some more repeated, which he struck him in the theatre on the preceding evening. While the good natured Monarch marked him with his foot and with the motion of his hand, Fenella continued to approach him, and threw into her mien the appearance of one who was at forced, as it were, in spite of herself, by the sounds of the instrument.

Anxious to know how this was to end, and astonished to see the dumb girl imitate so accurately the manner of one who actually heard the musical notes, Peveril also drew near, though at somewhat greater distance.

The King looked good humouredly at both, as if he admitted their musical enthusiasm as an excuse for their intrusion, but his eyes became fixed on Fenella, whose form and appearance, although rather singular than beautiful, had something in them wild, fantastic, and as being so even captivating, to an eye which had been gratified perhaps to satiety with the ordinary forms of female beauty. She did not appear to notice how closely she was observed, but as if acting under an irresistible impulse, derived from the music to which she seemed to listen, she undid the bands around which her long tresses were wound, and flinging them suddenly over her slender person, as if using them as a natural veil, she began to dance with inflexible grace and agility, to the tune which the flagolet played.

Peveril lost almost his sense of the King's presence, when he observed with what wonderful grace and agility Fenella kept time to notes, which could only be known to her by the motions of the musician's fingers. He had heard, indeed, among other prodigies, of a person in Fenella's unhappy situation acquiring, by some unaccountable and mysterious tact, the power of acting as an instrument's substitute, nay, becoming so accurate a performer as to be capable of leading a musical band; and he had also heard of deaf and dumb persons dancing with sufficient accuracy, by observing the motions of their partners. But Fenella's performance seemed more wonderful than either; once the musician was guided by his written notes, and the dancer by the motions of the others; whereas Fenella had no instrument save what she seemed to gather, with infinite accuracy, by observing the motion of the organ's keys on his small instrument.

As for the King, who was ignorant of the particular circumstances which rendered Fenella's performance almost marvellous, he was contented, at his first commencement to authorize what seemed to him the frolic of this singular-looking dame, by a good-humoured smile; but when he perceived the exquisite truth and justice, as well as the wonderful combination of grace and agility, with which she executed to his favourite air a dance which was perfectly new to him, Charles turned his more susceptible into something like enthusiastic opinion. He bore time to her motions with the movement of his hand, accompanied with head and with hand—and seemed, like himself, carried away by the enthusiasm of the game art.

After a rapid yet graceful succession of entrechats, Fenella introduced a slow movement, which terminated the dance; then dropping a profound curtsy, she continued to stand motionless before the King, her arms folded on her bosom, her head stooped, and her eyes cast down, after the manner of an Oriental slave; while through the misty veil of her shadowy locks it might be observed, that the colour which exercise had called to her cheeks was dying fast away, and resigning them to their native dusky hue.

"By my honour," exclaimed the King, "she is like a fairy who trips it in moonlight. There must be more of air and fire than of earth in her composition. It is well poor Nelly Gwyn saw her not, or she would have died of grief and envy.—Come, gentlemen, which of you contrived this pretty piece of morningpastime?"

The courtiers looked at each other, but none of them felt authorized to claim the merit of a service so agreeable.

"We must ask the quick-eyed nymph herself, then," said the King; and, looking at Fenella, he added, "Tell us, my pretty one, to whom we owe the pleasure of seeing you?—I suspect the Duke of Buckingham; for this is exactly a tour de son métier."

Fenella, on observing that the King addressed her, bowed low, and shook her head, in signal that she did not understand what he said. "Odds-fish, that is true," said the King; "she must perforce be a foreigner—her complexion and agility speak it. France or Italy has had the moulding of these elastic limbs, dark cheek, and eye of fire. He then put to her in French, and again in Italian, the question, "By whom she had been sent hither?"

At the second repetition, Fenella threw back her wiling tresses, so as to show the melancholy which sat on her brow; while she sadly shook her head, and intimated by imperfect muttering, but of the softest and most plaintive kind, her organic deficiency.

"Is it possible Nature can have made such a fault?" said Charles. "Can she have left so curious a piece as thou art without the melody of voice, whilst she has made thee so exquisitely sensible to the beauty of sound?—Stay; what means this? and what young fellow are you bringing up there? Oh, the master of the show, I suppose.—Friend," he added, addressing himself to Peveril, who, on the signal of Fenella, stepped forward almost instinctively, and knelt down, "we thank thee for the pleasure of this morning.—My Lord Marquis, you rooked me at piquet last night; for which disloyal deed thou shalt now atone, by giving a couple of pieces to this honest youth, and five to the girl."

As the nobleman drew out his purse, an^d came forward to perform the King's generous commission, Julian felt some embarrassment ere he was able to explain that he had no title to be benefited by the young person's performance, and that his Majesty had mistaken his character.

"And who art thou, then, my friend?" said Charles; "but, above all, and particularly, who is this dancing nymph, whom thou standest waiting on like an attendant faun?"

"The young person is a retainer of the Countess-Dowager of Derby, so please your Majesty," said Peveril, in a low tone of voice; "and I am"—

"Hold, hold," said the King; "this is a dance to another tune, and not fit for a place so public. Hark thee, friend; do thou and the young woman follow Empson where he will conduct thee.—Empson, carry them—hark in thy ear."

"May it please your Majesty, I ought to say," said Peveril, "that I am guiltless of any purpose of intrusion"—

"Now a plague on him who can take no hint," said the King, cutting short his apology. "Odds-fish, man, there are times when civility is the greatest impertinence in the world. Do thou follow Empson, and amuse thyself for a half hour's space with the fairy's company, till we shall send for you."

Charles spoke this not without casting an anxious eye around, and in a tone which intimated apprehension of being overheard. Julian could only bow obedience, and follow Empson, who was the same person that played so rarely on the flageolet.

When they were out of sight of the King and his party, the musician wished to enter into conversation with his companions, and addressed himself first to Fenella, with a broad compliment of, "By the mass, ye dance rarely—ne'er a slut on the boards shows such a shank! I would be content to play to you till my throat were as dry as my whistle. Come, be a little free—old Rowley will not quit the park till nine. I will carry you to Spring Gardens, and bestow sweet cakes and a quart of Rhenish on both of you; and we'll be cameradoes.—What the devil! no answer?—How's this, brother?—Is this neat wench of yours deaf or dumb, or both? I should laugh at that, and she trip it so well to the flageolet."

To rid himself of this fellow's discourse, Peveril answered him in French, that he was a foreigner, and spoke no English; glad to escape, though at the expense of a fiction, from the additional embarrassment of a fool, who was likely to ask more questions than his own wisdom might have enabled him to answer.

"Etranger—that means stranger," muttered their guide; "more French dogs and jades come to lick the good English butter off our bread, or perhaps an Italian puppet-show. Well, if it were not that they have a mortal enmity to the whole gamut, this were enough to make any honest fellow turn Puritan. But if I am to play to her at the Duchess's, I'll be d—d but I put her out in the tune, just to teach her to have the impudence to come to England, and to speak no English."

Having muttered to himself this truly British resolution, the musician walked briskly on towards a large house near the bottom of St. James Street, and entered the court, by a grated door, from the Park, of which the mansion commanded an extensive prospect.

Peveril finding himself in front of a handsome portico, under which opened a stately pair of folding-doors, was about to ascend the steps that led to the main entrance, when his guide seized him by the arm, exclaiming, "Hold, Mounseer! What! you'll lose nothing, I see, for want of courage; but you must keep the back way, for all your fine doublet. Here it is not, knock and it shall be opened; but may be instead, knock and you shall be knocked."

Suffering himself to be guided by Empson, Julian deviated from the principal door, to one which opened, with less ostentation, in an angle of the court-yard. On a modest tap from the flute-player, admittance was afforded him and his companions by a footman, who conducted them through a variety of stone passages, to a very handsome summer parlour, where a lady, or something resembling one, dressed in a style of extra elegance, was trifling with a play-book while she finished her chocolate. It would not be easy to describe her, but by weighing her natural good qualities against the affectations which counterbalanced them. She would have been handsome, but for rouge and minauderie—would have been civil, but for overstrained airs of patronage and condescension—would have had an agreeable voice, had she spoken in her natural tone—and fine eyes, had she not made such desperate hard use of them. She could only spoil a pretty ankle by too liberal display; but her shape, though she could not yet be thirty years old, had the embonpoint which might have suited better with ten years more advanced. She pointed Empson to a seat with the air of a Duchess, and asked him, languidly, how he did this age, that she had not seen him? and what folks these were he had brought with him?

"Foreigners, madam; d—d foreigners," answered Empson; "starving beggars, that our old friend has picked up in the Park this morning—the wench dances, and the fellow plays on the Jew's trump, I believe. On my life, madam, I begin to be ashamed of old Rowley; I must discard him, unless he keeps better company in future."

"Fie, Empson," said the lady; "consider it is our duty to countenance him, and keep him afloat; and indeed I always make a principle of it. Hark ye, he comes not hither this morning?"

"He will be here," answered Empson, "in the walking of a minuet."

"My God!" exclaimed the lady, with unaffected alarm; and starting up with utter neglect of her usual airs of graceful languor, she tripped as swiftly as a milk-maid into an adjoining apartment, where they heard presently a few words of eager and animated discussion.

"Something to be put out of the way, I suppose," said Empson. "Well for madam I gave her the hint. There he goes, the happy swain."

Julian was so situated, that he could, from the same casement through which Empson was peeping, observe a man in a laced roquelaure, and carrying his rapier under his arm, glide from the door by which he had himself entered, and out of the court, keeping as much as possible under the shade of the buildings.

The lady re-entered at this moment, and observing how Empson's eyes were directed, said, with a slight appearance of hurry, "A gentleman of the Duchess of Portsmouth's with a billet; and so tiresomely pressing for an answer, that I was obliged to write without my diamond pen. I have daubed my fingers, I dare say," she added, looking at a very pretty hand, and presently after dipping her fingers in a little silver vase of rose-water. "But that little exotic monster of yours, Empson, I hope she really understands no English?—On my life she coloured.—Is she such a rare dancer?—I must see her dance, and hear him play on the Jew's harp."

"Dance!" replied Empson; "she danced well enough when I played to her. I can make any thing dance. Old Counsellor Clubfoot danced when he had a fit of the gout; you have seen no such pas secul in the theatre. I would engage to make the Archbishop of Canterbury dance the hays like a Frenchman. There is nothing in dancing; it all lies in the music. Rowley does not know that now. He saw this poor wench dance; and thought so much on't, when it was all along of me. I would have defied her to sit still. And Rowley gives her the credit of it, and five pieces to boot; and I have only two for my morning's work!"

"True, Master Empson," said the lady; "but you are of the family, though in a lower station; and you ought to consider"—

"By G—, madam," answered Empson, "all I consider is, that I play the best flageolet in England; and that they can no more supply my place, if they were to discard me, than they could fill Thames from Fleet-Ditch."

"Well, Master Empson, I do not dispute but you are a man of talents," replied the lady; "still I say, mind the main chance—you please the ear to-day—another has the advantage of you to-morrow."

"Never, mistress, while ears have the heavenly power of distinguishing one note from another."

"Heavenly power, say you, Master Empson?" said the lady.

"Ay, madam, heavenly; for some very neat verses which we had at our festival say,

'What know we of the blest above,
But that they sing and that they love.'

It is Master Waller wrote them, as I think; who, upon my word, ought to be encouraged."

"And so should you, my dear Empson," said the dame, yawning, "were it only for the honour you do to your own profession. But in the mean time, will you ask these people to have some refreshment?—and will you take some yourself?—the chocolate is that which the ambassador Portuguese fellow brought over to the Queen."

"If it be genuine," said the musician.

"How, sir?" said the fair one, half rising from her pile of cushions—"not genuine, and in this house!—Let me understand you, Master Empson—I think, when I first saw you, you scarce knew chocolate from coffee."

"By G—, madam," answered the flageolet-player, "you are perfectly right. And how can I show better how much I have profited by your ladyship's excellent cheer, except by being critical?"

"You stand excused, Master Empson," said the petite maitresse, sinking gently back on the downy couch, from which a momentary irritation had startled her—"I think the chocolate will please you, though scarce equal to what we had from the Spanish resident Mendoza.—But we must offer these strange people something. Will you ask them if they would have coffee and chocolate, or cold wild-fowl, fruit and wine? They must be treated, so as to show them where they are, since here they are."

"Unquestionably, madam," said Empson; "but I have just at this instant forgot the French for chocolate, hot bread, coffee, game, and drinkables."

"It is odd," said the lady; "and I have forgot my French and Italian at the same moment. But it signifies little—I will order the things to be brought, a they will remember the names of them themselves."

Empson laughed loudly at this jest, and pained his soul that the cold sirloin, which entered immediately after, was the best emblem of roast beef all the world over. Plentiful refreshments were offered to all the party, of which both Fenella and Peveril partook."

In the mean while the flageolet-player drew closer to the side of the lady of the mansion—their intimacy was cemented, and their spirits set afloat, by a glass of liqueur, which gave them additional confidence in discussing the characters, as well of the superior attendants of the Court, as of the inferior rank, to which they themselves might be supposed to belong.

The Lady, indeed, during this conversation, frequently exerted her complete and absolute superiority over Master Empson; in which that musical gentleman humbly acquiesced whenever the circumstance was recalled to his attention, whether in the way of blunt contradiction, sarcastic insinuation, downright assumption of higher importance, or in any of the other various modes by which such superiority is usually asserted and maintained. But the lady's obvious love of scandal was the lure which very soon brought her again down from the dignified port which for a moment she assumed, and placed her once more on a gossiping level with her companion.

Their conversation was too trivial, and too much allied to petty Court intrigues, with which he was totally unacquainted, to be in the least interesting to Julian. As it continued for more than an hour, he soon ceased to pay the least attention to a discourse consisting of nicknames, patchwork, and innuendo; and employed himself in reflecting on his own complicated affairs, and the probable issue of his approaching audience with the King, which had been brought about by so singular an agent, and by means so unexpected. He often looked to his guide, Fenella; and observed that she was, for the greater part of the time, drowned in deep and abstracted meditation. But three or four times—and it was when the assumed airs and affected importance of the musician and their hostess rose to the most extravagant excess—he observed that Fenella dealt askance on them some of those bitter and almost blighting elfin looks, which in the Isle of Man were held to imply contemptuous execration. There was something in all her manner so extraordinary, joined to her sudden appearance, and her demeanour in the King's presence, so oddly, yet so well contrived, to procure him a private audience—which he might by graver means, have sought in vain—that it almost justified the idea, though he smiled at it internally, that the little mute agent was aided in her machinations by the kindred imps, to whom, according to Manx superstition, her genealogy was to be traced.

Another idea sometimes occurred to Julian, though he rejected the question, as being equally wild with those doubts which referred Fenella to a race different from that of mortals—"Was she really afflicted with those organical imperfections which had always seemed to sever her from humanity?—If not, what could be the motives of so young a creature practising so dreadful a penance for such an unremitted term of years? And how formidable must be the strength of mind which could condemn itself to so terrific a sacrifice—How deep and strong the purpose for which it was undertaken!"

But a brief recollection of past events enabled him to dismiss this conjecture as altogether wild and missionary. He had but to call to memory the various stratagems practised by his light-hearted companion, the young Earl of Derby, upon this forlorn girl—the conversations held in her presence, in which the character of a creature so irritable and sensitive on all occasions, was freely, and sometimes ironically discussed, without her expressing the least acquaintance with what was going forward, to convince him that so deep a deception could never have been practised for so many years, by a being of a mind so peculiarly jealous and irascible. He renounced, therefore, the idea, and turned his thoughts to his own affairs, and in his approaching interview with his Sovereign; in which meditation he proposed to leave him, until we briefly review the changes which had taken place in the situation of Alice Bridgenorth.

CHAPTER XXXI.

I fear the devil worst when gown and cassock.
Or, in the lack of them, old Calvin's cloak, Conceals his cloven hoof.—Anonymous.

THOMAS PEVERIL had scarce set sail for Whitehaven, when Alice Bridgenorth and her governante, at the strict command of her father, were embarked with great speed and secrecy on board of a bark bound for Liverpool. Christian accompanied them on their voyage, as the friend to whose guardianship Alice was to be consigned during any future separation from her father, and whose amusing conversation, joined to his pleasing though cold manners, as well as his near relationship, induced Alice, in her forlorn situation, to consider her fate as fortunate in having such a guardian.

At Liverpool, as the reader already knows, Christian took the first overt step in the villany which he had contrived against the innocent girl, by exposing her at a meeting-house to the unhallowed gaze of Chiffinch, in order to convince him she was possessed of such uncommon beauty as might well deserve the ambitious promotion to which they meditated to raise her.

Highly satisfied with her personal appearance, Chiffinch was no less so with the sense and delicacy of her conversation, when he met her in company with her uncle afterwards in London. The simplicity, and at the same time the spirit of her remarks, made him regard her as his scientific attendant the cook might have been a newly invented sauce, sufficiently piquante in its qualities, to awaken the jaded appetite of a cloyed and gorged epicure. She was, he said and swore, the very corner-stone on which, with proper management, and with his instructions, a few honest fellows might build a Court fortune.

That the necessary introduction might take place, the confederates judged fit she should be put under the charge of an experienced lady, whom some called Mistress Chiffinch, and others Chiffinch's mistress, one of those obliging creatures who are willing to discharge all the duties of a wife, without the inconvenient and indissoluble ceremony.

It was one, and not perhaps the least prejudicial consequence of the license of that ill-governed time, that the bounds betwixt virtue and vice were so far smoothed down and levelled, that the frail wife, or the idle friend who was no wife, did not necessarily lose their place in society; but, on the contrary, if they moved in the higher circles, were permitted and encouraged to mingle with women whose rank was plain, and whose reputation was untainted.

A regular liaison, like that of Chiffinch and his fair friend, inferred little scandal; and such was his influence, as prime minister of his master's pleasures, that

Charles himself expressed it, the lady whom we introduced to our readers in the last chapter, had obtained a brevet commission to rank as a married woman. And to do the gentle dame justice, no wife could have been more attentive to forward his plans, more liberal in disposing of his income.

She inhabited a set of apartments called Chiffinch's, the scene of many an intrigue, both of love and politics; and where Charles often held his private parties in the evening, when, as frequently happened, the ill-humour of the Duchess of Portsmouth, his reigning Sultana, prevented his supping with her. The hold which such an arrangement gave a man like Chiffinch, used as he well knew how to use it, made him of too much consequence to be slighted even by the first persons in the state, unless they stood aloof from all manner of politics and Court intrigue.

In the charge of Mistress Chiffinch, and of him whose name she bore, Edward Christian placed the daughter of his sister, and of his confiding friend, calmly contemplating her ruin as an event certain to follow; and hoping to ground upon it his own chance of a more assured fortune, than a life spent in intrigue had hitherto been able to procure for him.

The innocent Alice, without being able to discover what was wrong either in the scenes of unusual luxury with which she was surrounded, or in the manners of her hostess, which, both from nature and policy, were kind and caressing—felt nevertheless an instinctive apprehension that all was not right—a feeling in the human mind, allied, perhaps, to that sense of danger which animals exhibit when placed in the vicinity of the natural enemies of their race, and which makes birds cower when the hawk is in the air, and beasts tremble when the tiger is abroad in the desert. There was a heaviness at her heart which she could not dispel; and the few hours which she had already spent at Chiffinch's, were like those passed in a prison by one unconscious of the cause or event of his captivity. It was the third morning after her arrival in London, that the scene took place which we now recur to.

The impertinence and vulgarity of Empson, which was permitted to him as an unrivalled performer upon his instrument, were exhausting themselves at the expense of all other musical professors, and Mistress Chiffinch was listening with careless indifference, when some one was heard speaking loudly, and with animation, in the inner apartment.

"O gemini and gilliflower water!" exclaimed the damsel, startled out of her fine airs into her natural vulgarity of exclamation, and running to the door of communication—"if he has not come back again after all!—and if old Rowley!"

A tap at the further and opposite door here arrested her attention—she quitted the handle of that which she was about to open as speedily as if it had burnt her fingers, and, moving back towards her couch, asked, "Who is there?"

"Old Rowley himself, madam," said the King, entering the apartment with his usual air of easy composure.

"O crimini!—your Majesty!—I thought!"

"That I was out of hearing, doubtless," said the King; "and spoke of me as folks speak of absent friends. Make no apology. I think I have heard ladies say of their lace, that a rent is better than a darn.—Nay, be seated.—Where is Chiffinch?"

"He is down at York-House, your Majesty," said the dame, recovering, though with no small difficulty, the calm affectation of her usual demeanour. "Shall I send your Majesty's commands?"

"I will wait his return," said the King.—"Permit me to taste your chocolate."

"There is some fresh frothed in the office," said the lady; and using a little silver call, or whistle, a black boy, superbly dressed like an Oriental page, with gold bracelets on his naked arms, and a gold collar around his equally bare neck, attended with the favourite beverage of the morning, in an apparatus of the richest china.

While he sipped his cup of chocolate, the King looked round the apartment, and observing Fenella, Peveril, and the musician, who remained standing beside a large Indian screen, he continued, addressing Mistress Chiffinch, though with polite indifference, "I sent you the fiddles this morning—or rather the flute—Empson, and a fairy elf whom I met in the Park, who dances divinely. She has brought us the very newest saraband from the Court of Queen Mab, and I sent her here, that you may see it at leisure."

"Your Majesty does me by far too much honour," said Chiffinch, her eyes properly cast down, and her accents minced into becoming humility.

"Nay, little Chiffinch," answered the King, in a tone of so contemptuous familiarity as was consistent with his good breeding. "It was not altogether for thine own private ear, though quite deserving of a street censure, but I thought Nelly had been with thee this morning."

"I can send Majest for her, your Majesty," answered the lady.

"Nay, I will not trouble your little heathen Sultan to go so far. Still it strikes me that Chiffinch and you had some—some country cousin, or such a matter—is there not such a person?"

"There is a young person from the country," said Mistress Chiffinch, striving to conceal a considerable portion of embarrassment; "but she is unprepared for such an honour as to be admitted into your Majesty's presence, and"—

"And therefore the fitter to remove it, Chiffinch. There is nothing in nature so beautiful as the first blush of a little rustic between joy and fear and wonder and curiosity. It is the dawn on the peach—put it decay as soon!—the fruit remains, but the first high colouring and exquisite flavour are gone. Never put up thy lip for the matter, Chiffinch, for it is as I tell you, so pray let us have la belle comtesse."

Mistress Chiffinch, more embarrassed than ever, again advanced towards the door of communication, which she had been in the act of opening when his Majesty entered. But just as she coughed prettily perhaps as a signal to some one within, voices were again heard in a raised tone of altercation—the door was flung open, and Alice rushed out of the inner apartment, followed to the door of it by the enterprising Duke of Buckingham, who stood fixed with astonishment on finding his parent of the flying fair one had hurried him into the presence of the King.

Alice Bridgenorth appeared too much transported with anger to permit her to pay attention to the rank or character of the company into which she had thus suddenly entered. "I remain no longer here, madam," she said to Mrs. Chiffinch in a tone of uncontrolable indignation; "I leave instantly a house where I am opposed in company which I detest, and to solicitations which I despise."

The dismayed Mistress Chiffinch could only unglance her, in broken whispers, to be silent, adding while she pointed to Charles, who stood with his eyes fixed rather on his awkward creature than on the game which he pursued. "The King—the King!"

"If I am in the King's presence," said Alice, aloud, and in the same torrent of passionate feeling, while her eyes sparkled through tears of resentment and tremulous indignation, "it is the better—it is his Majesty's duty to protect me; and on his protection I throw myself."

These words, which were spoken aloud, and boldly, at once recalled Julian to himself, who had hitherto stood, as it were, bewildered. He approached Alice, and whispering in her ear that she had beside her one who would defend her with his life, implored her to trust to his guardianship in this emergency.

Clinging to his arm in all the ecstasies of gratitude and joy, the spirit which had so lately invigorated Alice in her own defence, gave way in a flood of tears, when she saw herself supported by him whom perhaps she most wished to recognize as her protector. She permitted Feveril gently to draw her back towards the screen before which he had been standing; where, holding by his arm, but at the same time endeavouring to conceal herself behind him, they waited the conclusion of a scene so singular.

The King seemed at first so much surprised at the unexpected apparition of the Duke of Buckingham, as to pay little or no attention to Alice, who had been the means of thus unceremoniously intruding his Grace into the presence at a most unseasonable moment. In that intriguing Court, it had not been the first time that the Duke had ventured to enter the lists of gallantry in rivalry of his Sovereign, which made the present insult the more intolerable. His purpose of being concealed in those private apartments was explained by the exclamations of Alice; and Charles, notwithstanding the placidity of his disposition, and his habitual guard over his passions, resisted the attempt to induce his destined mistress, as an English Sultan would have done the insolence of a vizier, who anticipated his intended purchase of captive beauty in the slave market. The swarthy features of Charles reddened, and the strong lines on his dark visage seemed to become inflated, as he said in a voice which faltered with passion, "Buckingham, you dared not have thus insulted your equal! To your master you may securely offer any affront, and he rank gives his sword to the scabbard."

The haughty Duke did not brook this taunt thus offered. "My sword," he said, with emphasis, "was never in the scabbard when your Majesty's sword required it should be unsheathed."

Your Grace means, when no service was required for its master's interest," said the King; "for you could only gain the carotid of a Duke by fighting for the royal crown. But it is over—I have treated you as a friend—a companion—almost an equal—you have repaid me with ingratitude and ingratitude."

"Sir," answered the Duke firmly, but respectfully, "I am unhappy in your displeasure; yet this far fortunate, that while your words can only honour, they cannot impair or take it away—it is hard," he added, lowering his voice, so as only to be heard by the King,—"it is hard that the signal of a peevish wench should cancel the services of so many years."

"It is harder," said the King, in the same subdued tone, which both preserved through the rest of the conversation, "that a wench's bright eyes can make a noblesman forget the decrees due to his Sovereign's prerogative."

"May I presume to ask your Majesty what decrees are those?" said the Duke.

Charles bit his lip to keep himself from smiling. "Buckingham," he said, "this is a foolish question, and we must not forget, (as we have nearly done) that we have an audience to witness this scene, and should walk the stage with dignity. I will show you your fault in private."

"It is enough that your Majesty has been displeased, and that I have unhappily born the occasion," said the Duke reverently, "although ignorant of any persons beyond a few words of gallantry, and I am thus low for your Majesty's pardon."

So saying, he bowed gracefully down. "Then rest it, George," said the placable Prince. "I believe thou wilt be wiser wroth of offending, than I of forgiving."

"Long may your Majesty live to give the offence, with which it is your royal pleasure at present to charge my innocence," said the Duke.

"What mean you by that, my lord?" said Charles, the angry shade returning to his brow for a moment.

"My lord," replied the Duke, "you are too honourable to deny your custom of shooting with Cupid's bird bolts in other men's warrens. You have in all the royal right of free forestry over every man's park, it is hard that you should be so much displeased at bearing a chance arrow whilst near your own park."

"No more of it," said the King; "but let us see where the dove has harboured."

"The Helen has found a Paris while we were quarrelling," replied the Duke.

"Rather an Orpheus," said the King; "and what a worse, one that is already provided with a Eurydice. She is clinging to the fiddler."

"It is more fright," said Buckingham, "like Rochester's, when he crept into the back-violet to hide himself from Sir Dermot O'Claver."

"We must make the people show their talents," said the King, "and stop their mouths with money and civility, or we shall have this foolish conceit over half the town."

The King then approached Julian, and desired him to take his instrument, and execute his female companion to perform a saraband.

"I had already the honour to inform your Majesty," said Julian, "that I cannot contribute to your pleasure in the way you command me, and that the young person is"— "A retainer of the Lady Pavia," said the King, upon those mind things not connected with his pleasures made a very slight impression. "Poor lady, she is in trouble about the lords in the Tower."

"Pardon me, sir," said Julian, "she is a dependent of the Countess of Derby."

"True, true," answered Charles; "it is indeed of lady Derby, who hath also her own distresses in these times. Do you know who taught the young person to dance? Some of her steps mightily resemble Le Jeune's of Paris."

"I presume she was taught abroad, sir," said Julian; "for myself, I am charged with some weighty business by the Countess, which I would willingly communicate to your Majesty."

"We will send you to our Secretary of State," said the King. "But this dancing envoy will oblige us once more, will she not?—Empson, now that I remember, it was to your pipe that she danced—Strike up, man, and put metal into her feet."

Empson began to play a well-known measure; and, as he had threatened, made more than one false note, until the King, whose ear was very accurate, rebuked him with, "Sirrah, art thou drunk at this early hour, or must thou too be playing thy slippery ricks with me? Thou thinkest thou art born to beat me, but I will have time beat into thee."

The hint was sufficient, and Empson took good care so to perform his air as to merit his high and deserved reputation. But on Fenella it made not the slightest impression. She rather leant than stood against the wall of the apartment; her countenance as pale as death, her arms and hands hanging down as if stiffened, and her existence only testified by the sobs which agitated her bosom, and the tears which flowed from her half-closed eyes.

"A plague on it," said the King, "some evil spirit is abroad this morning; and the wenches are all bewitched, I think. Cheer up, my girl. What, in the devil's name, has changed thee at once from a Nymph to a Niobe? If thou standest there longer, thou wilt grow to the very marble wall—Or—oddsfish, George, have you been bird-bolting in this quarter also?"

Ere Buckingham could answer to this charge, Julian again knelt down to the King, and prayed to be heard, were it only for five minutes. "The young woman," he said, "had been long in attendance on the Countess of Derby. She was bereaved of the faculties of speech and hearing."

"Oddsfish, man, and dances so well?" said the King. "Nay, all Gresham College shall never make me believe that."

"I would have thought it equally impossible, but for what I to-day witnessed," said Julian; "but only permit me, sir, to deliver the petition of my lady the Countess."

"And who art thou thyself, man?" said the Sovereign; "for though every thing which wears bodice and breast-knot has a right to speak to a King, and be answered, I know not that they have a title to audience through an envoy extraordinary."

"I am Julian Peveril of Derbyshire," answered the suppliant, "the son of Sir Geoffrey Peveril of Martindale Castle, who"—

"Body of me—the old Worcester man?" said the King. "Oddsfish, I remember him well—some harm has happened to him, I think—Is he not dead, or very sick at least?"

"Ill at ease, and it please your Majesty, but not ill in health. He has been imprisoned on account of alleged accession to this Plot."

"Look you there," said the King; "I knew he was in trouble; and yet how to help the stout old Knight, I can hardly tell. I can scarce escape suspicion of the Plot myself, though the principal object of it is to take away my own life. Were I to stir to save a plotter, I should certainly be brought in as an accessory.—Buckingham, thou hast some interest with those who built this fine state engine, or at least who have driven it on—be good-natured for once, though it is scarcely thy wont, and interfere to shelter our old Worcester friend, Sir Godfrey. You have not forgot him?"

"No, sir," answered the Duke; "for I never heard the name."

"It is Sir Geoffrey his Majesty would say," said Julian.

"And if his Majesty did say Sir Geoffrey, Master Peveril, I cannot see of what use I can be to your father," replied the Duke, coldly. "He is accused of a heavy crime; and a British subject so accused, can have no shelter either from prince or peer, but must stand to the award and deliverance of God and his country."

"Now, Heaven forgive thee thy hypocrisy, George," said the King, hastily. "I would rather hear the devil preach religion than thee teach patriotism.—Thou knowest as well as I, that the nation is in a scarlet fever for fear of the poor Catholics, who are not two men to five hundred; and that the public mind is so harrassed with new narrations of conspiracy, and fresh horrors every day, that people have as little real sense of what is just or unjust, as men who talk in their sleep of what is sense or nonsense. I have borne, and borne with it—I have seen blood flow on the scaffold, fearing to thwart the nation in its fury—and I pray to God that I or mine be not called on to answer for it. I will no longer swim with the torrent, which honour and conscience call upon me to stem—I will act the part of a Sovereign, and save my people from doing injustice, even in their own despite."

Charles walked hastily up and down the room as he expressed these unwonted sentiments, with energy equally unwonted. After a momentary pause, the Duke answered him gravely, "Spoken like a Royal King, sir; but—pardon me—not like a King of England."

Charles paused, as the Duke spoke, beside a window which looked full on Whitehall, and his eye was involuntarily attracted by the fatal window of the Banqueting House, out of which his unhappy father was conducted to execution. Charles was naturally, or, more properly, constitutionally, brave; but a life of pleasure, together with the habit of governing his course rather by what was expedient than by what was right, rendered him unapt to dare the same scene of danger or of martyrdom, which had closed his father's life and reign; and the thought came over his half-formed resolution, like the rain upon a kindling beacon. In another man, his perplexity would have seemed almost ludicrous; but Charles could not lose, even under these circumstances, the dignity and grace which were as natural to him as his indifference and his good-humour. "Our Council must decide in this matter," he said, looking to the Duke; "and be assured, young man," he added, addressing Julian, "your father shall not want an intercessor in his King, so far as the laws will permit my interference in his behalf."

Julian was about to retire, when Fenella, with a marked look, put into his hand a slip of paper, on which she had hastily written, "The packet—give him the packet."

After a moment's hesitation, during which he reflected that Fenella was the organ of the Countess's pleasure, Julian resolved to obey. "Permit me then, Sir," he said, "to place in your royal hands this packet, intrusted to me by the Countess of Derby. The letters have already been once taken from me; and I have little hope that I can now deliver them as they are addressed. I place them, therefore, in your royal hands, certain that they will evince the innocence of the writer."

The King shook his head as he took the packet reluctantly. "It is no safe office you have undertaken young man. A messenger has sometimes his throat cut for the sake of his despatches—But give them to me; and, Chiffinch, give me wax and a taper." He employed himself in folding the Countess's packet in another envelope. "Buckingham," he said, "you are evidence that I do not read them till the Council shall see them."

Buckingham approached, and offered his services in folding the parcel, but Charles rejected his assistance; and having finished his task, he sealed the packet with his own signet-ring. The Duke bit his lip and retired.

"And now, young man," said the King, "your Julian's embarrassment in passing Charing-Cross and Northumberland-House was so great as to excite the attention of the passengers; for he had to compose his steps so as to moderate the unequal and rapid pace of Fenella to the timid and faint progress of his left-hand companion; and while it would have been needless to address himself to the former, who could not comprehend him, he dared not speak himself to Alice, for fear of awakening into frenzy the jealousy, or at least the impatience, of Fenella.

Many passengers looked at them with wonder, and some with smiles; but Julian remarked that there were two who never lost sight of them, and to whom his situation, and the demeanour of his companions, seemed to afford matter of undisguised merriment. These were young men, such as may be seen in the same precincts in the present day, allowing for the difference in the fashion of their apparel. They abounded in periwig, and fluttered with many hundred yards of riband, disposed in bow-knots upon their sleeves, their breeches, and their waistcoats, in the very extremity of the existing mode. A quantity of lace and embroidery made their habits rather fine than tasteful. In a word, they were dressed in that caricature of the fashion, which sometimes denotes a hare-brained man of quality who has a mind to be distinguished as a fop of the first order, but is much more frequently the disguise of those who desire to be esteemed men of rank on account of their dress, having no other pretension to the distinction.

These two gallants passed Peveril more than once, linked arm in arm, then sauntered, so as to oblige him to pass them in turn, laughing and whispering during these manœuvres—staring broadly at Peveril and his female companions—and affording them, as they came into contact, none of those facilities of giving place, which are required on such occasions by the ordinary rules of the pavé.

Peveril did not immediately observe their impertinence; but when it was too gross to escape his notice, his gall began to arise; and in addition to all the other embarrassments of his situation, he had to combat the longing desire which he felt to cudgel handsomely the two coxcombs who seemed thus determined on insulting him. Patience and sufferance were indeed strongly imposed on him by circumstances; but at length it became scarcely possible to observe their dictates any longer.

When, for the third time, Julian found himself obliged, with his companions, to pass this troublesome brace of fops, they kept walking close behind him, speaking so loud as to be heard, and in a tone of perfect indifference whether he listened to them or not.

"This is bumpkin's best luck," said the taller of the two, (who was indeed a man of remarkable size,) alluding to the plainness of Peveril's dress, which was scarce fit for the streets of London—"Two such fine wenches, and under guard of a gray frock and an oaken riding-rod!"

"Nay, Puritan's luck rather, and more than enough of it," said his companion. "You may read Puritan in his pace and in his patience."

"Right as a pint bumper, Tom," said his friend—"Issachar is an ass that stoopeth between two burdens."

"I have a mind to ease long-eared Laurence of one of his encumbrances," said the shorter fellow. "That black-eyed sparkler looks as if she had a mind to run away from him."

"Ay," answered the taller, "and the blue-eyed trembler looks as if she would fall behind into my loving arms."

At these words, Alice, holding still closer by Peveril's arm than formerly, mended her pace almost to running, in order to escape from men whose language was so alarming; and Fenella walked hastily forward in the same manner, having perhaps caught from the men's gestures and demeanour, that apprehension which Alice had taken from their language.

Fearful of the consequences of a fray in the streets, which must necessarily separate him from these unprotected females, Peveril endeavoured to compound betwixt the prudence necessary for their protection and his own rising resentment; and as this troublesome pair of attendants endeavoured again to pass them close to Hungerford Stairs, he said to them, with constrained calmness, "Gentlemen, I owe you something for the attention you have bestowed on the affairs of a stranger. If you have any pretension to the name I have given you, you will tell me where you are to be found."

"And with what purpose," said the taller of the two, sneeringly, "does your most rustic gravity, or your most grave rusticity, require of us such information?"

So saying, they both faced about, in such a manner as to make it impossible for Julian to advance any farther.

"Make for the stairs, Alice," he said; "I will be with you in an instant." Then freeing himself with difficulty from the grasp of his companions, he cast his cloak hastily round his left arm, and said, sternly, to his opponents, "Will you give me your names, sirs; or will you be pleased to make way?"

"Not till we know for whom we are to give place," said one of them.

"For one who will else teach you what you want—Good manners," said Peveril, and advanced, as it to push between them.

They separated, but one of them stretched forth his foot before Peveril, as if he meant to trip him. The blood of his ancestors was already boiling within him, he struck the man in the face with the oaken rod which he had just sneered at, and throwing it from him, instantly unsheathed his sword. Both the others drew, and pushed at once; but he caught the point of the one rapier in his cloak, and parried the other thrust with his own weapon. He might have been less lucky in the second close, but a cry arose among the watermen, of "Shame, shame! two upon one!"

"They are men of the Duke of Buckingham's," said one fellow—"there's no safe meddling with them."

"They may be the devil's men, if they will," said an ancient Triton, flourishing his stretcher; "but I say fair play, and old England for ever; and I say, knock the gold-laced puppies down, unless they will fight turn-about with gray jerkin, like honest fellows, one down t'other come on."

The lower orders of London have in all times been remarkable for the delight which they have taken in club-law, or fist-law; and for the equity and impartiality with which they see it administered. The noble science of defence was then so generally known, that a bout at single rapier excited at that time as much interest and as little wonder as a boxing-match in our own days. The bystanders, experienced in such affrays, presently formed a ring, within which Peveril and the taller and more forward of his antagonists were soon engaged in close combat with their swords, whilst the other, overawed by the spectators, was prevented from interfering.

"Well done the tall fellow!"—"Well thrust, long-legs!"—"Huzza for two ells and a quarter!" were the sounds with which the fray was at first cheered; for Peveril's opponent not only showed great activity and skill in fence, but had also a decided advantage, from the anxiety with which Julian looked out for Alice Bridgenorth; the care for whose safety diverted him in the beginning of the onset from that which he ought to have exclusively bestowed on the defence of his life. A slight flesh-wound in the side at once punished, and warned him of, his inadvertence; when, turning his whole thoughts on the business in which he was engaged, and animated with anger against his impertinent intruder, the rencontre speedily began to assume another face, amidst cries of "Well done, gray jerkin!"—"Try the metal of his gold doublet!"—"Finely thrust!"—"Curiously parried!"—"There went another eyelet-hole to his brodered jerkin!"—"Fairly pinked, by G—d!" In fact, the last exclamation was uttered amid a general roar of applause accompanying a successful and conclusive lunge by which Peveril ran his gigantic antagonist through the body. He looked at his prostrate foe for a moment; then, recovering himself, called loudly to know what had become of the lady.

"Never mind the lady if you be wise," said one of the watermen; "the Constable will be here in an instant. I'll give your honour a cast across the water in a moment. It may be as much as your neck's worth. Shall only charge a Jacobus."

"You be d—d!" said one of his rivals in profession, "as your father was before you; for a Jacobus, I'll set the gentleman into Alsatia, where neither bailiff nor constable dare trespass."

"The lady, you scoundrels, the lady!" exclaimed Peveril—"Where is the lady?"

"I'll carry your honour where you shall have enough of ladies, if that be your want," said the old Triton; and as he spoke, the clamour amongst the watermen was renewed, each hoping to cut his own profit out of the emergency of Julian's situation.

"A sculler will be least suspected, your honour," said one fellow.

"A pair of oars will carry you through the water like a wild duck," said another.

"But you have got never a tilt, brother," said a third. "Now I can put the gentleman as snug as if he were under hatches."

In the midst of the oaths and clamour attending this aquatic controversy for his custom, Peveril at length made them understand that he would bestow a Jacobus, not on him whose boat was first oars, but on whomever should inform him of the fate of the lady.

"Of which lady?" said a sharp fellow; "for, to my thought, there was a pair on them."

"Of both, of both," answered Peveril; "but first, of the fair-haired lady?"

"Ay, ay, that was she that shrieked so when gold-jacket's companion handed her into No. 20."

"Who—what—who dared to hand her?" exclaimed Peveril.

"Nay, master, you have heard enough of my tale without a fee," said the waterman.

"Sordid rascal!" said Peveril, giving him a gold piece. "speak out, or I'll run my sword through you!"

"For the matter of that, master," answered the fellow, "not while I can handle this trunnion—but a bargain's a bargain; and so I'll tell you, for your gold piece, that the comrade of the fellow forced one of your wenches, her with the fair hair, will she nill she, into Tickling Tom's wherry; and they are far enough up Thames by this time, with wind and tide."

"Sacred Heaven, and I stand here!" exclaimed Julian.

"Why, that is because your honour will not take a boat."

"You are right, my friend—a boat—a boat instantly!"

"Follow me, then, squire.—Here, Tom, bear a hand—the gentleman is our fare."

A volley of water language was exchanged betwixt the successful candidate for Peveril's custom and his disappointed brethren, which concluded by the ancient Triton's bellowing out, in a tone above them all, "that the gentleman was in a fair way to make a voyage to the isle of gulls, for that sly Jack was only bantering him—No. 20 had rowed for York-Buildings."

"To the isle of gallows," cried another; "for here comes one who will mar his trip up Thames, and carry him down to Execution-Dock."

In fact, as he spoke the word, a constable, with three or four of his assistants, armed with the old-fashioned brown-bills, which were still used for arming those guardians of the peace, cut off our hero's farther progress to the water's edge, by arresting him in the King's name. To attempt resistance would have been madness, as he was surrounded on all sides; so Peveril was disarmed, and carried before the nearest Justice of the Peace, for examination and committal.

The legal sage before whom Julian was taken, was a man very honest in his intentions, very bounded in his talents, and rather timid in his disposition. Before the general alarm given to England, and to the city of London in particular, by the notable discovery of the Popish Plot, Master Maulstatute had taken serene and undisturbed pride and pleasure in the discharge of his duties as a Justice of the Peace, with the exercise of all its honorary privileges and awful authority. But the murder of Sir Edmondsbury Godfrey had made a strong, nay, an indelible impression on his mind; and he walked the Courts of Thémis with fear and trembling after that memorable and melancholy event.

Having a high idea of his official importance, and rather an exalted notion of his personal consequence, his honour saw nothing from that time but cords and daggers before his eyes, and never stepped out of his own house, which he fortified, and in some measure garrisoned, with half a dozen tall watchmen and constables, without seeing himself watched by a Papist in disguise, with a drawn sword under his cloak. It was even whispered, that, in the agonies of his fears, the worshipful Master Maulstatute mistook the kitchen-wench with a tinder-box, for a Jesuit with a pistol; but if any one dared to laugh at such an error, he would have done well to conceal his mirth, lest he fell under the heavy inculpation of being a banterer and stiffer of the Plot—a crime almost as deep as that of being himself a plotter. In fact, the fears of the honest Justice, however ridiculously exorbitant, were kept so much in countenance by the outcry of the day, and the general nervous fever which afflicted every good Protestant, that Master Maulstatute was accounted the bolder man and the better magistrate, while, under the terror of the air-drawn dagger which fancy placed continually before his eyes, he continued to dole forth justice in the recesses of his private chamber, nay, occasionally to attend Quarter-sessions, when the hall was guarded by a sufficient body of the militia. Such was the wight, at whose door, well chained and doubly bolted, the constable who had Julian in custody now gave his important and well-known knock.

Notwithstanding this official signal, the party was not admitted until the clerk, who acted the part of high-warder, had reconnoitred them through a grated wicket; for who could say whether the Papists might not have made themselves master of Master Constable's sign, and have prepared a pseudo watch to burst in and murder the Justice, under pretence of bringing a criminal before him?—Less hopeful projects had figured in the Narrative of the Popish Plot.

All being found right, the key was turned, the bolts were drawn, and the chain unhooked, so as to permit entrance to the constable, the prisoner, and the assistants; and the door was then as suddenly shut against the witnesses, who, as less trustworthy persons, were requested (through the wicket) to remain in the yard, until they should be called in their respective turns.

Had Julian been inclined for mirth, as was far from being the case, he must have smiled at the incongruity of the clerk's apparel, who had belted over his black buckram suit a buff baldric, sustaining a broadsword, and a pair of huge horse-pistols; and, instead of the low flat hat, which, coming in place of the city cap, completed the dress of a scrivener, had placed on his greasy locks a rusted steel cap, which had seen Marston-moor; across which projected his well-used quill, in the guise of a plume—the shape of the morion not admitting of its being stuck, as usual, behind his ear.

This whimsical figure conducted the constable, his assistants, and the prisoner, into the low hall, where his principal dealt forth justice; who presented an appearance still more singular than that of his dependant.

Sundry good Protestants, who thought so highly of themselves as to suppose they were worthy to be distinguished as objects of Catholic cruelty, had taken to defensive arms on the occasion. But it was quickly found that a breast-plate and back-plate of proof, fastened together with iron clasps, was no convenient enclosure for a man who meant to eat venison and custard; and that a buff-coat, or shirt of mail, was scarcely more accommodating to the exertions necessary on such active occasions. Besides, there were other objections, as the alarming and menacing aspects which such warlike habiliments gave to the Exchange, and other places, where merchants most readily engaged him in his schemes, which, in the eyes of his brother-in-law were alike honourable and patriotic. Not while he flattered Bridgenorth with the achieving a complete reformation in the state—checking the profligacy of the Court, relieving the oppressions of the 12 members from the pressure of the penal laws—amending, in fine, the crying grievances of the time—while he showed him also in prospect, revenue upon the Countess of Derby and a humbling dispensation on the House of Peveril, from whom Bridgenorth had suffered such indignity. Christian did not neglect in the mean while to consider how he could best himself by the confidence reposed in him by his unscrupulous relation.

The rare and beauty of Alice Bridgenorth—the great wealth which time and economy had accumulated on her father—presented her out as a most desirable match to repair the wasted fortunes of some of the members of the Court, and he flattered himself that he could conduct such a negotiation with as little difficulty as he gave credence to his own persuasion. He thought there would be little difficulty in persuading Mrs. Bridgenorth to intrust her daughter to his management, and his daughter. That unfortunate gentleman, however, disowned himself from the very person who had to regard the pressure of the Court, and the distance too great to be able to do so. He had little trouble in convincing himself of the strong inclination which he felt to bestow her on Julian Peveril, provided he could be brought over to his own political opinions, was a blameable compromise with his more severe principles. Late circumstances had taught him the incapacity and weakness of Dame Debitach for the sole charge of so dear a pledge; and he readily and thankfully embraced the kind offer of her maternal uncle Christian to place Alice under the protection of a lady of rank in London, where he himself was to be engaged in the scenes of bustle and blood, which in common with all good Protestants, he expected were speedily to take place on a general rising of the Papists, unless prevented by the active and energetic measures of the good people of England. He even confessed his fears, that his partial regard for Alice's happiness might enervate his efforts in behalf of his country, and Christian had little trouble in eliciting from him a promise that he would forbear to inquire after her for some time.

Thus certain of being the temporary guardian of his niece for a space long enough, he flattered himself for the execution of his purpose, Christian endeavoured to pave the way by consulting Chiffinch, whose known skill in Court policy qualified him best as an adviser on this occasion. But this worthy person, being, in fact, a purveyor for his Majesty's pleasures, and on that account high in his good graces, thought it fell within the line of his duty to suggest another scheme than that on which Christian consulted him. A woman of such beauty as Alice was described, he deemed more worthy to be a partner of the affections of the merry Monarch, whose taste in female beauty was no equivoque than to be made the wife of some worn-out prodigal of quality. And this being perfect justice to his own character, he felt it would not be one whit impaired, while his fortune would be, in every respect, greatly amended, if, after sharing the short reign of the Gayne, the Davina, the Roberton, and so forth, Alice Bridgenorth should retire from the state of a royal favourite, into the humble condition of Mrs. Chiffinch.

After cautiously sounding Christian, and finding that the mere prospect of success to himself effectually prevented his starting at this iniquitous scheme, Chiffinch detailed it to him fully, carefully keeping the final termination out of sight, and talking of the favour to be acquired by the fair Alice as no passing caprice, but the commencement of a reign as long and absolute as that of the Duchess of Portsmouth, of whose excesses and dissipation the temperate Charles was now understood to be much tired, though the force of habit rendered him unequal to free himself of her yoke.

Thus chalked out, the scene prepared was no longer the scheme of a Court pander, and a villainous seduction for the ruin of an innocent girl, but became a state intrigue, for the removal of an obnoxious favourite, and the subsequent change of the King's sentiments upon various material points, in which he was at present influenced by the Duchess of Portsmouth. In this light it was exhibited to the Duke of Buckingham, who, rather to sustain his character for daring gallantry, or in order to gratify some capricious fancy, had at one time made love to the young favourite, and experienced a repulse which he had never forgiven.

But one scheme was too little to occupy the ardent and enterprising spirit of the Duke. An appendix of the Plover Plot was easily contrived so to involve the Countess of Derby, who, from character and religion, was precisely the person whom the credulous part of the public were inclined to suppose the likely accomplice of such a conspiracy. Christian and Bridgenorth undertook the part of a continuance of attacking her even in her own little kingdom of New and had communications for this purpose which had only to be produced in case of their scheme taking effect.

It happened, as the reader is aware, from the Countess's alert preparations for defence; and neither Christian nor Bridgenorth held it sound policy to practice openly even under parliamentary authority, against a lady so little liable to hostile upon the measures most likely to secure her feudal sovereignty; wisely considering, that even the omnipotence as it has been somewhat too largely styled, of Parliament, might fail to relieve them from the personal consequences of a failure.

On the continent of Britain, however, no opposition was to be feared, and as well was Christian acquainted with all the motions in the interior of the Countess's little court or household, that Peveril would have been arrested the instant he set foot on shore but for the gale of wind which obliged the vessel, in which he was a passenger, to run for Liverpool. Here Christian, under the name of Godless, was secretly met with him, and preserved him from the fangs of the well-breathed assassins of the Plot with the purpose of securing his despatches, or, if necessary, his person also, in such a manner as to place him at his own discretion—a narrow and perilous game which he thought it better however to undertake, than to permit their subordinate agents, who were always ready to mutiny against all in league with them, to obtain the credit which they must have done by the seizure of the Countess's papers. It was, besides, essential to Buckingham's scheme that these should not pass into the hands of a public officer like Torham, who, however pompous and stupid was upright and well intentioned; and they had undergone the peril of a private committer, where something might have probably been suppressed, even supposing that nothing had been added. In short, Christian, in carrying on his own apparatus and peculiar intrigue, by the agency of the Great Popish Plot, as it was called, acted just like an engineer, who derives the principle of motion a high turn his machinery by means of a steam engine or large water wheel constructed to drive a screw and large cogwheel. Accordingly, he was determined that, while he took all the advantage he could from that supposed discovery, no one should be admitted to interfere with his own plans of profit and revenge.

Chiffinch, who was more of satisfying himself with his own eyes of that excellent beauty which had been so highly eulogised, had gone down to Derbyshire on purpose, was infinitely delighted, when, during the course of a two hours' sermon at the dissenting chapel in Liverpool which afforded him ample leisure for a deliberate survey, he arrived at the conclusion that he had never seen a form or face more captivating. His eyes having confirmed what was told him, he hurried back to the little inn which formed the place of rendezvous, and there awaited Christian and his men, with a degree of confidence in the success of the project which he had not before entertained, and with an apparatus of luxury calculated, as he thought, to make a favourable impression on the mind of a rustic girl. He was somewhat surprised, when

Alice Bridgenorth, to whom he expected that he had been introduced, he found that Christian was accompanied by Julian Peveril. It was indeed a disappointment, for he had prevailed on his father to venture thus far from the Court, not that he might judge, with his own paramount authority, whether Alice was really the prodigy which her father's raises had bespoken her, and, as such, a worthy of the fate to which she was des-words betwixt the worthy confederates determined on the plan of stripping Peveril of the despatches; Chiffinch absolutely refusing any share in arresting him, as a matter of Master's approbation might be very unan had also his own reasons for abstaining from decisive a step. It was by no means likely possible to Bridgenorth, whom it was necessary to keep in good humour;—it was not necessary, Countess's despatches were of far more importance than the person of Julian. Lastly, it was as in this respect also, that Julian was on his father's castle, where it was likely he would be seized, as a matter of course, along with suspicious persons who fell under Topham's and the denunciations of his infamous com-

He, therefore, far from using any violence, assumed towards him such a friendly tone, and seem to warn him against receiving damage, and vindicate himself from having had in depriving him of his charge. This last was achieved by an infusion of a strong into Julian's wine; under the influence of which he slumbered so soundly, that the confederates easily able to accomplish their inhospitable plans of the succeeding days are already known to the reader. Chiffinch set forward to return to London by the packet, which it was desirable should be in Topham's hands as soon as possible; while he went to Moultrassie, to receive Alice from her father, and convey her safely to London—his father agreeing to defer his curiosity to see more of her until they should have arrived in that city.

On parting with Bridgenorth, Christian had used his utmost address to prevail on him to remain at Moultrassie: he had even overstepped the limits of prudence, and, by his urgency, awakened suspicions of an indefinite nature, which he found difficult to allay. Bridgenorth, therefore, his brother-in-law to London; and the Countess already been made acquainted with the arts which Christian used to prevent his farther interference with the destinies of his daughter, or the unsound schemes of her ill-chosen guardian. Still, as he strode along the street in profound meditation, he saw that his undertaking was attended with many dangers and perils; and the drops stood like beads on his forehead when he thought of the presumptuous and fickle temper of Buckingham—the frivolity and overconfidence of Chiffinch—the suspicions of the Duke and the bigoted, yet sagacious and honest Countess. "Had I," he thought, "but tools fitted for their portion of the work, how easily could I sunder and disjoint the strength that opposes me with these frail and insufficient implements! I am in daily, hourly, momentary danger, and never or other gives way, and that the whole will fall on my own head. And yet, were it not for the failings I complain of, how were it possible to have acquired that power over them all which constitutes them my passive tools, even when I most to exert their own free will? Yes, I have some right when they affirm that all is best."

It seems strange, that, amidst the various suspicions and apprehensions, he was never visited by any permanent doubt that the virtue of Alice might prove the shoal on which his voyage was wrecked. But he was an arrant rogue, and a hardened libertine; and, in both characters, a professed disbeliever in the virtue of the

LONDON, the grand central point of intrigues of every description, had now attracted within its dark and shadowy region the greater number of the personages whom we have had occasion to mention.

Julian Peveril, amongst others of the dramatic personæ, had arrived, and taken up his abode in a remote inn in the suburbs. His business, he conceived, was to remain incognito until he should have communicated in private with the friends who were most likely to lend assistance to his parents, as well as to his patroness, in their present situation of doubt and danger. Amongst these, the most powerful was the Duke of Ormond, whose faithful services, high rank, and acknowledged worth and virtue, still preserved an ascendancy in that very Court where, in general, he was regarded as out of favour. Indeed, so much consciousness did Charles display in his demeanour towards that celebrated noble, and servant of his father, that Buckingham once took the freedom to ask the King whether the Duke of Ormond had lost his Majesty's favour, or his Majesty the Duke's? since, whenever they chanced to meet, the King appeared the more embarrassed of the two. But it was not Peveril's good fortune to obtain the advice or countenance of this distinguished person. His Grace of Ormond was not at that time in London.

The letter, about the delivery of which the Countess had seemed most anxious after that to the Duke of Ormond, was addressed to Captain Barstow, (a Jesuit, whose real name was Fenwick,) to be found, or at least to be heard of, in the house of one Martin Christal in the Savoy. To this place hastened Peveril, upon learning the absence of the Duke of Ormond. He was not ignorant of the danger which he personally incurred, by thus becoming a medium of communication betwixt a Popish priest and a suspected Catholic. But when he undertook the perilous commission of his patroness, he had done so frankly, and with the unreserved resolution of serving her in the manner in which she most desired her affairs to be conducted. Yet he could not forbear some secret apprehension, when he felt himself engaged in the labyrinth of passages and galleries, which led to different obscure sets of apartments in the ancient building termed the Savoy.

This antiquated and almost ruinous pile occupied a part of the site of the public offices in the Strand, commonly called Somerset-House. The Savoy had been formerly a palace, and took its name from an Earl of Savoy, by whom it was founded. It had been the habitation of John of Gaunt, and various persons of distinction—had become a convent, a hospital, and finally, in Charles II.'s time, a waste of dilapidated buildings and ruinous apartments, inhabited chiefly by those who had some connexion with, or dependence upon, the neighbouring palace of Somerset-House, which more fortunate than the Savoy, had still retained its royal title, and was the abode of a part of the Court, and occasionally of the King himself, who had apartments there.

It was not without several inquiries, and more than one mistake, that, at the end of a long and dusky passage, composed of boards so wasted by time that they threatened to give way under his feet, Julian at length found the name of Martin Christal, broker and appraiser, upon a shattered door. He was about to knock, when some one pulled his cloak; and looking round, to his great astonishment, which indeed almost amounted to fear, he saw the little mute damsel, who had accompanied him for a part of the way on his voyage from the Isle of Man. "Fenella!" he exclaimed, forgetting that she could neither hear nor reply,—"Fenella! Can this be you?"

Fenella, assuming the air of warning and authority, which she had heretofore endeavoured to adopt towards him, interposed betwixt Julian and the door at which he was about to knock—pointed with her finger towards it in a prohibiting manner, and at do congregate; and excommunications were bitterly complained of by many, who, not belonging to the artillery company, or trained bands, had no experience in bearing defensive armour.

To obviate these objections, and, at the same time, to secure the persons of all true Protestant citizens against open force or privy assassinations on the part of the Papists, some ingenious artist, belonging, we may presume, to the worshipful Mercers' Company, had contrived a species of armour, of which neither the horse-armoury in the Tower, nor Gwynnasp's Gothic Hall, no, nor Dr Meyrick's invaluable collection of ancient arms, has preserved any specimen. It was called silk armour,* being composed of a doublet and breeches of quilted silk, so closely stitched, and of such thickness, as to be proof against either bullet or steel; while a thick bonnet of the same materials, with ear-flaps attached to it, and, on the whole, much resembling a night-cap, completed the equipment, and ascertained the security of the wearer from the head to the knee.

Master Maulstaine, among other worthy citizens, had adopted this singular panoply, which had the advantage of being soft, and warm, and flexible, as well as safe. And he now sat in his judicial elbow-chair—a short, rotund figure, hung round, as it were, with cushions, for such was the appearance of the quilted garments, and with a nose protruded from under the silken casque, the size of which, together with the unwieldiness of the whole figure, gave him worship no indifferent resemblance to the sign of the Hog in Armour, which was considerably improved by the defensive garment being of a dusky orange-colour, not altogether unlike the hue of those ill-wild swine which are to be found in the forests of Hampshire.

Secure in these invulnerable envelopments, worship had rested content, although covered with his own death-doing weapons, of rapier, poniard, pistols, which were placed, nevertheless, at a distance from his chair. One offensive instrument, indeed, he thought it prudent to keep on beside his huge Coke upon Lyttleton. That sort of pocket-flail, consisting of a piece of about eighteen inches long, to which was swinging a club of benum-rite, nearly as thick as the handle, but jointed so as to be bent. This instrument, which bore at that time the name of the Protestant flail, might be the coat, until circumstances demand a better appearance. A better precaution than his arms, whether offensive or defensive, was a strong iron grating, which crossed the Justice's table, and communicated to the door, which was usually kept locked, rated the accused party from his —Is Sir Geoffrey akin to you, if one may make a ask?"

"I am his son," answered Peveril, sternly, in hope

The man only laughed louder than before.

"His son!—Why, that's best of all—Why, you are a strapping youth—five feet ten, if you be an arch-and Sir Geoffrey's son!—Ha, ha, ha!"

"True with your impudence," said Julian. "A situation gives you no title to insult me?"

"No more I do," said the turnkey, smothering his mirth at the recollection, perhaps, that the prisoner's purse was not exhausted. "I only laughed because you said you were Sir Geoffrey's son. But no matter

So saying, he ushered his prisoner into a cell, or rather a strong room of the better order, in which there were four chairs, a truckle-bed, and one or two other articles of furniture.

Julian looked eagerly around for his father; but to his surprise the room appeared totally empty. He turned with anger on the turnkey, and charged him with misleading him; but the fellow answered, "No no, master; I have kept faith with you. Your father, if you call him so, is only trapped in some corner. A small hole will hide him; but I'll rouse him out presently for you.—Here, hocks!—Turn out, Sir Geofrey!—Here is—Ha, ha, ha!—your son—or your wife's son—for I think you can have but little share in her —come to wait on you."

Peveril knew not how to resent the man's insolence; and indeed his anxiety, and apprehensions of some strange mistake, mingled with, and in some degree neutralized, his anger. He looked again and again, around and around the room; until at length he became aware of something rolled up in a dark corner, which rather resembled a small bundle of crimson cloth than any living creature. At the verification of the turnkey, however, the object seemed to acquire life and motion—uncoiled itself in some degree, and, after an effort or two, gained an erect posture; still covered from top to toe with the crimson drapery in which it was at first wrapped. Julian, at the first glance, imagined from the size that he saw a child of five years old; but a shrill and peculiar tone of voice soon assured him of his mistake.

"Warder" said this unearthly sound, "what is the meaning of this disturbance? Have you more insults to heap on the head of one who hath ever been the butt of fortune's malice? But I have a soul that can wrestle with all my misfortunes; it is as large as any of your bodies."

"Nay, Sir Geoffrey, if this be the way you welcome

CHAPTER XXXIV.

Degenerate youth, and not of Tydeus' kind,
Whose little body lodged a mighty mind!—Mad.

LEFT quiet at least, if not alone, for the first time for the events of this troubled and varied day. Julian sat himself on an old oaken seat, beside the embers of a sea-coal fire, and began to muse on the miserable situation of anxiety and danger in which he was placed; where, whether he contemplated the interests of his love, his family affections, or his friendships, all seemed such a prospect as that of a sailor who looks upon breakers on every hand, from the deck of a vessel which no longer obeys the helm.

As Peveril sat sunk in despondency, his companion in misfortune drew a chair to the opposite side of the chimney-corner, and began to gaze at him with a sort of solemn earnestness, which at length compelled him, though almost in spite of himself, to pay some attention to the singular figure who seemed so much engrossed with contemplating him.

Geoffrey Hudson, (we drop occasionally the title of knighthood, which the King had bestowed on him in a frolic, but which might introduce some confusion into our history,) although a dwarf of the least possible size, had nothing positively ugly in his countenance, or actually distorted in his limbs. His head, hands, and feet, were indeed large, and disproportioned to the height of his body, and his body itself much thicker than was consistent with symmetry, but in a degree which was rather ludicrous than disagreeable to look upon. His countenance, in particular, had he been a little taller, would have been accounted, in youth, handsome, and now, in age, striking and expressive; it was but the uncommon disproportion betwixt the head and the trunk which made the features seem whimsical and bizarre—an effect which was considerably increased by the dwarf's mustaches, which it was his pleasure to wear so large, that they almost twisted back amongst, and mingled with, his grizzled hair.

The dress of this singular wight announced that he was not entirely free from the unhappy taste which frequently induces those whom nature has marked by personal deformity, to distinguish, and at the same time to render themselves ridiculous, by the use of showy colours, and garments fantastically and extraordinarily fashioned. But poor Geoffrey Hudson's laces, embroideries, and the rest of his finery, were sorely worn and tarnished by the time which he had spent in jail under the vague and malicious accusation that he was somehow or other an accomplice in this all-involving, all-devouring whirlpool of a Popish conspiracy—an impeachment which, if pronounced by a mouth the foulest and most malicious, was at that time sufficiently predominant to sully the fairest reputation. It will presently appear, that in the poor man's manner of thinking, and tone of conversation, there was something analogous to his absurd fashion of apparel; for, as in the latter, good stuff and valuable decorations were rendered ludicrous by the fantastic fashion in which they were made up; so, such glimmerings of good sense and honourable feeling as the little man often evinced, were made ridiculous by a restless desire to assume certain airs of importance, and a great jealousy of being despised, on account of the peculiarity of his outward form.

After the fellow-prisoners had looked at each other for some time in silence, the dwarf, conscious of his dignity as first owner of their joint apartment, thought it necessary to do the honours of it to the new-comer. "Sir," he said, modifying the alternate harsh and squeaking tones of his voice into accents as harmonious as they could attain, "I understand you to be the son of my worthy namesake, and ancient acquaintance, the stout Sir Geoffrey Peveril of the Peak. I promise you, I have seen your father where blows have been going more plenty than gold pieces; and for a tall heavy man, who lacked, as we martial-ance and expostulation being out of the queseril submitted to have a light pair of fetters on his ankles, which allowed him, neverthe-power of traversing the apartment.

z this operation, he reflected that the jailer, taken the advantage of the equivocal betwixt Sir Geoffreys, must have acted as his assistanted, and cheated him from malice prepense, warrant of committal described him as the ir Geoffrey Peveril. It was therefore in vain, is degrading, to make farther application to man on the subject. Julian determined to o his fate, as what could not be averted by any his own.

the turnkey was moved in some degree by his ood mien, and the patience with which, after effervescence of disappointment, the new prisigned himself to his situation. "You seem young gentleman," he said: "and shall at re a good dinner, and as good a pallet to sleep within the walls of Newgate.—And, Master frey, you ought to make much of him, since his thought, some of the lightness and activity of our more slightly made Cavaliers, he performed his duty as a man might desire. I am happy to see you, his son; and, though by a mistake, I am glad we are to share this comfortable cabin together."

Julian bowed and thanked his courtesy; and Geoffrey Hudson, having broken the ice, proceeded to question him without further ceremony. "You are no courtier, I presume, young gentleman?"

Julian replied in the negative.

"I thought so," continued the dwarf; "for although I have now no official duty at Court, the region in which my early years were spent, and where I once held a considerable office, yet I still, when I had my liberty, visited the Presence from time to time, as in duty bound for future service; and am wont, from old habit, to take some note of the courtly gallants, those choice spirits of the age, among whom I was once enrolled. You are not to compliment you, a marked figure, Master Feveril—though something of the tallest, as was your father's case; I think, I could swear have seen you any where without remembering you."

Feveril thought he might, with great justice, have returned the compliment, but contented himself with saying, "he had scarce seen the British Court."

"Tis pity," said Hudson; "a gallant can hardly be formed without frequenting it. But you have been perhaps in a rougher school; you have served, doubtless?"

"My Master, I hope," said Julian.

"I'm on it, you mistake. I meant," said Hudson, "as a Frenchman—you have served in the army?"

"No. I have not yet had that honour," answered Julian.

"What! neither courtier nor soldier, Master Feveril? and the important little man. Your father is to blame. By rock and pillar he is, Master Feveril! How shall a man be known, or distinguished, unless by his bearing in peace and war? I tell you, sir, that at Newberry, where I charged with my troop abreast with Prince Rupert, and when, as you may have heard, we were both beaten off by those cockily hands the Trained Bands of London,—we did what men could, and I think it was a matter of three or four minutes after most of our gentlemen had been driven off, that his Highness and I continued to cut at their long pikes with our swords, and I think might have broken in, but that I had a tall, long-legged brute of a horse, and my sword was somewhat short—in fine, at last we were obliged to make water back, and then, as I was going to say, the fellows were so glad to get rid of us, that they set up a great jubilee cry of 'There goes Prince Robin and Cuck Robin'—Ay, ay, every roundabout among them knew me well. But those days are over—And where were you educated, young gentleman?"

Feveril named the household of the Countess of Derby.

"A most honourable lady, upon my word as a gentleman," said Hudson.—"I knew the noble Countess well, when I was about the person of my royal mistress, Henrietta Maria. She was then the very master of all that was noble, loyal, and lovely. She was, indeed, one of the fifteen fair ones of the Court, whom I permitted to call me Perilousness; a foolish jest on my somewhat diminutive figure, which always distinguished me from ordinary boys, even when I was young. I have now lost much stature by stooping; but, always the ladies had their jest at me—Perhaps, young man, I had my own amends of some of them somewhere, and somehow or other—I say nothing if I had or no; far less do I intimate disrespect to the noble Countess. She was daughter of the Duc de la Tremouille, or, more correctly, Des Touches. Not certainly to serve the ladies, and condemned to their humours, even when somewhat too free, or too fantastic, is the true doctrine of gentle blood."

Depressed as his spirits were, Feveril could scarce restrain smiling when he looked at the pigmy creature, who told these stories with infinite complacency, and appeared disposed to proceed, as his own herald, that he had been a very model of valour and gallantry, though love and arms seemed to be pursuits totally irreconcilable to his chevelled, weatherbeaten countenance, and wasted limbs. Julian was, however, so careful to avoid giving his companion pain, that he endeavoured to humour him, by saying, that, "unquestionably one bred or like Sir Geoffrey Hudson, a sports and camps, knew exactly when to suffer personal freedom, and when to control them."

The little Knight, with great vivacity, though with some difficulty began to drag his seat from the side of the fire opposite to that where Julian was seated, and at length succeeded in bringing it near him, in token of increasing cordiality.

"You say well, Master Feveril," said the dwarf, "and I have given proofs both of bearing and forbearing.—Yes, sir, there was not that thing which my most royal mistress, Henrietta Maria, could have required of me, that I would not have complied with, sir, I was her sworn servant, both in war and in peace, in battle and parliament. At her Majesty's particular request, I once condescended to become—indeed, you know, have strange fancies—to become the tenant, for a time, of the interior of a jar."

"Of a jar?" said Julian, somewhat amazed.

"Yes, sir, of a jar. I hope you find nothing subtle in my complaisance," replied his companion, somewhat wistfully.

"Not I, sir," said Feveril, "I have other matters than laughter in my head at present."

"So had I," said the dwarfish champion, "when I found myself imprisoned in a huge platter, of no ordinary dimensions. You may be assured, since I could lie at length in it, and when I was entombed, as it were, in walls of standing crust, and a huge cover of pastry, the whole constituting a sort of sarcophagus, of size enough to have received the epitaph of a general officer or an archbishop, on the lid. Sir, notwithstanding the conveniences which were made to give me air, it was more like being buried alive than anything which I could think of."

"I conceive it," said Julian.

"Moreover," continued the dwarf, "there were few in the secret, which was contrived for the Queen's diversionment, for advancing of which I would have Geoffrey as Jeffrey Hudson is often mentioned in histories of Charles I. a time. His first appearance at court was long preceded by his entrance in the east in a pair of an enormous coat given by the Duke of Buckingham to Charles I. and the royal mistress. I saw the countess dress her, the Duke presented her to the party to the Queen. He retained him as her step. When about eight years of age he was but eighteen at death, looking high, and resembled distantly at that distance all he was thirty years old, when he grew to the height of three feet six inches and there he stood.

*This singular case is related in some accounts of the execution. He went to France to fetch over a mistress to his mistress Henrietta Maria. On his return, he was taken by English privy-council, when he lost many valuable presents sent to the Queen from France, and about thirty of his own. Sir William Brouncker makes a most supposed combat between the dwarf and a turkey cock, the subject of a poem called Jeffrey. The scene is laid at Dunkirk, where, as the story concludes—*

"Jeffrey stood upon the tower, first and weak,

The great cock came to him with his beak.

A lady would be sure he threw by chance

Behind that came along with him from France.

A tower brought up in war that never falling

Then from round him he fled, both now and then.

Thus, that deserved best an enemy, he

He lived of others as did not he.

We are not acquainted how far Jeffrey retained this language, but we are assured he was a consummate personage, and delighted with little more than the training of the domestics and amusements and had many amusements in the King's private park.

The fatal duel with Sir Crofts probably took place as mentioned in the text. It happened in France. The poor dwarf had given the instructions to be taken prisoner by a French officer. He was however probably more apt at liberty, for that was a captain for the King during the civil war. In 1641 the dwarf attended his royal mistress to France. The French was treated hospitably, with other captives to England. But the great lady who received it would soon, find matters both from money and fortune was not deemed to show her days of power. Poor Jeffrey spent some summer respecting the Popish Plot, was taken up in 1686, and confined up the Oldbath prison, Westminster, where he ended his life in the sixty-third year of his age.

Jeffrey Hudson has been immortalized by the brush of T. Doyle, and his clothes are said to be preserved as relics of antiquity in the House of Commons.

crept into a filbert nut, had it been possible; and few, as I said, being private in the scheme, there was a risk of accidents. I doubted, while in my darksome abode, whether some awkward attendant might not have let me fall, as I have seen happen to a venison pasty; or whether some hungry guest might not anticipate the moment of my resurrection, by sticking his knife into my upper crust. And though I had my weapons about me, young man, as has been my custom in every case of peril, yet, if such a rash person had plunged deep into the bowels of the supposed pasty, my sword and dagger could barely have served me to avenge, assuredly not to prevent, either of these catastrophes."

"Certainly I do so understand it," said Julian, who began, however, to feel that the company of little Hudson talkative as he showed himself, was likely rather to aggravate than to alleviate the inconveniences of a prison.

"Nay," continued the little man, enlarging on his former topic, "I had other subjects of apprehension; for it pleased my Lord of Buckingham, his Grace's father who now bears the title, in his plenitude of Court favour, to command the pasty to be carried down to the office, and committed anew to the oven, alleging preposterously that it was better to be eaten warm than cold."

"And did this, sir, not disturb your equanimity?" said Julian.

"My young friend," said Geoffrey Hudson, "I cannot deny it.—Nature will claim her rights from the best and boldest of us.—I thought of Nebuchadnezzar and his fiery furnace; and I waxed warm with apprehension. But, I thank Heaven, I also thought of my sworn duty to my royal mistress; and was thereby obliged and enabled to resist all temptations to make myself prematurely known. Nevertheless, the Duke—if of malice, may Heaven forgive him—followed down into the office himself, and urged the master-cook very hard that the pasty should be heated, were it but for five minutes. But the master-cook, being privy to the very different intentions of my royal mistress, did most manfully resist the order; and I was again reconveyed in safety to the royal table."

"And in due time liberated from your confinement, I doubt not?" said Peveril.

"Yes, sir; that happy, and I may say glorious moment, at length arrived," continued the dwarf. "The upper crust was removed—I started up to the sound of trumpet and clarion, like the soul of a warrior when the last summons shall sound—or rather, (if that smile be over audacious,) like a spell-bound champion relieved from his enchanted state. It was then that, with my buckler on my arm, and my trusty Bilboa in my hand, I executed a sort of warlike dance, in which my skill and agility then rendered me pre-eminent, displaying, at the same time, my postures, both of defence and offence, in a manner so totally unimitable, that I was almost drenched with the applause of all around me, and half-drowned by the scented waters with which the ladies of the Court deluged me from their casting-bottles. I had amends of his Grace of Buckingham also; for as I tripped a hasty morris hither and thither upon the dining-table, now offering my blade, now recovering it, I made a blow at his nose—a sort of estramaron—the dexterity of which consists in coming mighty near to the object you seem to aim at, yet not attaining it. You may have seen a barber make such a flourish with his razor. I promise you his Grace sprung back a half yard at least. He was pleased to threaten to brain me with a chicken-bone, as he disdainfully expressed it; but the King said, 'George, you have but a Rowland for an Oliver.' And so I tripped on, showing a bold heedlessness of his displeasure, which few dared to have done at that time, albeit countenanced to the utmost like me by the smiles of the brave and the fair. But, well-a-day! sir, youth, its fashions, its follies, its frolics, and all its pomp and pride, are as idle and transitory as the crackling of thorns under a pot."

"The flower that is cast into the oven were a better simile," thought Peveril. "Good God, that a man should live to regret not being young enough to be still treated as baked meat, and served up in a pie!"

His companion, whose tongue had for many days been as closely imprisoned as his person, seemed resolved to indemnify his loquacity, by continuing to indulge it on the present occasion at his companion's expense. He proceeded, therefore, in a solemn tone, to moralize on the adventure which he had narrated.

"Young men will no doubt think one to be envied," he said, "who was thus enabled to be the darling and admiration of the Court"—(Julian internally stood self-exculpated from the suspicion)—"and yet it is better to possess fewer means of distinction, and remain free from the back-biting, the slander, and the odium, which are always the share of Court favour. Men, who had no other cause, cast reflections upon me because my size varied somewhat from the common proportion; and jests were sometimes unthinkingly passed upon me by those I was bound to, who did not in that case, peradventure, sufficiently consider that the wren is made by the same hand which formed the bustard, and that the diamond, though small in size, out-values ten thousand-fold the rude granite. Nevertheless, they proceeded in the vein of humour; and as I could not in duty or gratitude retort upon nobles and princes, I was compelled to cast about in my mind how to vindicate my honour towards these, who, being in the same rank with myself as servants and courtiers, nevertheless bore themselves towards me as if they were of a superior class in the rank of honour, as well as in the accidental circumstance of stature. And as a lesson to my own pride, and that of others, it so happened, that the pageant which I have but just narrated—which I justly reckon the most honourable moment of my life, excepting perhaps my distinguished share in the battle of Round-way-down—became the cause of a most tragic event, in which I acknowledge the greatest misfortune of my existence."

The dwarf here paused, fetched a sigh, big at once with regret, and with the importance becoming the subject of a tragic history; then proceeded as follows:—

"You would have thought in your simplicity, young gentleman, that the pretty pageant I have mentioned could only have been quoted to my advantage, as a rare masking frolic, prettily devised, and not less deftly executed; and yet the malice of the courtiers, who maligned and envied me, made them strain their wit, and exhaust their ingenuity, in putting false and ridiculous constructions upon it. In short, my ears were so much offended with allusions to pies, puff paste, ovens, and the like, that I was compelled to prohibit such subject of mirth, under penalty of my instant and severe displeasure. But it happ'd there was then a gallant about the Court, a man of good quality, son to a knight baronet, and in high esteem with the best in that sphere, also a familiar friend of mine own, from whom, therefore, I had no reason to expect any of that species of gibing which I had intimated my purpose to treat as offensive. Howbeit, it pleased the honourable Mr. Crofts, so was this youth called and designed, one night, at the Groom Porter's, being full of wine and waggery, to introduce this threadbare subject, and to say something concerning a goose-pie, which I could not but consider as levelled at me. Nevertheless, I did but calmly and solidly pray him to choose a different subject; failing which, I let him know I should be sudden in my resentment. Notwithstanding, he continued in the same tone, and even aggravated the offence, by speaking of a tomtit, and other unnecessary and obnoxious comparisons; whereupon I was compelled to send him a cartel, and we met accordingly. Now, as I really loved the youth, it was my intention only to correct him by a flesh wound or two; and I would willingly that he had named the sword for his weapon. Nevertheless, he made pistols his election; and being on horseback, he produced, by way of his own weapon, a foolish engine which children are wont, in their roguery, to use for spouting water; a—a—in short I forget the name."

"A squirt, doubtless," said Peveril, who began to recollect having heard something of this adventure.

"You are right," said the dwarf, "you have indeed the name of the little engine, of which I have had experience in passing the yards at Westminster—Well, sir, this token of slight regard compelled me to give the gentleman such language as soon rendered it necessary for him to take more serious arms. We fought on horseback, breaking ground, and advancing by signal, and, as I never more aim, I had the moral venture to kill the Honourable Master Crafts at the first shot. I would not wish my wound for the pain which I felt when I saw him reel on his saddle, and so fall down to the earth; and, when I perceived that the life-blood was pouring fast, I could not but wish to Heaven that it had been my own instead of his. Thus fell youth, hope, and bravery a sacrifice to a silly and thoughtless jest; yet, alas! wherein had I choice, seeing that honour is, as it were, the very breath in our nostrils; and that in no sense can we be said to live, if we permit ourselves to be deprived of it?"

The tone of feeling in which the dwarfish hero concluded his story, gave Julian a better opinion of his heart, and even of his understanding, than he had been able to form of one who glared in having upon a grand occasion, formed the contents of a party. He was indeed enabled to conjecture that the little champion was seduced into such exhibitions, by the nervous attachment to his condition, by his own vanity, and by the flattery bestowed on him by those who sought pleasure in practical jokes. The fate of the unlucky Master Crafts, however, as well as various episodes of this diminutive person during the Civil Wars in which he actually and with great gallantry commanded a troop of horse, rendered most magnificent of up-bully rallying him, which was indeed the less necessary as, when left alone, he seldom failed voluntarily to show himself on the ludicrous end.

At one hour after noon, the turnkey, true to his word, supplied the prisoners with a very tolerable dinner and a flask of well flavoured though light claret, which the old man who was something of a bon-vivant regretted to observe, was nearly as diminutive as himself. The evening also passed away, but not without continued symptoms of garrulity on the part of Geoffrey Hudson.

It is true these were of a graver character than he had hitherto exhibited, for when the flask was empty, he repeated a long Latin prayer. But the religious act in which he had been engaged, only gave his discourse a more serious turn than belonged to his former themes, of war, lady's love, and courtly splendour.

The little Knight beranqued at first on polemical points of divinity, and diverged from this thorny path, into the neighbouring and twilight walk of mysticism. He talked of secret warnings, of the predictions of mid-eyed prophets—of the visits of monitory spirits, and the Ruseurian events of the Cabbala, all which topics he treated of with such apparent conviction, nay with so many appeals to personal experience, that one would have supposed him a member of the fraternity of gnoses, or fathers, whom he resembled as much in point of size.

In short, he persevered for a stricken hour in such a torrent of unnecessary rattle, as determined Peveril, at all events, to endeavour to procure a separate lodging. Having repeated his evening prayers in Latin, as formerly, (for the old gentleman was a Catholic, which was the sole cause of his falling under suspicion,) he set off on a new errand, as they were undressing; and continued to prattle, until he had fairly talked both himself and his companion to sleep.

CHAPTER XXXV.

Of the things that spirits men's minds—Cham.

Julian had fallen asleep, with his brain rather filled with his own and reflections, than with the mystical lore of the little Knight; and yet it seemed as if in his visions the latter had been more present to his mind than the former.

He dreamed of gliding spirits, gibbering phantoms, bloody hands, which dimly seen by twilight, seemed to beckon him forward like errant knight up and adventure bound. More than once he started from his sleep, so lively was the influence of these visions on his imagination; and he always awoke under the impression that some one stood by his bedside. The chillness of his ankles, the weight and clatter of the letters, as he turned himself on his pallet, reminded him, on three occasions where he was and under what circumstances. The extremity to which he saw all that was dear to him at present reduced, struck a deeper cold on his heart than the iron upon his limbs, nor could he conquer himself again to rest without a mental prayer to Heaven for protection. But when he had been for a third time awakened from repose by these like stirring fancies, his distrust of mind vented itself in speech, and he was unable to suppress the almost despairing ejaculation, "God has mercy upon us!"

"Amen!" answered a voice as sweet and "soft as honey dew," which sounded as if the words were spoken close by his bedside.

The natural inference was, that Geoffrey Hudson, his companion in calamity, had echoed the prayer which was so proper to the situation of both. But the tone of voice was so different from the harsh and dissonant sounds of the dwarf's enunciation, that Peveril was impressed with the certainty it could not proceed from Hudson. He was struck with involuntary terror, for which he could give no sufficient reason; and it was not without an effort that he was able to utter the question, "Sir Geoffrey, did you speak?"

No answer was returned. He repeated the question louder, and the same silver-toned voice, which had formerly said "Amen" to his prayers, answered in his interrogatory, "Your companion will not awake while I am here."

"And who are you?—What seek you?—How came you into this place?" said Peveril, budding, again, question upon question.

"I am a wretched being, but one who loves you well—I come for your good.—Concern yourself no farther."

It now rushed on Julian's mind, that he had heard of persons possessed of the wonderful talent of counterfeiting sounds to such accuracy, that they could impose on their hearers the belief, that they proceeded from a point of the apartment entirely opposite to that which the real speaker occupied. Permeated that he had now gained the depth of the mystery, he replied,

"This ruling, Sir Geoffrey, is unreasonable; say what you have to say, in your own voice and manner. These speech phantasms do not become midnight in a Newgate dungeon."

"But the being who speaks with you," answered the voice, "is fitted for the darkest hour, and the most melancholy haunts."

Impatient of suspense, and determined to satisfy his curiosity, Julian jumped at once from his pallet, hoping to secure the speaker, whose voice indicated he was no ghost. But he altogether failed in his attempt and grasped nothing save thin air.

For a turn or two, Peveril shuffled at random about the room, with his arms extended, and then at last recollected, that with the impudency of his chackin, and the noise which necessarily accompanied his motions, and announced where he was, it would be impossible for him to lay hands on any one who might be disposed to keep out of his reach. He therefore endeavoured to return to his bed, but in groping for his way lighted first on that of his fellow prisoner. The little captive slept deep and heavy, as was evinced from his breathing; and upon listening a moment, Julian became again certain, either that his companion was the most artful of ventriloquists and of dissemblers, or that there was actually within the precincts of that guarded chamber, some third being, whose very presence there seemed to intimate that it belonged not to the ordinary line of humanity.

Julian was no ready believer in the supernatural; but that age was very far from being so incredulous concerning ghostly occurrences as our own; and it was no way derogatory to his good sense, that he re prejudices of his time. His hair began and the moisture to stand on his brow, as on his companion to awake, for Heaven's ngly, the apartment was no sooner enlight-is holy candle's end, than Julian began to evidence of his own ears; for not only was ne in the room save Sir Geoffrey Hudson elf, but all the fastenings of the door were that it seemed impossible that they could , opened and again fixed, without a great ise, which, on the last occasion at least, possibly have escaped his ears, seeing that ave been on his feet, and employed in search-hamber, when the unknown, if an earthly s in the act of retreating from it.

ime the dwarf had ceased to speak, Julian's sleep had returned; and after a few glances : apartment, which was still illuminated by ng beams of the holy taper, his eyes were ed in forgetfulness, and his repose was not urbed in the course of that night.

; dawns on Newgate, as well as on the intain-turf which Welshman or wild goat ; but in so different a fashion, that the very heaven's precious sun, when they penetrate cesses of the prison-house, have the air of mitted to jail. Still, with the light of day n, Peveril easily persuaded himself of the his preceding night's visions; and smiled reflected that fancies, similar to those to ear was often exposed in the Isle of Man, ble to arrange themselves in a manner so ; when he heard them from the mouth of : a character as Hudson, and in the soli- rison.

ulian had awaked, the dwarf had already bed, and was seated in the chimney-corner of the apartment, where, with his own hands, he had arranged a morsel of fire, partly attending to the simmering of a small pot, which he had placed on the flame, partly occupied with a huge folio volume which lay on the table before him, and seemed well nigh as tall and bulky as himself. He was wrapped up in the dusky crimson cloak already mentioned, which served him for a morning-gown, as well as a mantle against the cold, and which corresponded with a large montero cap, that enveloped his head. The singularity of his features, and of the eyes, armed with spectacles, which were now cast on the subject of his studies, now directed towards his little caldron, would have tempted Rembrandt to exhibit him on canvass, either in the character of an alchymist, or of a necromancer, engaged in some strange experiment, under the direction of one of the huge manuals which treat of the theory of these mystic arts.

The attention of the dwarf was bent, however, upon a more domestic object. He was only preparing soup, of no unsavoury quality, for breakfast, which he invited Peveril to partake with him. “I am an old soldier,” he said, “and, I must add, an old prisoner; and understand how to shift for myself better than you can do, young man.—Confusion to the scoundrel Clink he has put the spice-box out of my reach!—Will you hand it me from the mantelpiece!—I will teach you, as the French have it, faire la cuisine; and then, if you please, we will divide, like brethren, the labours of our prisonhouse.”

Julian readily assented to the little man's friendly proposal, without interposing any doubt as to his continuing an inmate of the same cell. Truth is, that although, upon the whole, he was inclined to regard the whispering voice of the preceding evening as the impression of his own excited fancy, he felt, nevertheless, curiosity to see how a second night was to pass over in the same cell; and the tone of the invisible intruder, which at midnight had been heard by him with terror, now excited on recollection a gentle and not displeasing species of agitation—the combined effect of awe, and of awakened curiosity.

Days of captivity have little to mark them as they glide away. That which followed the night which we have described, afforded no circumstance of note. The dwarf imparted to his youthful companion a volume similar to that which formed his own studies, and which proved to be a tome of one of Scuderi's now forgotten romances, of which Geoffrey Hudson was a great admirer, and which were then very fashionable both at the French and English Courts; although they contrive to unite in their immense folios all the improbabilities and absurdities of the old romances of chivalry, without that tone of imagination which pervades them, and all the metaphysical absurdities which Cowley and the poets of the age had heaped upon the passion of love, like so many load of small-coal upon a slender fire, which it smothers instead of aiding.

But Julian had no alternative, saving only to muse over the sorrows of Artameans and Mandane, or on the complicated distress of his own situation; and in these disagreeable diversions, the morning crept through as it could.

Noon first, and thereafter nightfall, were successively marked by a brief visit from their stern turnkey, who with noiseless step and sullen demeanour, did in silence the necessary offices about the meals of the prisoners, exchanging with them as few words as an official in the Spanish Inquisition might have permitted himself upon a similar occasion. With the same taciturn gravity, very different from the laughing humour into which he had been surprised on a former occasion, he struck their fetters with a small hammer, to ascertain, by the sound thus produced, whether they had been tampered with by file or otherwise. He next mounted on a table to make the same experiment on the window-grating.

Julian's heart throbbed; for might not one of those grates have been so tampered with as to give entrance to the nocturnal visitant? But they returned to the experienced ear of Master Clink, when he struck them in turn with the hammer, a clear and ringing sound, which assured him of their security.

"It would be difficult for any one to get in through these defences," said Julian, giving vent in words to his own feelings.

"Few wish that," answered the surly groom, misconstruing what was passing in Peveril's mind; and let me tell you, master, folks will find it quite as difficult to get out." He retired, and night came on.

The dwarf, who took upon himself for the day the whole duties of the apartment, trundled about the room, making a most important clutter as he extinguished their fire, and put aside various matters which had been in use in the course of the day, talking to himself all the while in a tone of no little consequence, occasionally grounded on the dexterity with which an old soldier could turn his hand to every thing; and at other times, on the wonder that a courtier of the first rank should condescend to turn his hand to any thing. Then came the repetition of his accustomed prayers; but his disposition to converse did not, as on the former occasion, revive after his devotions. On the contrary, long before Julian had closed an eye, the heavy breathing from Sir Geoffrey Hudson's pallet declared that the dwarf was already in the arms of Morpheus.

Amid the total darkness of the apartment, and with a longing desire, and at the same time no small fear, for the recurrence of the mysterious address of the preceding evening, Julian lay long awake without his thoughts receiving any interruption, save when the clock told the passing hour from the neighbouring steeple of St. Sepulchre. At length he sunk into slumber; but had not slept, to his judgment, above an hour, when he was roused by the sound which his waking ear had so long expected in vain.

"Can you sleep?—Will you sleep?—Dare you sleep?" were the questions impressed on his ear, in the same clear, soft, and melodious voice, which had addressed him on the preceding night.

"Who is it asks me the question?" answered Julian. "But be the questioner good or evil, I reply that I am a guiltless prisoner; and that innocence may wish and dare to sleep soundly."

"Ask no questions of me," said the voice; "neither attempt to discover who speaks to you; and be assured that folly alone can sleep, with fraud and danger before him."

"Can you, who tell me of dangers, counsel me how to combat or how to avoid them?" said Julian.

"My power is limited," said the voice; "yet something I can do, as a glow-worm can show a precipice. But you must confide in me."

"Confidence must beget confidence," answered Julian. "I cannot repose trust in I know not what or whom."

"Speak not so loud," replied the voice, sinking almost into a whisper.

"Last night you said my companion would not awake," said Julian.

"To-night I warrant not that he shall sleep," said the voice. And as it spoke, the hoarse, snatching, discordant tones of the dwarf were heard, demanding of Julian why he talked in his sleep—wherefore he did not rest himself, and let other people rest—and, finally, whether his visions of last night were returned upon him again?

"Say yes," said the voice, in a whisper, so low, yet so distinct, that Julian almost doubted whether it was not an echo of his own thought,—"Say but yes—and I part to return no more!"

In desperate circumstances men look to strange and unusual remedies; and although unable to calculate the chances of advantage which this singular communication opened to him, Julian did not feel inclined to let them at once escape from him. He answered the dwarf, that he had been troubled by an alarming dream.

"I could have sworn it, from the sound of your voice," said Hudson. "It is strange, now, that you overgrown men never possess the extreme firmness of nerves proper to us who are cast in a more compact mould. My own voice retains its masculine sounds on all occasions. Dr. Cockerel was of opinion, that there was the same allowance of nerve and sinew to men of every size, and that nature spun the stock out thinner or stronger, according to the extent of surface which they were to cover. Hence, the least creatures are oftentimes the strongest. Place a beetle under a tall candlestick, and the insect will move it by its efforts to get out; which is, in point of comparative strength, as if one of us should shake his Majesty's prison of Newgate by similar struggles. Cats also, and weasels, are creatures of greater exertion and endurance than dogs or sheep. And in general, you may remark, that little men dance better, and are more unwearied under exertion of every kind, than those to whom their own weight must necessarily be burdensome. I respect you, Master Peveril, because I am told you have killed one of those gigantic fellows, who go about swaggering as if their souls were taller than ours, because their noses are nearer to the clouds by a cubit or two. But do not value yourself on this, as any thing very unusual. I would have you to know it hath been always thus; and that, in the history of all ages, the clean, tight, dapper, little fellow, hath proved an overmatch for his bulky antagonist. I need only instance, out of holy writ, the celebrated downfall of Goliath, and of another lubbard, who had more fingers to his hand, and more inches to his stature, than ought to belong to an honest man, and who was slain by a nephew of good King David; and of many others whom I do not remember; nevertheless, they were all Philistines of gigantic stature. In the classics, also, you have Tydeus, and other tight, compact heroes, whose diminutive bodies were the abode of large minds. And indeed you may observe, in sacred as well as profane history, that your giants are ever heretics and blasphemers, robbers and oppressors, outragers of the female sex, and scoffers at regular authority. Such were Gog and Magog, whom our authentic chronicles vouch to have been slain near to Plymouth, by the good little Knight Corineus, who gave name to Cornwall. Ascaparte also was subdued by Bevis, and Colbrand by Guy, as Southampton and Warwick can testify. Like unto these was the giant Hoel, slain in Bretagne by King Arthur. And if Ryence, King of North Wales, who was done to death by the same worthy champion of Christendom, be not actually termed a giant, it is plain he was little better, since he required twenty-four kings' beards, which were then worn full and long, to fur his gown; whereby, computing each beard at eighteen inches, (and you cannot allow less for a beard-royal,) and supposing only the front of the gown trimmed therewith, as we use ermine; and that the back was mounted and lined, instead of cat-skins and squirrels' fur, with the beards of earls and dukes, and other inferior dignitaries—may amount to—But I will work the question to-morrow."

Nothing is more soporific to any (save a philosopher or moneyed man) than the operation of figures; and when in bed, the effect is irresistible. Sir Geoffrey fell asleep in the act of calculating King Ryence's height, from the supposed length of his mantle. Indeed, had he not stumbled on this abstruse subject of calculation, there is no guessing how long he might have held forth upon the superiority of men of little stature, which was so great a favourite with him, that numerous as such narratives are, the dwarf had collected almost all the instances of their victories over giants, which history or romance afforded.

No sooner had unequivocal signs of the dwarf's sound slumbers reached Julian's ears, than he began again to listen eagerly for the renewal of that mysterious communication which was at once interesting and awful. Even whilst Hudson was speaking, he had, instead of bestowing his attention upon his eulogy on persons of low stature, kept his ears on watchful guard, to mark, if possible, the lightest sounds of any sort which might occur in the apartment; so that he thought it scarce possible that even a fly should have left it without its motion being overheard. If, therefore, his invisible monitor was indeed a creature of this world—an opinion which Julian's sound sense rendered him unwilling to renounce—that being could not have left the apartment; and he waited impatiently for a renewal of their communication. He was disappointed; not the slightest sound reached his ear; and the nocturnal visitor, if still in the room, appeared determined on silence.

It was in vain that Peveril coughed, hemmed, and gave other symptoms of being awake; at length, such became his impatience, that he resolved, at any risk, to speak first, in hopes of renewing the communication betwixt them. "Whoever thou art," he said, in a voice loud enough to be heard by a waking person, but not so high as to disturb his sleeping companion—"Whoever, or whatever thou art, that hast shown some interest in the fate of such a castaway as Julian Peveril, speak once more, I conjure thee; and be your communication for good or evil, believe me, I am equally prepared to abide the issue."

No answer of any kind was returned to this invocation; nor did the least sound intimate the presence of the being to whom it was so solemnly addressed.

"I speak in vain," said Julian; "and perhaps I am but invoking that which is insensible of human feeling, or which takes a malign pleasure in human suffering."

There was a gentle and half-broken sigh from a corner of the apartment, which, answering to this exclamation, seemed to contradict the imputation which it conveyed.

Julian, naturally courageous, and familiarized by this time to his situation, raised himself in bed, and stretched out his arm, to repeat his adjuration, when the voice, as if alarmed at his action and energy, whispered, in a tone more hurried than that which it had hitherto used, "Be still—move not—or I am mute for ever!"

"It is then a mortal being who is present with me," was the natural inference of Julian, "and one who is probably afraid of being detected; I have then some power over my visitor, though I must be cautious how I use it.—If your intents are friendly," he proceeded, "there was never a time in which I lacked friends more, or would be more grateful for kindness. The fate of all who are dear to me is weighed in the balance, and with worlds would I buy the tidings of their safety."

"I have said my power is limited," replied the voice. "You I may be able to preserve—the fate of your friends is beyond my control."

"Let me at least know it," said Julian; "and, be it as it may, I will not shun to share it."

"For whom would you inquire?" said the soft, sweet voice, not without a tremulousness of accent, as if the question was put with diffident reluctance.

"My parents," said Julian, after a moment's hesitation; "how fare they?—What will be their fate?"

"They fare as the fort under which the enemy has dug a deadly mine. The work may have cost the labour of years, such were the impediments to the engineers; but Time brings opportunity upon its wings."

"And what will be the event?" said Peveril.

"Can I read the future?" answered the voice, "save by comparison with the past?—Who has been hunted on these stern and unmitigable accusations, but has been at last brought to bay? Did high and noble birth, honoured age, and approved benevolence, save the unfortunate Lord Stafford? Did learning, capacity of intrigue, or high Court favour, redeem Coleman, although the confidential servant of the heir presumptive of the Crown of England?—Did subtlety and genius, and the exertions of a numerous sect, save Fenwick, or Whitbread, or any other of the accused priests?—Were Groves, Pickering, or the other humble wretches who have suffered, safe in their obscurity?—There is no condition in life, no degree of talent, no form of principle, which affords protection against an accusation, which levels conditions, confounds characters, renders men's virtues their sins, and rates them as dangerous in proportion as they have influence, though attained in the noblest manner, and used for the best purposes. Call such a one but an accessory to the Plot—let him be muzzled in the evidence of Oates or Dugdale—and the blinder shall foresee the issue of their trial."

"Prophet of Evil!" said Julian, "my father has a shield invulnerable to protect him. He is innocent."

"Let him plead his innocence at the bar of Heaven," said the voice; "it will serve him little where Seroggs presides."

"Still I fear not," said Julian, counterfeiting more confidence than he really possessed; "my father's cause will be pleaded before twelve Englishmen."

"Better before twelve wild beasts," answered the Invisible, "than before Englishmen, influenced with party prejudice, passion, and the epidemic terror of an imaginary danger. They are bold in guilt in proportion to the number amongst whom the crime is divided."

"Ill-omened speaker," said Julian, "thine is indeed a voice fitted only to sound with the midnight bell, and the screech-owl. Yet speak again. Tell me, if thou canst"—(he would have said of Alice Bridgenorth, but the word would not leave his tongue)—"Tell me," he said, "if the noble house of Derby"—

"Let them keep their rock like the sea-fowl in the tempest; and it may so fall out," answered the voice, "that their rock may be a safe refuge. But there is blood on their crmine; and revenge has dogged them for many a year, like a blood-hound that hath been distanced in the morning chase, but may yet grapple the quarry ere the sun shall set. At present, however, they are safe. Am I now to speak farther on your own affairs, which involve little short of your life and honour? or are there yet any whose interests you prefer to your own?"

"There is," said Julian, "one from whom I was violently parted yesterday; if I knew but of her safety, I were little anxious for my own."

"One?" returned the voice, "only one from whom you were parted yesterday?"

"But in parting from whom," said Julian, "I felt separated from all happiness which the world can give me."

"You mean Alice Bridgenorth," said the invisible, with some bitterness of accent; "but her you will never see more. Your own life and hers depend on your forgetting each other."

"I cannot purchase my own life at that price," replied Julian.

"Then die in your obstinacy," returned the Invisible; nor to all the entreaties which he used was he able to obtain another word in the course of that remarkable night.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

A short bough'd man, but full of pride

ALLAN RAMSAY.

The blood of Julian Peveril was so much fevered by the state in which his invisible visitor left him, that he was unable, for a length of time, to find repose. He swore to himself, that he would discover and expose the nocturnal demon which stole on his hours of rest, only to add gall to bitterness, and to pour poison into those wounds which already smarted so severely. There was nothing which his power extended to, that, in his rage, he did not threaten. He proposed a closer and more rigorous survey of his cell, so that he might discover the mode by which his tormenter entered, were it as unnoticeable as an auger-hole. If his diligence should prove unavailing, he determined to inform the jailers, to whom it could not be indifferent to know, that their prison was open to such intrusions. He proposed to himself, to discover from their looks, whether they were already privy to these visits; and if so, to denounce them to the magistrates, to the judges, to the House of Commons, was the least that his resentment proposed. Sleep surprised his worn-out frame in the midst of his projects of discovery and vengeance, and, as frequently happens, the light of the ensuing day proved favourable to calmer resolutions.

He now reflected that he had no ground to consider the motives of his visitor as positively malevolent, although he had afforded him little encouragement to hope for assistance on the points he had most at heart. Towards himself, there had been expressed a decided feeling, both of sympathy and interest; if through means of these he could acquire his liberty, he might, when possessed of freedom, turn it to the benefit of those for whom he was more interested than for his own welfare. "I have behaved like a fool," he said; "I ought to have temporized with this singular being, learned the motives of its interference, and availed myself of its succour, provided I could do so without any dishonourable conditions. It would have been always time enough to reject such when they should have been proposed to me."

So saying, he was forming projects for regulating his intercourse with the stranger more prudently, in case their communication should be renewed, when his meditations were interrupted by the peremptory summons of Sir Geoffrey Hudson, that he would, in his turn, be pleased to perform those domestic duties of their common habitation, which the dwarf had yesterday taken upon himself.

There was no resisting a request so reasonable, and Peveril accordingly rose and betook himself to the arrangement of their prison, while Sir Hudson, perched upon a stool from which his legs did not by half way reach the ground, sat in a posture of elegant languor, twangling upon an old broken-winded guitar, and singing songs in Spanish, Moorish, and Lingua Franca, most detestably out of tune. He failed not, at the conclusion of each ditty, to favour Julian with some account of what he had sung, either in the way of translation, or historical anecdote, or as the lay was connected with some peculiar part of his own eventful history, in the course of which the poor little man had chanced to have been taken by a Sallee rover, and carried captive into Morocco.

This part of his life Hudson used to make the era of many strange adventures; and, if he could himself be believed, he had made wild work among the affections of the Emperor's seraglio. But, although few were in a situation to cross-examine him on gallantries and intrigues of which the scene was so remote, the officers of the garrison of Tangier had a report current amongst them, that the only use to which the tyrannical Moors could convert a slave of such slender corporeal strength, was to employ him to lie a-bed all day, and hatch turkey's eggs. The least allusion to this rumour used to drive him well-nigh frantic, and the fatal termination of his duel with young Crofts, which began in wanton mirth, and ended in bloodshed, made men more coy than they had formerly been, of making the fiery little hero the subject of their raillery.

While Peveril did the drudgery of the apartment, the dwarf remained much at his ease, carolling in the manner we have described; but when he beheld Julian attempting the task of the cook, Sir Geoffrey Hudson sprung from the stool on which he sat en Signor, at the risk of breaking both his guitar and his neck, exclaiming, "That he would rather prepare breakfast every morning betwixt this and the day of judgment, than commit a task of such consequence to an inexperienced bungler like his companion."

The young man gladly resigned his task to the splenetic little Knight, and only smiled at his resentment when he added, that, to be but a mortal of middle stature, Julian was as stupid as a giant. Leaving the dwarf to prepare the meal after his own pleasure, Peveril employed himself in measuring the room with his eyes on every side, and in endeavouring to discover some private entrance, such as might admit his midnight visitant, and perhaps could be employed in case of need for effecting his own escape. The floor next engaged a scrutiny equally minute, but more successful.

Close by his own pallet, and dropped in such a manner that he must have seen it sooner but for the burry with which he obeyed the summons of the impatient dwarf, lay a slip of paper, sealed, and directed with the initial letters J. P., which seemed to ascertain that it was addressed to himself. He took the opportunity of opening it while the soup was in the very moment of projection, and the full attention of his companion was occupied by what he, in common with wiser and taller men, considered as one of the principal occupations of life; so that, without incurring his observation, or awaking his curiosity, Julian had the opportunity to read as follows:—

"Rash and infatuated as you are, there is one who would forfeit much to stand betwixt you and your fate. You are to-morrow to be removed to the Tower, where your life cannot be assured for a single day; for, during the few hours you have been in London, you have provoked a resentment which is not easily slaked. There is but one chance for you,—renounce A. B.—think no more of her. If that be impossible, think of her but as one whom you can never see again. If your heart can resolve to give up an attachment which it should never have entertained, and which it would be madness to cherish longer, make your acquiescence in this condition known by putting on your hat a white band, or white feather, or knot of riband of the same colour, whichever you may most easily come by. A boat will, in that case, run, as if by accident, on board of that which is to convey you to the Tower. Do you in the confusion jump overboard, and swim to the Southwark side of the Thames. Friends will attend there to secure your escape, and you will find yourself with one who will rather lose character and life, than that a hair of your head should fall to the ground; but who, if you reject the warning, can only think of you as of the fool who perishes in his folly. May Heaven guide you to a sound judgment of your condition! So prays one who would be your friend, if you pleased,

"UNKNOWN."

The Tower!—it was a word of terror, even more so than a civil prison; for how many passages to death did that dark structure present! The severe executions which it had witnessed in preceding reigns, were not perhaps more numerous than the secret murders which had taken place within its walls; yet Peveril did not a moment hesitate on the part which he had to perform. "I will share my father's fate," he said; "I thought but of him when they brought me hither; I will think of nothing else when they convey me to yonder still more dreadful place of confinement; it is his, and it is but meet that it should be his son's.—And thou, Alice Bridgenorth, the day that I renounce thee, may I be held alike a traitor and a dastard!—Go, false adviser, and share the fate of seducers and heretical teachers!"

He could not help uttering this last expression aloud, as he threw the billet into the fire, with a vehemence which made the dwarf start with surprise. "What say you of burning heretics, young man?" he exclaimed; "by my faith, your zeal must be warmer than mine, if you talk on such a subject when the heretics are the prevailing number. May I measure six feet without my shoes, but the heretics would have the beat of it if we came to that work. Beware of such words."

"Too late to beware of words spoken and heard," said the turnkey, who, opening the door with unusual precautions to avoid noise, had stolen unperceived into the room; "however, Master Peveril has behaved like a gentleman, and I am no talebearer, on condition he will consider I have had trouble in his matters."

Julian had no alternative but to take the fellow's hint and administer a bribe, with which Master Clink was so well satisfied, that he exclaimed, "It went to his heart to take leave of such a kind-natured gentleman, and that he could have turned the key on him for twenty years with pleasure. But the best friends must part."

"I am to be removed, then?" said Julian.

"Ay, truly, master, the warrant is come from the Council."

"To convey me to the Tower?"

"Whew!" exclaimed the officer of the law—"who the devil told you that? But since you do know it, there is no harm to say ay. So make yourself ready to move immediately; and first, hold out your dew-beaters till I take off the darbies."

"Is that usual?" said Peveril, stretching out his feet as the fellow directed, while his fetters were unlocked.

"Why, ay, master, these fetters belong to the keeper; they are not a-going to send them to the Lieutenant, row. No, no, the warders must bring their own ar with them; they get none here, I promise them. nevertheless, if your honour hath a fancy to go in tters, as thinking it may move compassion of your use"—

"I have no intention to make my case seem worse an it is," said Julian, whilst at the same time it ossed his mind that his anonymous correspondent ust be well acquainted both with his own personal ibits, since the letter proposed a plan of escape which uld only be executed by a bold swimmer, and with e fashions of the prison, since it was foreseen that : would not be ironed on his passage to the Tower. e turnkey's next speech made him carry conjecture ill farther.

"There is nothing in life I would not do for so brave guest," said Clink; "I could nab one of my wife's ands for you, if your honour had the fancy to mount e white flag in your beaver."

"To what good purpose?" said Julian, shortly, nnecting as was natural, the man's proposed civility ith the advice given and the signal prescribed in the ter.

"Nay, to no good purpose I know of," said the turn- y; "only it is the fashion to seem white and harm- e—a sort of token of not guiltiness, as I may say, ich folks desire to show the world whether they be ily guilty or not; but I cannot say that guiltiness or t guiltiness argues much, saving they be words in e verdict."

"Strange," thought Peveril, although the man med to speak quite naturally, and without any dou- meaning, "strange that all should apparently come to realize the plan of escape, could I but give my sment to it! And had I not better consent? Who- er does so much for me must wish me well, and a ill-wisher would never enforce the unjust condi- ns on which I am required to consent to my libera- n."

But this misgiving of his resolution was but for a ment. He speedily recollected, that whoever aided i in escaping, must be necessarily exposed to great ; and had a right to name the stipulation on which was willing to incur it. He also recollected that ehood is equally base, whether expressed in words n dumb show; and that he should lie as flatly by ng the signal agreed upon in evidence of his re- ncing Alice Bridgenorth, as he would in direct ns if he made such renunciation without the pur- e of abiding by it.

If you would oblige me," he said to the turnkey, : me have a piece of black silk crape for the pur- e you mention."

Of crape," said the fellow; "what should that usy? Why, the bien morts, who hing out to tour ou,* will think you a chimney-sweeper on May-

It will show my settled sorrow," said Julian, "as l as my determined resolution."

As you will, sir," answered the fellow; "I'll pro- : you with a black rag of some kind or other. So, r, let us be moving."

Julian intimated his readiness to attend him, and eeded to bid farewell to his late companion, the t Geoffrey Hudson. The parting was not without tion on both sides, more particularly on that of poor little man, who had taken a particular liking he companion of whom he was now about to be rived. "Fare ye well," he said, "my young id," taking Julian's hand in both his own uplited ns, in which action he somewhat resembled the ude of a sailor pulling a rope overhead,—“Many ny situation would think himself wronged, as a lier and servant of the King's chamber, in seeing removed to a more honourable prison than that ich I am limited unto. But, I thank God, I grudge not the Tower, nor the Rocks of Scilly, nor even isbrooke Castle, though the latter was graced with captivity of my blessed and martyred master. Go re you will, I wish you all the distinction of an ourable prison-house, and a safe and speedy de- rance in God's own time. For myself, my race is r a close, and that because I fall a martyr to the over-tenderness of my own heart. There is a cir- cumstance, good Master Julian Peveril, which should have been yours, had Providence permitted our farther intimacy, but it fits not the present hour. Go, then, my friend, and bear witness in life and death, that Geoffrey Hudson scorns the insults and persecutions of fortune, as he would despise, and has often de- spised, the mischievous pranks of an overgrown schoolboy."

So saying, he turned away, and hid his face with his little handkerchief, while Julian felt towards him that tragi-comic sensation which makes us pity the object which excites it, not the less that we are some- what inclined to laugh amid our sympathy. The jailer made him a signal, which Peveril obeyed, leav- ing the dwarf to disconsolate solitude.

As Julian followed the keeper through the various windings of this penal labyrinth, the man observed, that "he was a rum fellow, that little Sir Geoffrey, and, for gallantry, a perfect Cock of Bantam, for as old as he was. There was a certain gay wench," he said, "that had hooked him; but what she could make of him, save she carried him to Smithfield, and took money for him, as for a motion of puppets, it was," he said, "hard to gather."

Encouraged by this opening, Julian asked if his attendant knew why his prison was changed. "To teach you to become a King's post without commis- sion," answered the fellow.

He stopped in his tattle as they approached that formidable central point, in which lay couched on his leathern elbow-chair the fat commander of the fortress, stationed apparently for ever in the midst of his citadel, as the huge Boa is sometimes said to lie stretched as a guard upon the subterranean treasures of Eastern Rajahs. This overgrown man of authority eyed Julian wistfully and sullenly, as the miser the guinea which he must part with, or the hungry mastiff the food which is carried to an- other kennel. He growled to himself as he turned the leaves of his ominous register, in order to make the necessary entry respecting the removal of his prisoner. "To the Tower—to the Tower—ay, ay, all must to the Tower—that's the fashion of it—free Britons to a military prison, as if we had neither bolts nor chains here!—I hope Parliament will have it up, this Towering work, that's all.—Well, the young- ster will take no good by the change, and that is one comfort."

Having finished at once his official act of regis- tration, and his soliloquy, he made a signal to his assistants to remove Julian, who was led along the same stern passages which he had traversed upon his entrance, to the gate of the prison, whence a coach, escorted by two officers of justice, conveyed him to the waterside.

A boat here waited him, with four warders of the Tower, to whose custody he was formally resigned by his late attendants. Clink, however, the turnkey, with whom he was more especially acquainted, did not take leave of him without furnishing him with the piece of black crape which he requested. Peveril fixed it on his hat amid the whispers of his new guardians. "The gentleman is in a hurry to go into mourning," said one; "mayhap he had better wait till he has cause."

"Perhaps others may wear mourning for him, ere he can mourn for any one," answered another of these functionaries.

Yet, notwithstanding the tenor of these whispers, their behaviour to their prisoner was more respectful than he had experienced from his former keepers, and might be termed a sullen civility. The ordinary officers of the law were in general rude, as having to do with felons of every description; whereas these men were only employed with persons accused of state crimes—men who were from birth and circum- stances usually entitled to expect, and able to reward, decent usage.

The change of keepers passed unnoticed by Julian, as did the gay and busy scene presented by the broad and beautiful river on which he was now launched. A hundred boats shot past them, bearing parties intent on business, or on pleasure. Julian only viewed them the stern hope, that whoever had endeavoured to save him from his fidelity by the hope of freedom, might see, from the colour of the badge which he had assumed, how determined he was to resist the temptation presented to him.

It was about high water, and a stout wherry came up the river, with sail and oar, so directly upon that in which Julian was embarked, that it seemed as if likely to run her aboard. "Get your carabines ready," cried the principal warder to his assistants. "What the devil can these scoundrels mean?"

But the crew in the other boat seemed to have perceived their error, for they suddenly altered their course, and struck off into the middle stream, while a torrent of mutual abuse was exchanged betwixt them and the boat whose course they had threatened to impede.

"The Unknown has kept his faith," said Julian to himself; "I too have kept mine."

It even seemed to him, as the boats neared each other, that he heard from the other wherry, something like a stifled scream or groan; and when the momentary bustle was over, he asked the warder who sat next him, what boat that was.

"Men-of-war's men on a frolic, I suppose," answered the warder. "I know no one else would be so impudent as run foul of the King's boat; for I am sure the fellow put the helm up on purpose. But mayhap you, sir, know more of the matter than I do."

This insinuation effectually prevented Julian from putting farther questions, and he remained silent until the boat came under the dusky bastions of the Tower. The tide carried them up under a dark and lowering arch, closed at the upper end by the well-known Traitor's gate,* formed like a wicket of huge intersecting bars of wood, through which might be seen a dim and imperfect view of soldiers and warders upon duty, and of the steep ascending causeway which leads up from the river into the interior of the fortress. By this gate,—and it is the well-known circumstance which assigned its name,—those accused of state crimes were usually committed to the Tower. The Thames afforded a secret and silent mode of conveyance for transporting thither such whose fallen fortunes might move the commiseration, or whose popular qualities might excite the sympathy, of the public; and even where no cause for especial secrecy existed, the peace of the city was undisturbed by the tumult attending the passage of the prisoner and his guards through the most frequented streets.

Yet this custom, however recommended by state policy, must have often struck chill upon the heart of the criminal, who thus, stolen, as it were, out of society, reached the place of his confinement, without encountering even one glance of compassion on the road; and as, from under the dusky arch, he landed on those flinty steps, worn by many a footstep anxious as his own, against which the tide lapped fitfully with small successive waves, and thence looked forward to the steep ascent into a Gothic state-prison, and backward to such part of the river as the low-brow'd vault suffered to become visible, he must often have felt that he was leaving daylight, hope, and life itself, behind him.

While the warder's challenge was made and answered, Peveril endeavoured to obtain information from his conductors where he was likely to be confined; but the answer was brief and general—"Where the Lieutenant should direct."

"Could he not be permitted to share the imprisonment of his father, Sir Geoffrey Peveril?" He forgot not, on this occasion, to add the surname of his house.

The warder, an old man of respectable appearance, stared, as if at the extravagance of the demand, and said bluntly, "It is impossible."

"At least," said Peveril, "show me where my father is confined, that I may look upon the walls which separate us."

"Young gentleman," said the senior warder, shaking his gray head, "I am sorry for you; but asking questions will do you no service. In this place we know nothing of fathers and sons."

Yet chance seemed, in a few minutes afterwards, to offer Peveril that satisfaction which the rigour of his keepers was disposed to deny to him. As he was conveyed up the steep passage which leads under what is called the Wakefield Tower, a female voice, in a tone wherein grief and joy were indescribably mixed, exclaimed, "My son!—My dear son!"

Even those who guarded Julian seemed softened by a tone of such acute feeling. They slackened their pace. They almost paused to permit him to look up towards the casement from which the sounds of maternal agony proceeded; but the aperture was so narrow, and so closely grated, that nothing was visible save a white female hand, which grasped one of those rusty barricades, as if for supporting the person within, while another streamed a white handkerchief, and then let it fall. The casement was instantly deserted.

"Give it me," said Julian to the officer who lifted the handkerchief; "it is perhaps a mother's last gift."

The old warder lifted the napkin, and looked at it with the jealous minuteness of one who is accustomed to detect secret correspondence in the most trifling acts of intercourse.

"There may be writing on it with invisible ink," said one of his comrades.

"It is wetted, but I think it is only with tears," answered the senior. "I cannot keep it from the poor young gentleman."

"Ah, Master Coleby," said his comrade, in a gentle tone of reproach, "you would have been wearing a better coat than a yeoman's to-day, had it not been for your tender heart."

"It signifies little," said old Coleby, "while my heart is true to my King, what I feel in discharging my duty, or what coat keeps my old bosom from the cold weather."

Peveril, mean while, folded in his breast the token of his mother's affection which chance had favoured him with; and when placed in the small and solitary chamber which he was told to consider as his own during his residence in the Tower, he was soothed even to weeping by this trifling circumstance, which he could not help considering as an omen, that his unfortunate house was not entirely deserted by Providence.

But the thoughts and occurrences of a prison are too uniform for a narrative, and we must now convey our readers into a more bustling scene.

CHAPTER XXXVII

Henceforth 'tis done—Fortune and I are friends:
And I must live, for Buckingham commands.—POPE.

THE spacious mansion of the Duke of Buckingham, with the demesne belonging to it, originally bore the name of York House, and occupied a large portion of the ground adjacent to the Savoy.

This had been laid out by the munificence of his father, the favourite of Charles the First, in a most splendid manner, so as almost to rival Whitehall itself. But during the increasing rage for building new streets, and the creating of almost an additional town, in order to connect London and Westminster, this ground had become of very great value; and the second Duke of Buckingham, who was at once fond of scheming, and needy of money, had agreed to a plan laid before him by some adventurous architect, for converting the extensive grounds round his palace into those streets, lanes, and courts, which still perpetuate his name and titles; though those who live in Buckingham Street, Duke Street, Villiers' Street, or in Of-alley, (for even that connecting particle is locally commemorated,) probably think seldom of the memory of the witty, eccentric, and licentious George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, whose titles are preserved in the names of their residence and its neighbourhood.

This building-plan the Duke had entered upon with all the eagerness which he usually attached to novelty.

gardens were destroyed—his pavilions levelled—splendid stables demolished—the whole pomp of suburban demesne laid waste, cumbered with ruins, and intersected with the foundations of new buildings and cellars, and the process of levelling went on for the intended streets. But the undertaking, although it proved afterwards both lucrative and successful, met with a check at the outset, from want of the necessary funds, partly from impatient and mercurial temper of the Duke, which soon carried him off in pursuit of some more important object. So that, though much was demolished, very little, in comparison, was reared up in the stead, and nothing was completed. The principal part of the ducal mansion still remained uninjured; but the demesne in which it stood bore a strange analogy to the irregular mind of its noble owner. Here stood a useful group of exotic trees and shrubs, the remnant of the garden, amid yawning common-sewers and mounds of rubbish. In one place an old tower threatened to fall upon the spectator; and in another, he saw the risk of being swallowed up by a modern vault. The grandeur of conception could be discovered in the undertaking, but was almost every where marred by slovenly or negligence of execution. In short, the whole place was the true emblem of an understanding and talents run to waste, and become more dangerous than advantageous to society, by the want of a steady principle, and the improvidence of the possessor.

There were men who took a different view of the Duke's purpose in permitting his mansion to be thus rounded, and his demesne occupied by modern buildings which were incomplete, and ancient which were but half demolished. They alleged, that, engaged as he was in so many mysteries of love and of politics, and having the character of the most daring and dangerous intriguer of his time, his Grace found it convenient to surround himself with this ruinous mansion, into which officers of justice could not penetrate without some difficulty and hazard; and which might afford, upon occasion, a safe and secret shelter for such tools as were fit for desperate enterprises, and a private and unobserved mode of access to those whom he might have any special reason for receiving in secret.

Leaving Peveril in the Tower, we must once more convey our readers to the levee of the Duke, who, on the morning of Julian's transference to that fortress, had addressed his minister-in-chief, and principal attendant:—"I have been so pleased with your conduct in this matter, Jerningham, that if Old Nick were to arise in our presence, and offer me his best pipe, as a familiar in thy room, I would hold it but a poor compliment."

"A legion of imps," said Jerningham, bowing, "could not have been more busy than I in your Grace's service; but if your Grace will permit me to go, your whole plan was well nigh marred by my not returning home till last night, or rather this morning."

"And why, I pray you, sage Master Jerningham," said his Grace, "should I have returned home any instant sooner than my pleasure and convenience required?"

"Nay, my Lord Duke," replied the attendant, "I know not; only, when you sent us word by Empson, to Chiffinch's apartment, to command us to make use of the girl at any rate, and at all risks, you said we would be here so soon as you could get freed of the King."

"Freed of the King, you rascal! What sort of rascal is that?" demanded the Duke.

"It was Empson who used it, my lord, as coming from you Grace."

"There is much very fit for my Grace to say, that becomes such mouths as Empson's or your's to repeat," answered the Duke, haughtily, but instantly changed his tone of familiarity, for his humour was as capricious as his pursuits. "But I know what you wouldst have; first, your wisdom would know what became of me since thou hadst my commands to Chiffinch's; and next, your valour would fain and another flourish of trumpets on thine own most artificial retreat, leaving thy comrade in the hands of the Philistines."

"May it please your Grace," said Jerningham, "I did but retreat for the preservation of the baggage."

"What! do you play at crambo with me?" said the Duke. "I would have you know that the common parish fool should be whipt, were he to attempt to pass pun or quodlibet as a genuine jest, even amongst ticket-porters and hackney-chairmen."

"And yet I have heard your Grace indulge in the jeu de mots," answered the attendant.

"Sirrah Jerningham," answered the patron, "discard thy memory, or keep it under correction, else it will hamper thy rise in the world. Thou mayst perchance have seen me also have a fancy to play at trap-ball, or to kiss a serving-wench, or to guzzle ale and eat toasted cheese in a portlerly whimsy; but is it fitting thou shouldst remember such follies? No more on't. —Hark you; how came the long lubberly fool, Jenkins, being a master of the noble science of defence, to suffer himself to be run through the body so simply by a rustic swain like this same Peveril?"

"Please your Grace, this same Corydon is no such novice. I saw the onset; and, except in one hand, I never saw a sword managed with such life, grace, and facility."

"Ay, indeed?" said the Duke, taking his own sheathed rapier in his hand, "I could not have thought that. I am somewhat rusted, and have need of breathing. Peveril is a name of note. As well go to Barns-elms, or behind Montagu House, with him as with another. His father a ruined plottor, too. The public would have noted it in me as becoming a zealous Protestant. Needful I do something to maintain my good name in the city, to atone for non-attendance on prayer and preaching. But your Laertes is fast in the Fleet; and I suppose his blundering blockhead of an antagonist is dead or dying."

"Recovering, my lord, on the contrary," replied Jerningham; "the blade fortunately avoided his vitals."

"D—n his vitals!" answered the Duke. "Tell him to postpone his recovery, or I will put him to death in earnest."

"I will caution his surgeon," said Jerningham, "which will answer equally well."

"Do so; and tell him he had better be on his own deathbed as cure his patient till I send him notice.—That young fellow must be let loose again at no rate."

"There is little danger," said the attendant. "I hear some of the witnesses have got their net flung over him on account of some matters down in the north; and that he is to be translated to the Tower for that, and for some letters of the Countess of Derby, as rumour goes."

"To the Tower let him go, and get out as he can," replied the Duke; "and when you hear he is fast there, let the fencing fellow recover as fast as the surgeon and he can mutually settle it."

The Duke, having said this, took two or three turns in the apartment, and appeared to be in deep thought. His attendant waited the issue of his meditations at leisure, being well aware that such moods, during which his mind was strongly directed in one point, were never of so long duration with his patron as to prove a severe burden to his own patience.

Accordingly, after the silence of seven or eight minutes, the Duke broke through it, taking from the toilette a large silk purse, which seemed full of gold. "Jerningham," he said, "thou art a faithful fellow, and it would be sin not to cherish thee. I beat the King at Maul on his bold defiance. The honour is enough for me; and thou, my boy, shalt have the winnings."

Jerningham pocketed the purse with due acknowledgments.

"Jerningham," his Grace continued, "I know you blame me for changing my plans too often; and on my soul I have heard you so learned on the subject, that I have become of your opinion, and have been vexed at myself for two or three hours together, for not sticking as constantly to one object, as doubtless I shall, when age, (touching his forehead) shall make this same weathercock too rusty to turn with the changing breeze. But as yet, while I have spirit and action, let it whirl like the vane at the mast-head, which teaches the pilot how to steer his course; and when I shift mine, think I am bound to follow fortune, and not to control her."

"I can understand nothing from all this, please your Grace," replied Jerningham, "save that you have been pleased to change some purposed measures, and think that you have profited by doing so."

"You shall judge yourself," replied the Duke. "I have seen the Duchess of Portsmouth.—You start. It is true, by Heaven! I have seen her, and from sworn enemies we have become sworn friends. The treaty between such high and mighty powers had some weighty articles; besides, I had a French negotiator to deal with; so that you will allow a few hours' absence was but a necessary interval to make up our matters of diplomacy."

"Your Grace astonishes me," said Jerningham, "Christian's plan of supplanting the great lady is then entirely abandoned? I thought you had but desired to have the fair successor here, in order to carry it on under your own management."

"I forget what I meant at the time," said the Duke; "unless that I was resolved she should not jilt me as she did the good-natured man of royalty; and so I am still determined, since you put me in mind of the fair Dowsabelle. But I had a contrite note from the Duchess while we were at the Mall. I went to see her, and found her a perfect Niobe.—On my soul, in spite of red eyes and swelled features, and dishevelled hair, there are, after all, Jerningham, some women, who do, as the poets say, look lovely in affliction. Out came the cause; and with such humility, such penitence, such throwing herself on my mercy, (she the proudest devil, too, in the whole Court,) that I must have had heart of steel to resist it all. In short, Chiffinch in a drunken fit had played the babbler, and let young Saville into our intrigue. Saville plays the rogue, and informs the Duchess by a messenger, who luckily came a little late into the market. She learned, too, being a very devil for intelligence, that there had been some jarring between the master and me about this new Phillis; and that I was most likely to catch the bird,—as any one may see who looks on us both. It must have been Empson who fluted all this into her Grace's ear; and thinking she saw how her ladyship and I could hunt in couples, she entreats me to break Christian's scheme, and keep the wench out of the King's sight, especially if she were such a rare piece of perfection as fame has reported her."

"And your Grace has promised her your hand to uphold the influence which you have so often threatened to ruin?" said Jerningham.

"Ay, Jerningham; my turn was as much served when she seemed to own herself in my power, and cry me mercy.—And observe, it is all one to me by which ladder I climb into the King's cabinet. That of Portsmouth is ready fixed—better ascend by it than fling it down to put up another—I hate all unnecessary trouble."

"And Christian?" said Jerningham.

"May go to the devil for a self-conceited ass. One pleasure of this twist of intrigue is, to revenge me of that villain, who thought himself so essential, that, by Heaven! he forced himself on my privacy, and lectured me like a schoolboy. Hang the cold-blooded hypocritical vermin! If he mutters, I will have his nose slit as wide as Coventry's.*—Hark ye, is the Colonel come?"

"I expect him every moment, your Grace."

"Send him up when he arrives," said the Duke.

"—Why do you stand looking at me? What would you have?"

"Your Grace's direction respecting the young lady," said Jerningham.

"Odd zooks," said the Duke, "I had totally forgotten her.—Is she very tearful?—Exceedingly afflicted?"

"She does not take on so violently as I have seen some do," said Jerningham; "but, for a strong, firm, concentrated indignation, I have seen none to match her."

"Well, we will permit her to cool. I will not face the affliction of a second fair one immediately. I am tired of snivelling, and swelled eyes, and blubbered cheeks, for some time; and, moreover, must husband my powers of consolation. Begone, and send the Colonel."

"Will your Grace permit me one other question?" demanded his confidant.

"Ask what thou wilt, Jerningham, and then be gone."

"Your Grace has determined to give up Christian," said the attendant. "May I ask what becomes of the kingdom of Man?"

"Forgotten, as I have a Christian soul!" said the Duke; "as much forgotten as if I had never nourished that scheme of royal ambition.—D—n it, we must knit up the ravelled skein of that intrigue.—Yet it is but a miserable rock, not worth the trouble I have been bestowing on it; and for a kingdom—it has a sound indeed; but, in reality, I might as well stick a cock-chicken's feather into my hat, and call it a plume. Besides, now I think upon it, it would scarce be honourable to sweep that petty royalty out of Derby's possession. I won a thousand pieces of the young Earl when he was last here, and suffered him to hang about me at Court. I question if the whole revenue of his kingdom is worth twice as much. Easily I could win it of him, were he here, with less trouble than it would cost me to carry on these troublesome intrigues of Christian's."

"If I may be permitted to say so, please your Grace," answered Jerningham, "although your Grace is perhaps somewhat liable to change your mind, no man in England can afford better reasons for doing so."

"I think so myself, Jerningham," said the Duke; "and it may be it is one reason for my changing. One likes to vindicate his own conduct, and to find out fine reasons for doing what one has a mind to.—And now, once again, begone. Or, hark ye—hark ye—I shall need some loose gold. You may leave the purse I gave you; and I will give you an order for as much, and two years' interest, on old Jacob Doublesec."

"As your Grace pleases," said Jerningham, his whole stock of complaisance scarcely able to conceal his mortification at exchanging for a distant order, of a kind which of late had not been very regularly honoured, the sunny contents of the purse which had actually been in his pocket. Secretly but solemnly did he make a vow, that two years' interest alone should not be the compensation for this involuntary exchange in the form of his remuneration.

As the discontented dependant left the apartment, he met, at the head of the grand staircase, Christian himself, who, exercising the freedom of an ancient friend of the house, was making his way unannounced, to the Duke's dressing-apartment. Jerningham, conjecturing that his visit at this crisis would be any thing but well-timed, or well-taken, endeavoured to avert his purpose, by asserting that the Duke was indisposed, and in his bedchamber; and this he said so loud that his master might hear him, and, if he pleased, realize the apology which he offered in his name, by retreating into the bed-room as his last sanctuary, and drawing the bolt against intrusion.

But, far from adopting a stratagem to which he had had recourse on former occasions, in order to avoid those who came upon him, though at an appointed hour, and upon business of importance, Buckingham called, in a loud voice, from his dressing-apartment, commanding his chamberlain instantly to introduce his good friend Master Christian, and censuring him for hesitating for an instant to do so.

"Now," thought Jerningham within himself, "if Christian knew the Duke as well as I do, he would sooner stand the leap of a lion, like the London 'prentice bold, than venture on my master at this moment, who is even now in a humour nearly as dangerous as the animal."

He then ushered Christian into his master's pre-ness, taking care to post himself within ear-shot of the door.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

"Speak not of niceness, when there's chance of wreck."
The captain said, as ladies writhed their neck
To see the dying dolphin flap the deck:
"If we go down, on us these gentry sup;
We dine upon them, if we haul them up.
Wise men applaud us when we eat the eaters,
As the devil laughs when keen folks cheat the cheaters."
The Sea Voyage.

THERE was nothing in the Duke's manner towards Christian which could have conveyed to that latter personage, experienced as he was in the worst possible ways of the world, that Buckingham would, at that particular moment, rather have seen the devil than himself; unless it was that Buckingham's reception of him, being rather extraordinarily courteous towards so old an acquaintance, might have excited some degree of suspicion.

Having escaped with some difficulty from the vague region of general compliments, which bears the same relation to that of business that Milton informs us the Limbo Patrum has to the sensible and material earth, Christian asked his Grace of Buckingham, with the same blunt plainness with which he usually veiled a very deep and artificial character, whether he had lately seen Chiffinch or his helpmate?

"Neither of them lately," answered Buckingham. "Have not you waited on them yourself?—I thought you would have been more anxious about the great scheme."

"I have called once and again," said Christian, "but I can gain no access to the sight of that important couple. I begin to be afraid they are paltering with me."

"Which, by the welkin and its stars, you would not be slow in avenging, Master Christian. I know your puritanical principles on that point well," said the Duke. "Revenge may be well said to be sweet, when so many grave and wise men are ready to exchange for it all the sugar-plums which pleasures offer to the poor sinful people of the world, besides the reversion of those which they talk of expecting in the way of post obit."

"You may jest, my lord," said Christian, "but still—"

"But still you will be revenged on Chiffinch, and his little commodious companion. And yet the task may be difficult—Chiffinch has so many ways of obliging his master—his little woman is such a convenient pretty sort of a screen, and has such winning little ways of her own, that, in faith, in your case, I would not meddle with them. What is this refusing her door, man? We all do it to our best friends now and then, as well as to duns and dull company."

"If your Grace is in a humour of rambling thus wildly in your talk," said Christian, "you know my old faculty of patience—I can wait till it be your pleasure to talk more seriously."

"Seriously?" said his Grace—"Wherefore not?—I only wait to know what your serious business may be."

"In a word, my lord, from Chiffinch's refusal to see me, and some vain calls which I have made at your Grace's mansion, I am afraid either that our plan has miscarried, or that there is some intention to exclude me from the further conduct of the matter." Christian pronounced these words with considerable emphasis.

"That were folly, as well as treachery," returned the Duke, "to exclude from the spoil the very engineer who conducted the attack. But hark ye, Christian—I am sorry to tell bad news without preparation; but as you insist on knowing the worst, and are not ashamed to suspect your best friends, out it must come.—Your niece left Chiffinch's house the morning before yesterday."

Christian staggered, as if he had received a severe blow; and the blood ran to his face in such a current of passion, that the Duke concluded he was struck with an apoplexy. But, exerting the extraordinary command which he could maintain under the most trying circumstances, he said, with a voice, the composure of which had an unnatural contrast with the alteration of his countenance, "Am I to conclude, that in leaving the protection of the roof in which I placed her, the girl has found shelter under that of your Grace?"

"Sir," replied Buckingham, gravely, "the supposition does my gallantry more credit than it deserves."

"Oh, my Lord Duke," answered Christian, "I am not one whom you can impose on by this species of courtly jargon. I know of what your Grace is capable; and that to gratify the caprice of a moment, you would not hesitate to disappoint even the schemes at which you yourself have laboured most busily.—Suppose this jest played off. Take your laugh at those simple precautions by which I intended to protect your Grace's interest, as well as that of others. Let us know the extent of your frolic, and consider how far its consequences can be repaired."

"On my word, Christian," said the Duke, laughing, "you are the most obliging of uncles and of guardians. Let your niece pass through as many adventures as Boccaccio's bride of the King of Garba, you care not. Pure or soiled, she will still make the footstool of your fortune."

An Indian proverb says, that the dart of contempt will even pierce through the shell of the tortoise; but this is more peculiarly the case when conscience tells the subject of the sarcasm that it is justly merited. Christian, stung with Buckingham's reproach, at once assumed a haughty and threatening mien, totally inconsistent with that in which sufferance seemed to be as much his badge as that of Shylock. "You are a foul-mouthed and most unworthy lord," he said; "and as such I proclaim you, unless you make reparation for the injury you have done me."

"And what," said the Duke of Buckingham, "shall I proclaim you, that can give you the least title to notice from such as I am? What name shall I bestow on the little transaction which has given rise to such unexpected misunderstanding?"

Christian was silent, either from rage or from mental conviction.

"Come, come, Christian," said the Duke, smiling, "we know too much of each other to make a quarrel safe. Hato each other we may—circumvent each other—it is the way of Courts—but proclaim!—a fico for the phrase."

"I used it not," said Christian, "till your Grace drove me to extremity. You know, my lord, I have fought both at home and abroad; and you should not rashly think that I will endure any indignity which blood can wipe away."

"On the contrary," said the Duke, with the same civil and sneering manner, "I can confidently assert, that the life of half a score of your friends would seem very light to you, Christian, if their existence interfered, I do not say with your character, as being a thing of much less consequence, but with any advantage which their existence might intercept.—Fie, upon it, man, we have known each other long. I never thought you a coward; and am only glad to see I could strike a few sparkles of heat out of your cold and constant disposition. I will now, if you please, tell you at once the fate of the young lady, in which I pray you to believe that I am truly interested."

"I hear you, my Lord Duke," said Christian. "The curl of your upper-lip, and your eyebrow, does not escape me. Your Grace knows the French proverb, 'He laughs best who laughs last.' But I hear you."

"Thank Heaven you do," said Buckingham; "for your case requires haste, I promise you, and involves no laughing matter. Well, then, hear a simple truth, on which (if it became me to offer any pledge for what I assert to be such) I could pledge life, fortune, and honour. It was the morning before last, when meeting with the King at Chiffinch's unexpectedly—in fact I had looked in to fool an hour away, and to learn how your scheme advanced—I saw a singular scene. Your niece terrified little Chiffinch—the hen Chiffinch, I mean;) bid the King defiance to his teeth, and walked out of the presence triumphantly, under the guardianship of a young fellow of little mark or likelihood, excepting a tolerable personal presence, and the advantage of a most unconquerable impudence. Egad, I can hardly help laughing to think how the King and I were both baffled; for I will not deny, that I had tried to trifle for a moment with the fair Indamora. But, egad, the young fellow swooped her off from under our noses, like my own Drawcanair clearing off the banquet from the two Kings of Brentford. There was a dignity in the gallant's swaggering retreat which I must try to teach Mohun;* it will suit his part admirably."

"This is incomprehensible, my Lord Duke," said Christian, who by this time had recovered all his usual coolness; "you cannot expect me to believe this. Who dared be so bold as to carry off my niece in such a manner, and from so august a presence? And with whom, a stranger as he must have been, would she, wise and cautious as I know her, have consented to depart in such a manner?—My lord, I cannot believe this."

"One of your priests, my most devout Christian," replied the Duke, "would answer, Dic, infidel, in thine unbelief; but I am only a poor worldly sinner, and will add what mite of information I can. The young fellow's name, as I am given to understand, is Julian, son of Sir Geoffrey, whom men call Peveril of the Peak."

"Peveril of the Devil, who hath his cavern there?" said Christian, warmly; "for I know that gallant, and believe him capable of any thing bold and desperate. But how could he intrude himself into the royal presence? Either Hell aids him, or Heaven looks nearer into mortal dealings than I have yet believed. If so, may God forgive us, who deemed he thought not on us at all!"

"Amen, most christian Christian," replied the Duke. "I am glad to see thou hast yet some touch of grace that leads thee to augur so. But Empson, the hen Chiffinch, and half a dozen more, saw the swain's entrance and departure. Please examine these witnesses with your own wisdom, if you think your time may not be better employed in tracing the fugitives. I believe he gained entrance as one of some dancing or masking party. Rowley, you know, is accessible to all who will come forth to make him sport. So in stole this termagant tearing gallant, like Samson among the Philistines, to pull down our fine scheme about our cars."

"I believe you, my lord," said Christian; "I cannot but believe you; and I forgive you, since it is your nature, for making sport of what is ruin and destruction. But which way did they take?"

"To Derbyshire, I should presume, to seek her father," said the Duke. "She spoke of going into the paternal protection, instead of yours, Master Christian. Something had chanced at Chiffinch's, to give her cause to suspect that you had not altogether provided for his daughter in the manner which her father was likely to approve of."

"Now, Heaven be praised," said Christian, "she knows not her father is come to London! and they must be gone down either to Martindale Castle, or to Moultrassie Hall; in either case they are in my power—I must follow them close. I will return instantly to Derbyshire—I am undone if she meet her father until these errors are amended. Adieu, my lord. I forgive the part which I fear your Grace must have had in balking our enterprise—it is no time for mutual reproaches."

"You speak truth, Master Christian," said the Duke, "and I wish you all success. Can I help you with men or horses, or money?"

"I thank your Grace," said Christian, and hastily left the apartment.

The Duke watched his descending footsteps on the staircase, until they could be heard no longer, and then exclaimed to Jerningham, who entered, "Victoria! victoria! magna est veritas et prævalebit!—Had I told the villain a word of a lie, he is so familiar with all the regions of falsehood—his whole life has been such an absolute imposture, that I had stood detected in an instant; but I told him truth, and that was the only means of deceiving him. Victoria! my dear Jerningham, I am prouder of cheating Christian, than I should have been of circumventing a minister of state."

"Your Grace holds his wisdom very high," said the attendant.

"His cunning, at least I do, which in Court affairs, often takes the weather-gage of wisdom,—as in Yarmouth Roads a herring-buss will baffle a frigate. He shall not return to London if I can help it, until all these intrigues are over."

As his Grace spoke, the Colonel, after whom he had repeatedly made inquiry, was announced by a gentleman of his household. "He met not Christian, did he?" said the Duke hastily.

"No, my lord," returned the domestic, "the Colonel came by the old garden staircase."

"I judged as much," replied the Duke; "'tis an owl that will not take wing in daylight, when there is a thicket left to skulk under. Here he comes from threading lane, vault, and ruinous alley, very near as ominous a creature as the fowl of ill augury which he resembles."

The Colonel, to whom no other appellation seemed to be given than that which belonged to his military station, now entered the apartment. He was tall, strongly built, and past the middle period of life, and his countenance, but for the heavy cloud which dwelt upon it, might have been pronounced a handsome one. While the Duke spoke to him, either from humility or some other cause, his large serious eye was cast down upon the ground; but he raised it when he answered, with a keen look of earnest observation. His dress was very plain, and more allied to that of the Puritans than of the Cavaliers of the time; a shadowy black hat like the Spanish sombrero, a large black mantle or cloak, and a long rapier, gave him something the air of a Castilione, to which his gravity and stiffness of demeanour added considerable strength.

"Well, Colonel," said the Duke, "we have been long strangers—how have matters gone with you?"

"As with other men of action in quiet times," answered the Colonel, "or as a good war-caper* that lies high and dry in a muddy-creek, till seams and planks are rent and riven."

"Well, Colonel," said the Duke, "I have used your valour before now, and I may again; so that I shall speedily see that the vessel is careened, and undergoes a thorough repair."

"I conjecture, then," said the Colonel, "that your Grace has some voyage in hand?"

"No, but there is one which I want to interrupt," replied the Duke.

"'Tis but another stave of the same tune.—Well, my lord, I listen," answered the stranger.

"Nay," said the Duke, "it is but a trifling matter after all.—You know Ned Christian?"

"Ay, surely, my lord," replied the Colonel, "we have been long known to each other."

"He is about to go down to Derbyshire to seek a certain niece of his, whom he will scarcely find there. Now, I trust to your tried friendship to interrupt his return to London. Go with him, or meet him, cajole him, or assail him, or do what thou wilt with him—only keep him from London for a fortnight at least, and then I care little how soon he comes."

"For by that time, I suppose," replied the Colonel, "any one may find the wench that thinks her worth the looking for."

"Thou mayst think her worth the looking for thyself, Colonel," rejoined the Duke; "I promise you she hath many a thousand stitched to her petticoat; such a wife would save thee from skeldering on the public."

"My lord, I sell my blood and my sword, but not my honour," answered the man sullenly; "if I marry, my bed may be a poor, but it shall be an honest one."

"Then thy wife will be the only honest matter in thy possession, Colonel—at least since I have known you," replied the Duke.

"Why, truly, your Grace may speak your pleasure on that point. It is chiefly your business which I have done of late; and if it were less strictly honest than I could have wished, the employer was to blame, as well as the agent. But for marrying a cast-off mistress, the man (saving your Grace, to whom I am bound) lives not who dares propose it to me."

The Duke laughed loudly. "Why, this is mine Ancient Pistol's vein," he replied.

"— 'Shall I Sir Pandarus of Troy become,
And by my side wear steel?—then Lucifer take all!'"

"My breeding is too plain to understand ends of playhouse verse, my lord," said the Colonel sullenly. "Has your Grace no other service to command me?"

"None—only I am told you have published a Narrative concerning the Plot."

"What should ail me, my lord?" said the Colonel; "I hope I am a witness as competent as any that has yet appeared?"

"Truly, I think so to the full," said the Duke; "and it would have been hard, when so much profitable mischief was going, if so excellent a Protestant as yourself had not come in for a share."

"I came to take your Grace's commands, not to be the object of your wit," said the Colonel.

"Gallantly spoken, most resolute and most immaculate Colonel! As you are to be on full pay in my service for a month to come, I pray your acceptance of this purse, for contingents and equipments, and you shall have my instructions from time to time."

"They shall be punctually obeyed, my lord," said the Colonel; "I know the duty of a subaltern officer. I wish your Grace a good morning."

So saying, he pocketed the purse, without either affecting hesitation, or expressing gratitude, but merely as a part of a transaction in the regular way of business, and stalked from the apartment with the same sullen gravity which marked his entrance.

"Now, there goes a scoundrel after my own heart," said the Duke; "a robber from his cradle, a murderer since he could hold a knife, a profound hypocrite in religion, and a worse and deeper hypocrite in honour,—would sell his soul to the devil to accomplish any villany, and would cut the throat of his brother, did he dare to give the villany he had so acted its right name.—Now, why stand you amazed, good Master Jerningham, and look on me as you would on some monster of Ind, when you had paid your shilling to see it, and were staring out your pennyworth with your eyes as round as a pair of spectacles? Wink, man, and save them, and then let thy tongue untie the mystery."

"On my word, my Lord Duke," answered Jerningham, "since I am compelled to speak, I can only say, that the longer I live with your Grace, I am the more at a loss to fathom your motives of action. Others lay plans, either to attain profit or pleasure by their execution; but your Grace's delight is to counteract your own schemes, when in the very act of performance; like a child—forgive me—that breaks its favourite toy, or a man who should set fire to the house he has half built."

"And why not, if he wanted to warm his hands at the blaze?" said the Duke.

"Ay, my lord," replied his dependant; "but what if, in doing so, he should burn his fingers?—My lord, it is one of your noblest qualities, that you will sometimes listen to the truth without taking offence; but were it otherwise, I could not, at this moment, help speaking out at every risk."

"Well, say on, I can bear it," said the Duke, throwing himself into an easy-chair, and using his toothpick with graceful indifference and equanimity; "I love to hear what such potsherds as thou art, think of the proceedings of us who are of the pure porcelain clay of the earth."

And here the good Colonel Blood, that stole the Duke of Ormond, and, if a timely rescue had not come in, had hanged him at Tyburn, and afterwards stole the crown, though he was not so happy as to carry it off; no player at small games, he, even so, the virtuous Colonel, as this sham plot says, was to have been destroyed by the Papists. It seems these Papists would do no eminent Protestant be safe. But some amends were made to the Colonel by sale of the narrative, licensed Thomas Blood. It would have been strange if so much mischief were turning, and he had not come in for a snack."—Essays, edit. 711, p. 311.

"In the name of heaven, my lord, let me then ask you," said Jerningham, "what merit you claim, or what advantage you expect, from having embroiled every thing in which you are concerned to a degree which equals the chaos of the blind old Roundhead's poem which your Grace is so fond of? To begin with the King. In spite of good-humour, he will be incensed at your repeated rivalry."

"His Majesty defied me to it."

"You have lost all hopes of the Isle, by quarrelling with Christian."

"I have ceased to care a farthing about it," replied the Duke.

"In Christian himself, whom you have insulted, and to whose family you intend dishonour, you have lost a sagacious, artful, and cool-headed instrument and adherent," said the monitor.

"Poor Jerningham!" answered the Duke; "Christian would say as much for thee. I doubt not, wert thou discarded to-morrow. It is the common error of such tools as you and he to think themselves indispensable. As to his family, what was never honourable cannot be dishonoured by any connexion with my house."

"I say nothing of Chiffinch," said Jerningham, "offended as he will be when he learns why, and by whom, his scheme has been ruined, and the lady spirited away—He and his wife, I say nothing of them."

"You need not," said the Duke; "for were they even fit persons to speak to me about, the Duchess of Portsmouth has bargained for their disgrace."

"Then this bloodhound of a Colonel, as he calls himself, your Grace cannot even lay him on a quest which is to do you service, but you must do him such indignity at the same time, as he will not fail to remember, and be sure to fly at your throat should he ever have an opportunity of turning on you."

"I will take care he has none," said the Duke; "and yours, Jerningham, is a low-lived apprehension. Beat your spaniel heartily if you would have him under command. Ever let your agents see you know what they are, and prize them accordingly. A rogue, who must needs be treated as a man of honour, is apt to get above his work. Enough, therefore, of your advice and censure, Jerningham; we differ in every particular. Were we both engineers, you would spend your life in watching some old woman's wheel, which spins flax by the ounce; I must be in the midst of the most varied and counteracting machinery, regulating checks and counter-checks, balancing weights, proving springs and wheels, directing and controlling a hundred combined powers."

"And your fortune, in the mean while?" said Jerningham; "pardon this last hint, my lord."

"My fortune," said the Duke, "is too vast to be hurt by a petty wound; and I have, as thou knowest, a thousand salves in store for the scratches and scars which it sometimes receives in greasing my machinery."

"Your Grace does not mean Dr. Wilderhead's powder of projection?"

"Pshaw! he is a quacksalver, and mountebank, and beggar."

"Or Solicitor Drownland's plan for draining the fens?"

"He is a cheat, —ridelicet, an attorney."

"Or the Laird of Lackpell's sale of Highland woods?"

"He is a Scotsman," said the Duke,—"ridelicet, both cheat and beggar."

"These streets here, upon the site of your noble mansion-house?" said Jerningham.

"The architect's a bite, and the plan's a bubble. I am sick of the sight of this rubbish, and I will soon replace our old alcoves, alleys, and flowerpots, by an Italian garden and a new palace."

"That, my lord, would be to waste, not to improve your fortune," said his domestic.

"Clodpate, and muddy spirit that thou art, thou hast forgot the most hopeful scheme of all—the South Sea Fisheries—their stock is up 50 per cent. already Poor down to the Alley, and tell old Manstone to buy 50,000*l.* for me.—Purpve me, Pluton, I forgot to lay my sacrifice on thy shrine and yet expected thy favour!—Fly post haste, Jerningham—for thy life, for thy life, for thy life!”

With hands and eyes uplifted, Jerningham left the apartment, and the Duke, without thinking a moment further on old or new intrigues—on the friend ship he had formed, or the enmity he had provoked, on the beauty whom he had carried off from her natural protectors, as well as from her lover—or on the monarch against whom he had placed himself in rebellion—sat down to calculate chances with all the cool of Demosthenes, tired of the drudgery in half an hour, and refused to see the zealous agent whom he had employed in the city, because he was busily engaged in writing a new lampoon.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

ABT changed heart, and broke heart:—Progress of Disaster

No event is more ordinary in narratives of this nature, than the abduction of the female on whom rests the interest as supposed to turn, but that of Alice Bridgenorth was thus far particular, that she was spirited away by the Duke of Buckingham, more in contradiction than in the rivalry of passion; and that, as he made his first address to her at Chiffinch's, rather in the spirit of rivalry to his Sovereign, than from any strong impression which her beauty had made on his affections, so he had formed the sudden plan of carrying her away by means of his dependants, rather to perplex Christian, the King, Chiffinch, and all concerned, than because he had any particular desire for her society or his own mission. Indeed, so far was this from being the case, that his Grace was rather surprised than delighted with the success of the enterprise which had made her an inmate there, although it is probable he might have thrown himself into an uncontrollable passion, had he learned the miscarriage instead of its success.

Twenty-four hours passed over since he had returned to his own roof, before, notwithstanding sundry lines from Jerningham, he could even determine on the earnest necessity to pay his late captive a visit; and then it was with the internal reluctance of one who can only be started from indolence by novelty.

“I wonder what made me plague myself about the wench,” said he, “and damn myself to encounter all the hypocritical chicaneries of a country Phillis, with her head stuffed with her grandmother's lessons about virtue and the Bible book, when the finest and best bred woman in town may be had upon more easy terms. It is a pity one cannot mount the victory car of triumph without having a victory to boast of; yet, truth, it is what most of our modern gallants do, though it would not become Buckingham. Well, I must see her—he concluded—though it were but to rid the house of her. The Portsmouth will not hear of her being set at liberty near Charles, so much is she afraid of a new fair seducing the old winner from his allegiance. So how the girl is to be disposed of, for I shall have little fancy to keep her here, and she is too wealthy to be sent down to Chiffinch as a housekeeper—is a matter to be thought on.

He then called for such a dress as might set off his natural good mien—a compliment which he considered as due to his own merit, for as to any thing further, he went to pay his respects to his late prisoner with almost as little zeal in the cause, as a gentleman to fight a duel in which he has no warmer interest than the maintenance of his reputation as a man of honour.

The set of apartments consecrated to the use of those favourites who occasionally made Buckingham's mansion their place of abode and who were, so far as liberty was concerned, often required to observe the regulations of a convent, were separated from the rest of the Duke's extensive mansion. He lived in the age when what was called gallantry warranted the most atrocious actions of deceit and violence, as may be best illustrated by the catastrophe of an unfortunate actress, whose beauty attracted the attention of the late Dr Voss, Earl of Oxford. While her virtue defied his seductions, he ruined her under colour of a mock marriage, and was rewarded for a success which occasioned the death of his victim, by the general applause of the men of wit and gallantry who filled the drawing room of Chiffinch.

* Sketch passing, as it is called, that is, passing so close upon the skirts of the subject, and just clear enough of every description, was at least so common in Charles II's time as our own, and as the necessity of ingenuity in this way produced a road to wealth without the necessity of industry, it was then much pursued by dissolute courtiers.

Buckingham had made provision in the interior of his ducal mansion for exploits of a similar nature, and the set of apartments which he now visited were alternately used to confine the reluctant, and to accommodate the willing.

Being now destined for the former purpose, the key was delivered to the Duke by a hundred and spectated old lady, who sat reading a devout book in the outer hall which divided these apartments (usually called the Nunnery) from the rest of the house. This experienced dowager acted as mistress of the ceremonies on such occasions, and was the trusty depository of more intrigues than were known to any dozen of her worshippful calling besides.

“As sweet a lullaby,” she said, as she undid the outward door, “as ever sung in a cage.”

“I was afraid she might have been more for moping than for singing, Dowlas,” said the Duke.

“Till yesterday she was so, please your Grace,” answered Dowlas, “or, to speak worth, all only this morning, we heard of nothing but Lachrymæ. But the air of your noble Grace's house is favourable to singing birds, and to-day matters have been a-much mended.”

“The sudden change,” said the Duke, “and is something strange, considering that I have never visited her, that the pretty trembler should have been so soon reconciled to her fate.”

“Ah, your Grace has such maps, that a contrivance steals to your very walls, as wholesome creature says, Ecce, non, first and seventh. It clings to the walls and the door-posts.”

“You are too partial, Dame Dowlas,” said the Duke of Buckingham.

“Not a word but truth,” said the dame; “and I wish I may be an outcast from the fold of the lands, but I think this damsel's very frame has changed since she was under your Grace's roof. Methinks she hath a lighter form, a finer step, a more displayed ankle—I cannot tell, but I think there is a change. But, look-a-day, your Grace knows I am as old as I am true, and that my eyes were somewhat uncertain.”

“Especially when you wash them with a cup of canary, Dame Dowlas,” answered the Duke, who was aware that temperance was not amongst the cardinal virtues which were most familiar to the old lady's practice.

“Was it canary your Grace said?—Was it with canary that your Grace should have appointed me to have washed my eyes?” said the offended veteran. “I am sorry that your Grace should know so no better.”

“I crave your pardon, dame,” said the Duke, shaking aside indignantly, the group which in the earnestness of her exclamation, Madam Dowlas had clustered upon his sleeve. “I crave your pardon—your nearer approach has convinced me of a erroneous imputation—I should have said canary, or canary.”

So saying, he walked forward into the inner apartments, which were fitted up with an air of voluptuous magnificence.

“The dame and true, however,” said the proud driver and proprietor of the splendid mansion—“A country Phillis might well exult in herself to such a prison as this, even without a shameful hard labour to such a bird-cage. But I wonder where she can be, the rural Philis. Is it possible she can have resented like a departing commandant, into her back-chamber, the very model of the place, without even an attempt to defend the out-works?”

As he made this reflection, he passed through an antechamber and little eating parlour, exquisitely furnished, and hung with excellent paintings of the Venetian school.

Beyond these lay a withdrawing-room, fitted up in a style of still more studied elegance. The windows were darkened with painted glass, of such a deep and rich colour, as made the mid-day beams, which found their way into the apartment, imitate the rich colours of sunset; and, in the celebrated expression of the poet, "taught light to counterfeit a gloom."

Buckingham's feelings and taste had been too much, and too often, and too readily gratified, to permit him, in the general case, to be easily accessible, even to those pleasures which it had been the business of his life to pursue. The hackneyed voluptuary is like the jaded epicure, the mere listlessness of whose appetite becomes at length a sufficient penalty for having made it the principal object of his enjoyment and cultivation. Yet novelty has always some charms, and uncertainty has more.

The doubt how he was to be received—the change of mood which his prisoner was said to have evinced—the curiosity to know how such a creature as Alice Bridgenorth had been described, was likely to bear herself under the circumstances in which she was so unexpectedly placed, had upon Buckingham, the effect of exciting unusual interest. On his own part, he had none of those feelings of anxiety with which a man, even of the most vulgar mind, comes to the presence of the female whom he wishes to please, far less the more refined sentiments of love, respect, desire, and awe, with which the more refined lover approaches the beloved object. He had been, to use an expressive French phrase, too completely blâsé even from his earliest youth, to permit him now to experience the animal eagerness of the one, far less the more sentimental pleasure of the other. It is no small aggravation of this jaded and uncomfortable state of mind, that the voluptuary cannot renounce the pursuits with which he is saturated, but must continue, for his character's sake, or from the mere force of habit, to take all the toil, fatigue and danger of the chase, while he has so little real interest in the termination.

Buckingham, therefore, felt it due to his reputation as a successful hero of intrigue, to pay his addresses to Alice Bridgenorth with dissembled eagerness; and, as he opened the door of the inner apartment, he paused to consider, whether the tone of gallantry, or that of passion, was fittest to use on the occasion. This delay enabled him to hear a few notes of a lute, touched with exquisite skill, and accompanied by the still sweeter strains of a female voice, which without executing any complete melody, seemed to sport itself in rivalry of the silver sound of the instrument.

"A creature so well educated," said the Duke, "with the sense she is said to possess, would, rustic as she is, laugh at the assumed rants of Orondates. It is the vein of Dorimont—once, Buckingham, that's own—that must here do the feat, besides that the part is easier."

So thinking, he entered the room with that easy grace which characterized the gay courtiers among whom he flourished, and approached the fair tenant, whom he found seated near a table covered with books and music, and having on her left hand the large half-open casement, dim with stained glass, admitting only a doubtful light into this lovely retiring room, which, hung with the richest tapestry of the Gobelins, and ornamented with piles of china and splendid mirrors, seemed like a bower built for a prince to receive his bride.

The splendid dress of the inmate corresponded with the taste of the apartment which she occupied, and partook of the Oriental costume which the much-admired Roxalana had then brought into fashion. A slender foot and ankle, which escaped from the wide trowser of richly ornamented and embroidered blue strain, was the only part of her person distinctly seen; the rest was enveloped from head to foot, in a long veil of silver gauze, which, like a feathery and light mist on a beautiful landscape, suffered you to perceive that what it concealed was rarely lovely, yet induced the imagination even to enhance the charms it shaded. Such part of the dress as could be discovered, was, like the veil and the trowsers, in the Oriental taste; a rich turban, and splendid caftan, were rather indicated than distinguished through the folds of the former. The whole attire argued at least coquetry on the part of a fair one, who must have expected, from her situation, a visitor of some pretension; and induced Buckingham to smile internally at Christian's account of the extreme simplicity and purity of his niece.

He approached the lady à la courtoise, and addressed her with the air of being conscious, while he acknowledged his offences, that his condescending to do so formed a sufficient apology for them. "Fair Mistress Alice," he said, "I am sensible how deeply I ought to sue for pardon for the mistaken zeal of my servants, who, seeing you deserted and exposed without protection during an unlucky affray, took it upon them to bring you under the roof of one who would expose his life rather than suffer you to sustain a moment's anxiety. Was it my fault that those around me should have judged it necessary to interfere for your preservation; or that, aware of the interest I must take in you, they have detained you till I could myself, in personal attendance, receive your commands?"

"That attendance has not been speedily rendered, my lord," answered the lady. "I have been a prisoner for two days, neglected, and left to the charge of menials."

"How say you, lady?—Neglected?" exclaimed the Duke. "By heaven, if the best in my household has failed in his duty, I will discard him on the instant!"

"I complain of no lack of courtesy from your servants, my lord," she replied; "but methinks it had been but complaisant in the Duke himself to explain to me earlier wherefore he has had the boldness to detain me a state prisoner."

"And can the divine Alice doubt," said Buckingham, "that, had time and space, those cruel enemies to the flight of passion, given permission, the instant in which you crossed your vessel's threshold had seen its devoted master at your feet, who hath thought, since he saw you, of nothing but the charms which that fatal morning placed before him at Chiffinch's?"

"I understand, then, my lord," said the lady, "that you have been absent, and have had no part in the restraint which has been exercised upon me?"

"Absent on the King's command, lady, and employed in the discharge of his duty," answered Buckingham without hesitation. "What could I do?—The moment you left Chiffinch's, his Majesty commanded me to the saddle in such haste, that I had no time to change my sem buskins for riding-boots.* If my absence has occasioned you a moment of inconvenience, blame the inconsiderate zeal of those, who, seeing me depart from London, half-distracted at my separation from you, were willing to contribute their unmannered, though well-meant exertions, to preserve their master from despair, by retaining the fair Alice within his reach. To whom, indeed, could they have restored you? He whom you selected as your champion is in prison, or fled—your father absent from town—your uncle in the north. To Chiffinch's house you had expressed your well-founded aversion; and what fitter asylum remained than that of your devoted slave, where you must ever reign a queen?"

"An imprisoned one," said the lady. "I desire not such royalty."

"Alas! how wilfully you misconstrue me!" said the Duke, kneeling on one knee; "and what right can you have to complain of a few hours' gentle restraint—you, who destine so many to hopeless captivity! Be merciful for once, and withdraw that cynical veil; for the divinities are ever most cruel

* This case is not without precedent. Among the satanists and fears expressed by the Long Parliament, they insisted upon an agent for the King to depart for the continent so abruptly, that he had not time to change his court dress—white buskins, to wit, and black silk pantaloons—for an equipment more suitable to travel with.

when they deliver their oracles from such clouded recesses. Suffer at least my rash hand"—

"I will save your Grace that unworthy trouble," said the lady, haughtily; and rising up, she flung back over her shoulders the veil which shrouded her, saying, at the same time, "Look on me, my Lord Duke, and see if these be indeed the charms which have made on your Grace an impression so powerful."

Buckingham did look; and the effect produced on him by surprise was so strong, that he rose hastily from his knee, and remained for a few seconds as if he had been petrified. The figure that stood before him had neither the height nor the rich shape of Alice Bridgenorth; and, though perfectly well made, was so slightly formed, as to seem almost infantine. Her dress was three or four short vests of embroidered satin, disposed one over the other, of different colours, or rather different shades of similar colours; for strong contrast was carefully avoided. These opened in front, so as to show part of the throat and neck, partially obscured by an inner covering of the finest lace; over the uppermost vest was worn a sort of mantle, or coat of rich fur. A small but magnificent turban was carelessly placed on her head, from under which flowed a profusion of coal-black tresses, which Cleopatra might have envied. The taste and splendour of the Eastern dress corresponded with the complexion of the lady's face, which was brunette, of a shade so dark as might almost have served an Indian.

Amidst a set of features, in which rapid and keen expression made amends for the want of regular beauty, the essential points of eyes as bright as diamonds, and teeth as white as pearls, did not escape the Duke of Buckingham, a professed connoisseur in female charms. In a word, the fanciful and singular female who thus unexpectedly produced herself before him, had one of those faces which are never seen without making an impression; which, when removed, are long after remembered; and for which, in our idleness, we are tempted to invent a hundred histories, that we may please our fancy by supposing the features under the influence of different kinds of emotion. Every one must have in recollection countenances of this kind, which, from a captivating and stimulating originality of expression, abide longer in the memory, and are more seductive to the imagination, than even regular beauty.

"My Lord Duke," said the lady, "it seems the lifting of my veil has done the work of magic upon your Grace. Alas, for the captive princess, whose nod was to command a vassal so costly! She runs, methinks, no slight chance of being turned out of doors, like a second Cinderella, to seek her fortune among lackeys and lightermen."

"I am astonished!" said the Duke. "That villain, Jerningham—I will have the scoundrel's blood!"

"Nay, never abuse Jerningham for the matter," said the Unknown; "but lament your own unhappy engagements. While you, my Lord Duke, were posting northward, in white satin buskins, to toil in the King's affairs, the right and lawful princess sat weeping in sables in the uncheered solitude to which your absence condemned her. Two days she was disconsolate in vain; on the third came an African enchantress to change the scene for her, and the person for your Grace. Methinks, my lord, this adventure will tell but ill, when some faithful squire shall recount or record the gallant adventures of the second Duke of Buckingham."

"Fairly bit, and bantered to boot," said the Duke—"the monkey has a turn for satire, too, by all that is piquant.—Hark ye, fair princess, how dared you adventure on such a trick as you have been accomplice to?"

"Dare, my lord?" answered the stranger; "put the question to others, not to one who fears nothing."

"By my faith, I believe so; for thy front is bronzed by nature.—Hark ye once more, mistress—What is your name and condition?"

"My condition I have told you—I am a Mauritanian sorceress by profession, and my name is Zarah," replied the Eastern maiden.

"But methinks that face, shape, and eyes"—said the Duke,—"when didst thou pass for a dancing fairy?—some such imp thou wert, not many days since."

"My sister you may have seen—my twin sister; but not me, my lord," answered Zarah.

"Indeed," said the Duke, "that duplicate of thine, if it was not thy very self, was possessed with a dumb spirit as thou with a talking one. I am still in the mind that you are the same; and that Satan, always so powerful with your sex, had art enough, on our former meeting, to make thee hold thy tongue."

"Believe what you will of it, my lord," replied Zarah, "it cannot change the truth.—And now, my lord, I bid you farewell. Have you any commands to Mauritania?"

"Tarry a little, my princess," said the Duke; "and remember, that you have voluntarily entered yourself as pledge for another; and are justly subjected to any penalty which it is my pleasure to exact. None must brave Buckingham with impunity."

"I am in no hurry to depart, if your Grace hath any commands for me."

"What! are you neither afraid of my resentment, nor of my love, fair Zarah?" said the Duke.

"Of neither, by this glove," answered the lady. "Your resentment must be a petty passion indeed, if it could stoop to such a helpless object as I am; and for your love—good luck! good luck!"

"And why good luck, with such a tone of contempt, lady?" said the Duke, piqued in spite of himself. "Think you Buckingham cannot love, or has never been beloved in return?"

"He may have thought himself beloved," said the maiden; "but by what slight creatures!—things whose heads could be rendered giddy by a playhouse rant—whose brains were only filled with red-heeled shoes and satin buskins—and who run altogether mad on the argument of a George and a star."

"And are there no such frail fair ones in your climate, most scornful princess?" said the Duke.

"There are," said the lady; "but men rate them as parrots and monkeys—things without either sense or soul, head or heart. The nearness we bear to the sun has purified, while it strengthens, our passions. The icicles of your frozen climate shall as soon hammer hot bars into ploughshares, as shall the foppery and folly of your pretended gallantry make an instant's impression on a breast like mine."

"You speak like one who knows what passion is," said the Duke. "Sit down, fair lady, and grieve not that I detain you. Who can consent to part with a tongue of so much melody, or an eye of such expressive eloquence!—You have known, then, what it is to love?"

"I know—no matter if by experience, or through the report of others—but I do know, that to love as I would love, would be to yield not an iota to avarice, not one inch to vanity, not to sacrifice the slightest feeling to interest or to ambition; but to give up ALL to fidelity of heart and reciprocal affection."

"And how many women, think you, are capable of feeling such disinterested passion?"

"More, by thousands, than there are men who merit it," answered Zarah. "Alas! how often do you see the female, pale, and wretched, and degraded, still following with patient constancy the footsteps of some predominating tyrant, and submitting to all his injustice with the endurance of a faithful and misused spaniel, which prizes a look from his master, though the surliest groom that ever disgraced humanity, more than all the pleasures which the world besides can furnish him? Think what such would be to one who merited and repaid her devotion."

"Perhaps the very reverse," said the Duke; "and for your simile, I can see little resemblance. I cannot charge my spaniel with any perfidy; but for my mistresses—to confess truth, I must always be in a cursed hurry if I would have the credit of changing them before they leave me."

"And they serve you but rightly, my lord," answered the lady; "for what are you?—Nay, frown not; for you must hear the truth for once. Nature has done its part, and made a fair outside, and courtly education hath added its share. You are noble, it is the accident of birth—handsome, it is the caprice of Nature—generous, because to give is more easy than to refuse—well-apparelled, it is to the credit of your tailor—well-natured in the main, because you have youth and health—brave, because to be otherwise were to be degraded—and witty, because you cannot help it."

The Duke darted a glance on one of the large mirrors. "Noble, and handsome, and court-like, generous, well-attired, good-humoured, brave, and witty!—You allow me more, madam, than I have the slightest pretension to, and surely, enough to make my way, at some point at least, to female favour."
